
SIGILL. SCHOL. RELIGIONIS PACIFICÆ
COND. A.D. 1866
PRO
VERITATE
ET REGNO
DEI
CHARLES HOLBROOK LIBRARY
Pacific School of Religion

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOLUME TWELVE

1914-1915

FROM OCTOBER 17, 1914, TO APRIL 10, 1915 INCLUSIVE

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

NEW YORK

THE AMERICA PRESS

v.12
1914/15

COPYRIGHT, 1915

INDEX

VOLUME XII—OCTOBER 17, 1914, TO APRIL 10, 1915, INCLUSIVE

PAGE

ABREAST of the Times (Ed.) 367
Aggressive Modesty (Ed.) 392
All Saints 57
Alumnæ Association, A National (Ed.) 222
Ambassador of Peace, The 343
Among the Feathered Many 507
Another Subsidy (Ed.) 70
Anthony, Brother (Ed.) 594
Antipathy and Sympathy (Ed.) 200
Anxious Questionings, Days of (Ed.) 70
Archimandrite's Novice, The 436
Are You Doing It Yourself? (Ed.) 416
At the Sewer's Mouth (Ed.) 443
Australia: General Elections 158
Austria-Hungary: Archbishop of Lemberg Deposed, 55; Austria and the Eucharist, 259, and the Vatican, 606; Blessings of the War, 502; Cardinal Piffl's Pastoral, 550; Change in Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 354; Children's Aid Implored, 426; Discrediting Austria, 634; Emperor Celebrates His Birthday, 211; The Late Archduke Francis Ferdinand, 134; Joint Pastoral of the Austrian Episcopate, 454; The Terms of Peace, 402; Persecutions in Galicia, 479; The Provision Problem, 526; The Russian Peril, 158; Persecution, 83; Religious Regulations, 378; The Servian Plot, 27; Shadow upon Servia, 183; Startling Facts, 330; Vitality of 307

BACKWARD Children 109
Bandages or Bonbons? (Ed.) 41
Bats (Ed.) 414
Belgium. Cardinal Mercier's Pastoral, A Summary 378
Belgium's Answer (Ed.) 199
Bernhardi and the War 59
Billion Leaflet Campaign (Ed.) 568
Binet-Simon Test in Legislation, The 85
Black and White (Ed.) 622
Bombs and Churches (Ed.) 41
Boston and a Bargain (Ed.) 594
Boston Truth Discontinued 176
Bread for the Needy (Ed.) 538
Broad or Narrow (Ed.) 624
Broken Ideals 459
Building Roads 7
Butterfly Habit, The (Ed.) 95

CALUMNIATING Women (Ed.) 40
Capital Punishment 505
Carroll's, Dr., Statistics (Ed.) 515
Catholic: Chaplains in England's Armies (Ed.), 71; but "Non-Sectarian," 223; Daily Newspaper, 114; Papers—Old and New, 335; Press, The Mission of the, 187; Church Extension Society, 643; and a Gentleman, A (Ed.), 15; Landmarks of Philadelphia, 410; Women in Social Work, 90; World Jubilee (Ed.) 622
Catholicism in France, The War and the Revival of 113
Catholics: The Divided Allegiance of, 611; and the Scriptures, 651; in the Y. M. C. A., 534; and Socialism 311
Censorship and the Index (Ed.) 391
Certain Rich Man, A (Ed.) 320
Chances Lost and Won 586
Chasing Rainbows 610
Cheat, The 384
Chesterton, Cecil 128
Children's Crusade, A, 266; (Ed.) 444
Children's Social Betterment (Ed.) 147
Chinese Metaphysics (Ed.) 514
Chivalry Still Passing (Ed.) 444
Christ Child Society, The 218
Christian Democracy and Politics 58
Christianity and the War (Ed.) 95
Christmas: 237; An Armistice on (Ed.), 70; Greeting, A (Ed.), 246; Home-coming (Ed) 247
Church, and Politics, The, 140; and Religious Education, 638; and Salvation, 508; Unity Octave, The 377
Church's Easter Message, The (Ed.) 650
Colossus of Terrorism, The 529
Comfortable, The Cult of the (Ed.) 514
"Comforting Assurance," A (Ed.) 567
Comforting the Gunman (Ed.) 366
Compromising (Ed.) 539
Condition of Peace, The 460
Constitutional Assembly, Our First 612
Cotton, An Early Transaction in 142
Crime, A Wretched (Ed.) 624
Current "Literature" (Ed.) 123
China and Chicago (Ed.) 123

DALMATIA, The Future of 587
Day of Ashes, The 432
Death Penalty in America, The 609
Deeper than Race and Blood (Ed.) 443
Defame, The Right to (Ed.) 516
Defence and an Answer, A (Ed.) 170
Delicacy of Conscience (Ed.) 122
Desecrating Childhood (Ed.) 368
Dispensing with the Devil (Ed.) 466
Distressing Situation, A (Ed.) 539
Dogmatist, The (Ed.) 344
Dowson, Ernest 128
Dr. Carnegie Preaches (Ed.) 467

EASTER, The Liturgy of 614
Election of a Jesuit General 333
End of the World? Not Yet 556
Enemy of the Poor? The (Ed.) 538
England in War Time 12
Epiphany Day (Ed.) 318
Ethics, Non-Sectarian (Ed.) 595
Euphemia and the Euphemists (Ed.) 568
Everybody's Christian (Ed.) 651
Evodia and Syntyche 166
Experimental Inoculation, 309 482

FAILURE of Christianity, The (Ed.) 414
Failure, A Happy 615
Fair Play 636
Farewell to Red Riding Hood (Ed.) 442
February Festival, A 386
Ferrata, Death of Cardinal 4
First of Many Brethren, The (Ed.) 199
"Foundations," Danger of the 510
Founder of Christianity, The 481
France: Awakening of Faith in, 142, 165; The New American Ambassador at Paris, 211; Anti-Clerical Government, 479; Bloc and Religion, 550; Budget for 1915, 258; Caillaux on His Mission, 354; Church and State at Paris, 107; A Commission Reports, 331; Confidence at Paris, 55; The Country's Finances, 403; Court Martial for Colonel Desclaux, 606; Death of a Catholic Champion, 2; Detention Camps, 503; Education in War Time, 107; Fête Day of King Albert, 159; Financial Betterment, 578; and Vocations, 606; French Government and Religion, 3; Heroes of Charity, 27; Lack of Hospital Facilities, 83; Ministry Returns to Paris, 211; Mobilization of the Allied Forces, 234; Parliamentary Matters, 427; Petty Persecution, 259; Press Censorship, 27; The Real Evil, 526; Return of the Government to Paris, 83; A Ruined Cathedral, 135; Short Session for Parliament, 354; Sowing Discord, 634; Waiving the Moratorium, 331; Mr. Wilson as Mediator 427
French Bishops and the War, Some 218

GAMBLING, The Psychology of 581
Gangsters (Ed.) 318
Gasparri, Cardinal: A Personal Impression .. 35
Germany: The Bishops' Pastoral, 379; Bismarck Centenary, 635; Cardinal Mercier, 331; Care of Priest Prisoners, 455; A Catholic King and People, 403; A Catholic Protest, 159; Clergy and the War, 3; Economic Provisions, 183; The Emperor's Birthday Decrees, 355; Concentration Camps, 107; Losses, 480; Military Government, 427; Health of the Kaiser, 234; Internal Affairs, 211; A Friend of Ireland, 159; Meeting the Hunger War, 526; Men and Means, 503; Militarism or Self-Preservation? 135; Panama-Pacific Exposition, 259; Prisoners of War, 3; Reply to French Charges, 355; Reprisals Discussed, 578; Royal Services in the Hospitals, 83; Sacrifice and Religion, 27; Satisfaction Expressed by Rome, 83; Views of the United States, 551; War Credit Voted, 55; War Loan, 607; The War and Religious Peace, 307; Wounded Prisoners 427
Gored Ox, The (Ed.) 415
Gospel of Revolt, The (Ed.) 391
Governor's Humanitarianism, A (Ed.) 443
Grateful Acknowledgement, A 198
Great Britain: Aliens Again, 159; Distress of Aliens in England, 56; Aliens Hostile and Friendly, 107; Army, Navy and Finance, 184; Attitude Toward the United States, 607; The Blank Cheque, 455; Cardinal Bourné's Pastoral on Patriotism, 503; "Business as Usual," 480; Caring for the Wounded, 260; The Chancellor's Speech, 527; Chaplaincies, 235; Employment of Belgian Refugees, 307; Enlistments, 551; Financial Prosperity, 403; A British Envoy to the Holy See, 183; Intercession Day, 307; Kitchener's Volunteers, 84; Labor Difficulties, 427, 607; Mortality among British Officers, 27; New Developments in Education, 355; The New War Credit, 159; Parliament Reassembles, 427; Preparing for Invasion, 235; Private Incomes and Foreign Posts, 331; Prohibition Movement, 635; Protestant Alliance and the Foreign Office, 260; Resignation of the First Sea Lord, 83; Death of Lord Roberts, 135; Scarcity of Labor, 403; Stimulating Recruits, 332; United States and British Reprisals, 579; War Speeches 135
Great Message, The 110
Grieving Christ, The (Ed.) 342

HAS the Church Collapsed 434
"Here's a Sitiwation" (Ed.) 567
Hilaire Belloc the Worker 20
"His Name Could Not be Learned" (Ed.) ... 224
History in the Making (Ed.) 342
Hogan, His Name is (Ed.) 515
Holland and the Holy See, 533; and the War. 313
How Our Young Folk Are Entertained 383

IDYL of Age, An 91
If I Were You (Ed.) 540
Industrial Commission Hearings, The 483
Inspiring Figures 587
International Socialism, The Failure of 9
Into the Future 186
Ireland: Agriculture and Enlistment, 135; Attitude Toward the War, 212; Catholic Chaplains in the Navy, 379; Bishops and the War, 428; Catholic Naval Chaplains and Recruiting, 84, 160, 355, 480, 455; Chaplains for Irish Soldiers, 184; Death of an Irish General, 480; Dr. Kuno Meyer's Dublin Citizenship, 635; Emigration Law, 635; Home Conditions, 527, 307; Home Rule and Enlistment, 332, 404, 504; Lord Londonderry Dead, 455; Mr. Redmond's Position, 260; Increase of Population, 503; Industries, 580; National Volunteers, 608; The New Viceroy, 355; The Party and the Country, 380; Realm Defence Act, 635; Redmond's Policy, 579; Redmond and the Volunteers, 28; Repressive Measures, 235; Secondary School Teachers, 428; Sedition Trials, 551; Saint Patrick's Day, 608; Ireland's New Under-Secretary, 56; Volunteers and Mr. Redmond, 3, 108; in War Time, Another View of 36
Is It Mere Folly? (Ed.) 538
Is War the Worst Evil? 484
Italian Question, The (Ed.) 246
Italy: The Earthquake, 356; Internal Affairs, 235; Religious Conditions in, 6; Neutrality. 139
I Want to Know (Ed.) 71

JAPAN, Christian Jubilee in 87
Jingo, The (Ed.) 491
Just As You Say (Ed.) 148

LATER Than You Think (Ed.) 270
Law and the Lunatics, The (Ed) 490
Lessons in Decency (Ed.) 623
Letter to Mr. Lind, A (Ed.) 318
Letter, Some Remarks, A Solution (Ed.) 16
Let the Children Pray (Ed.) 271
Liberty or License? (Ed.) 442
Lilliputian Souls (Ed.) 172
Lilliputians at Work 382
Lodge and Immortality 553
London in War Time 116
Los Angeles Liberator, The (Ed.) 467
Ludicrous Anachronism, A 458

MAD Homeopathy 86
Magazines Young People Read 640
Mariana! See 214

PAGE

Marriage Trial, A ... 530
Masonic Program, A (Ed) ... 42
Masonized? Shall Government Buildings be ... 216
Masonry, The Politics of, 61; Religion of ... 10
Menace and the Mails, The (Ed.) ... 369
Men of God and Men of Men ... 240
Mercier, Cardinal ... 510
Messengers of Truth ... 33
Mexican Horrors, American Witnesses of (Ed.) ... 14
Mexico: Anarchy, Pestilence, Famine, 527; Appeal of Mrs. Hendrix, 212; Appointment of Duval West, 480; Atrocities, 380; Battles, Decrees and a Convention, 356; Carranza's New Decrees, 404; Chaos, Misery, Protests, 308; Conditions Under Obregon, 580; Confusion Worse Confounded, 428; Decree of Toluca, 3; Disorders and Religious Conditions, 552; Extortion, 236; Growth of Disorder, 84; Hopeless Anarchy, 260; I. W. W. Parade, 606; Letter on Mexican Affairs, 456; Letter from Mexico City, 404; A Letter from a Mason, 236; New Wars and New Affidavits, 160; Persecutions and Protests, 56; Pitiful Conditions, 504; A Priest's Fate, 236; Riot and War, 28; A Sad Affidavit, 184; Spaniards in Mexico, 504; The State Department and the Rev. R. H. Tierney, S.J., 184; Torturing of Priests, 108; A Turbulent Week, 456; Villa's Activities, 332; His New Rôle, 636; War and Affidavits, 136; A Week of Blood, 380; Woman's Relief Work, 636; Worse than Ever, 332; and Ourselves (Ed.), 222; The Appeal of (Ed.) ... 343
Midnight Office of Christmas, The ... 241
Mighty Name, A ... 272
Mind, I Have Made Up My (Ed.) ... 96
Minimum and a Menace, The (Ed.) ... 566
Mission Movements Among Protestant Students ... 192
Modern Storm Center, A ... 237
Monkeys and Mortals (Ed.) ... 40
Mr. Lind's Answer? (Ed.), 342; Fate (Ed.) ... 366
Mun, Count Albert de ... 63

New Reformation of 1914, The (Ed.) ... 95
New Thought ... 262
New York, Catholic Landmarks in ... 62
Niobites, The ... 361
Nobody Cares (Ed.) ... 16
No Escape! (Ed.) ... 414
Not Anti-Clerical But Inhuman (Ed.) ... 147

Omnipotent Snub, The ... 406
Once Upon a Time (Ed.) ... 516
One Prop Less for Yellow Journalism ... 462
Only Way, The ... 261
Opportunity of the Young Man of America, The ... 310
Our Alleged "Rush" (Ed.) ... 170
Our New Statistics (Ed.) ... 540
Out of the Mouths of Babes (Ed.) ... 566

Pardow, Father ... 191
Paris in War Time ... 615
Passing It Along (Ed.) ... 468
Passions of Plants, The (Ed.) ... 390
Patriots to a Patriot (Ed.) ... 122
Philippines, Religious Conditions in the ... 161
Peacemakers (Ed.) ... 248
Pecksniff on South America (Ed.) ... 415
Perkins and the Professional Vultures ... 433
Philadelphia, Catholic Landmarks of ... 410
Pius X, Some Critics of ... 31
Plea for Reparation, A ... 247
Poison-Men, The ... 358
Polyglot Diocese, A ... 555
Pope Benedict XV, A Desire of (Ed.) ... 366
Pope's First Encyclical, The (Ed.) ... 270
Portugal: Another Republic ... 528
Praise of Crime (Ed.) ... 390
Prohibition at Work (Ed.) ... 368
Protest, A Silly (Ed.) ... 623
Protestant Backsliding (Ed.) ... 171
"Pseudochromesthesia" (Ed) ... 566

Readiness is All, The (Ed.) ... 344
Real Americans (Ed.) ... 96
Real Peace Palace, The (Ed.) ... 319
Religion and Children (Ed.) ... 222
Revised Manifesto, A ... 264
Rich Man's Jests, A ... 486
Rome: Death of Cardinal Agliardi, 580; The Pope's Allocution, 380; Peace Day ... 428
Round the Mulberry Bush ... 314
Russia, The Forward March of ... 558
Russian Soldier, The ... 338

Saints Made While You Wait (Ed.) ... 597
Save Me From My Friends (Ed.) ... 595
Scripture Reading and Crime (Ed.) ... 492
See Mariana! ... 214
Sex and the War ... 239
She Loved Much (Ed.) ... 492
Short Way Round, The (Ed.) ... 652
Shun the Amoeba (Ed.) ... 466
Simplifying Life (Ed.) ... 224
Sin, Open Advocacy of (Ed.) ... 596
Sinners and Saints ... 409
Sisters and Sociologists (Ed.) ... 392
Smoothing War's Wrinkled Front (Ed.) ... 320
Sociology, The Catholic Attitude Toward ... 29
Soldiers of Fortune ... 185
South America's Catholicism ... 642
Spain: Maura and Morocco ... 136
Spoiling Youth's Visions (Ed.) ... 490
Statutes or Decency? (Ed.) ... 491
Success, The Cost of (Ed.) ... 624
Suggestion, A Humble ... 557
Sunday, "Billy," and the Champagne Bottle (Ed.), 515; Sermons ... 359

Talking to Oneself (Ed.) ... 124
Thanksgiving (Ed.) ... 146
Teach the Children to Read ... 584
Temperance Against Prohibition ... 506
Theatrical Manager, Pounding a (Ed.) ... 516
"The Least of These" (Ed.) ... 246
Theater, the Press and the Devil, The (Ed.) ... 415
"The Public Failed to Respond" (Ed.) ... 368
This Vale of Sunny Shadows (Ed.) ... 272
Three Cheers (Ed.) ... 466
Toll of Death, The (Ed.) ... 172
To Rage or Not to Rage (Ed.) ... 248
Trade Unionists in Socialists' Schools (Ed.) ... 650
Tuberculosis, Efficiency in the Fight Against ... 34

University Religious Forums (Ed.) ... 271
Unlovely Beast, The (Ed.) ... 467

Vitalism ... 312
Votes for Women (Ed.) ... 123

Warning to Parents, A (Ed.) ... 199
War, The European: Alsace, 305; entered by the French, 54; Fall of Antwerp, 1; Fighting at Arras, 181; Attack on Warsaw, 257, 305; Attempts toward Calais, 53; The Audacious and Emden, 134; Austrian Defeat, 305; Austria, 401; Reverses of, 106, 134; Successes, 54, 258; Balkans, 182; Battle, at Warsaw, 425; of the Yser, 25; Belgian Retreat from Antwerp, 82; Belgium's Danger, 105; Defeat, 1; British Naval Victory, 377; Bulgaria, 210; Bukowina and Galicia, 477; Campaign in the West, 401; Cancellation of Belgian Exequaturs, 306; Comparative Quiet in the West, 157; Cargo of the Wilhelmina, 425; Carpathians, and Bukowina, 453; Russian Advance in, 605; Cracow and East Prussia, 210; Crown Prince's Army Repulsed, 25; Dacia, The Case of the, 378, 502; The Dardanelles, 526; Deadlock in Poland, 525; Falaba Sunk, 636; Fall of the Dardanelles Forts, 501; France, and Belgium, 181; and Flanders, 377; Galicia, 354, 525; and Bukowina, 329; and Egypt, 425; German Defeat, 105; Fleet, Destruction of the, 234; Reverses, 257; Ships, The Purchase of, 402; Submarines, 82; Submarine Attack, 26; Success, 258; Germans Resume the Offensive, 25; Germany's Note, 478; Great Britain's, Three Notes, 477; Reply, 330; Italy, 82, 210, 330, 606; Japan, Portugal, Turkey, 2, 55; Lodz and Lowicz, 182; Losses at Sea, 550; of H. M. S. Formidable, 306; The March on the Channel, 26; Naval Operations, 182; Notes to Germany and Great Britain, 306, 453; Our Consuls in Belgium, 402; Poland, 158, 133, 209, 657; Fall of Przemysl, 605; Raid by Airships, 258, 377; Rumania, 330, 354; Russia, 401, 2, 54, 82, 377; Servia, 156, 210, 234, 329, 258; Sinking of W. P. Frye, 549; South Africa, 134; Swoboda, 634; Tsing-Tao, 106; Turkey, 82, 158, 182, 259, 330; United States and the Blockade of Germany, 678; Warning to Neutral Ships, 425; Warsaw, 26, 233, 353; Werner Horn, 426; Wilhelmina and Dacia, 402 ... 454
War: Orphans, 137; and Religion in Germany, 360; The Cost of (Ed.), 567; Time Reflections ... 462
Watchword of the New Pontificate, The ... 357
Wary Reading (Ed.) ... 146
Wary Theatergoing (Ed.) ... 198
Wearing of the Green, The ... 532
What Our Libraries Should Supply ... 430
What Our Young Folk Read ... 405
When Friends Fall Out in Mexico (Ed.) ... 94
White Robe of Mockery, The (Ed.) ... 393
Will You Give Up? (Ed.) ... 492
Who Owns You? (Ed.) ... 14
Why Are Graves Untended? ... 164
Williams Reads St. Thomas ... 559
Wisdom from the East (Ed.) ... 148
Wise Householder, The ... 162
Witches' Cauldron, The ... 429
Woman and Religion ... 111
Women: and Children First (Ed.), 568; Work for ... 213
World Conquests, Three ... 585
World, Hope of the (Ed.) ... 567
Writers ... 189

Yale and Prayer (Ed.) ... 14
Young Man, The: and Advertising, 334; and Building, 163; and Catholic Publishing, 215; and Commerce, 263; and Diplomacy, 682; and Foreign Missions, 408; and Osteopathy, 89; and Pharmacy, 381; and Public Life, 457; and Railroading, 30; and the Religious Life, 137; and Sociology, 637; and Teaching, ... 5
"You Shall!" "I Won't!" (Ed.) ... 321

AUTHORS

Abbot, Eleanor Hallowell: Little Eve Edgarton ... 100
Alexander, Richard W.: The Hand of Mercy ... 228
Atherton, Gertrude: California ... 347
Ayscough, John: Prodigals and Sons ... 73
Baldwin, Charles Sears: An Introduction to Medieval English Literature ... 74
Bamberg, Rev. Hubert: Popular Sermons on the Catechism, Vol. I ... 275
Barclay, Florence: My Heart's Right There, 395; The Wall of Partition ... 47
Barrett, Dom Michael, O.S.B.: Rambles in Catholic Lands ... 251
Barrie, Sir J. M.: Half Hours ... 449
Barrow, C. W.: The Audacious War ... 571
Beck, James M.: The Evidence in the Case ... 346
Begbie, Harold: Kitchener Organizer of Victory ... 628
Belloc, Hilaire: The Book of the Bayeux Tapestry ... 173
Benson, Arthur Christopher: The Orchard Pavilion ... 420
Benson, Robert Hugh: Loneliness? 653; Oddsfish, 126; The Upper Room, 346; Vexilla Regis, 100 ... 252
Berry, E. Sylvester: Commentary on the Psalms ... 654
Birmingham, George A.: From Dublin to Chicago ... 176
Blackwood, Algernon: The Listener ... 371
Bosher, Kate Langley. How it Happened ... 227
Bordeaux, Henri: The Awakening ... 276
Bourdon, Georges: The German Enigma ... 150
Boustelle, Jessie and Marion de Forest: Little Women Letters from the House of Alcott ... 127
Braithwaite, W. S.: Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1914 ... 653
Bronwell, W. C.: Criticism ... 175
Brown, Abbie Farwell: Songs of Sixpence ... 75
Buffet, Edward P.: The Layman Revato ... 628
Burke, B. H.: First Book for Italians ... 520
Cable, George W.: Gideon's Band ... 126
Cahusac, Francis H. E.: What Think You of Christ? ... 252
Calderon, Salvador: Stories for Carmencita ... 629
Canes, Sister Mary Reginald: Richard of Wyche ... 274
Carroll, Rev. P. J., C.S.C.: Round About Home ... 394
Carton, Hugh: The Grand Assize ... 175
Castle, Agnes and Egerton: The Haunted Heart ... 495
Charles, R. H.: Religious Development Between the Old and New Testaments ... 418
Chesterton, Cecil: The Prussian Hath Said in His Heart ... 496
Chesterton, Gilbert K.: The Appetite of Tyranny, 571; The Wisdom of Father Brown ... 395
Clarke, Isabel C.: Fine Clay ... 75
Claudel, Paul: The East I Know ... 543
Clodder, H. J.: In der Schule des Evangeliums ... 657
Coffey, B.: Ontology ... 18
Conrad, Joseph: A Set of Six ... 418
Coppens, Charles, S.J.: Spiritual Instructions for Religious ... 371
Cotterill, H. B.: Ancient Greece ... 126
Coulevain, Pierre de: The Wonderful Romance ... 204
Cramb, J. H.: Germany and England, 150; Origin and Destiny of Imperial Britain ... 655
Cunningham, Very Rev. W. M.: The Unfolding of the Little Flower ... 494
Curtis, Edward S.: Indian Days of the Long Ago ... 47
Curtiss, Philip: The Ladder ... 543
Dargan, Olive T.: Path Flower and Other Verses ... 653
Darton, F. J. Harvey: The Seven Champions of Christendom ... 127
Dawson, W. H.: What is Wrong with Germany? ... 571
Dease, Alice: Down West ... 202
Dellenbaugh, Frederick S.: Fremont and '49 ... 250
Dickinson, Don: The Kaiser ... 252
Dickenson, G. Lowes: Appearances ... 152
Dillon, Dr. E. J.: A Scrap of Paper ... 346
Dimnet, Ernest: France Herself Again ... 226
Donnelly, Francis P., S.J.: Mustard Seed ... 151
Doré, Henry, S.J.: Researches into Chinese Superstitions ... 45
Dorsch, Aemil: Institutiones Theologiæ Fundamentalis ... 655
Dowson, Ernest: Dilemmas ... 447
Doyle, Sir A. Conan: The Valley of Fear ... 572
Drawbridge, Rev. C. L.: Anti-Christian Socialism ... 519
Dugmore, A. Radcliffe: The Romance of the Beaver ... 324
Dunn, Joseph and P. J. Lennox: The Glories of Ireland ... 447
Dunn, J. B.: In the Service of the King ... 656
Durham, Edith: The Struggle for Scutari ... 174

PAGE

Egan, Maurice Francis: The Ivy Hedge..... 226
Elliott, Very Rev. Walter, C.S.P.: The Spiritual Life..... 447
Embury, Aymar: Early American Churches.. 228
Erskine, Prof. John: A Pageant of the Thirteenth Century..... 496
Ervine, St. John E.: Mrs. Martin's Man..... 419
Fabre, J. Henri: The Mason Bees..... 226
Farnum, Mabel A.: The Fruit of the Tree... 448
Ferreres, Father John B., S.J.. Las Religionas legún la Disciplina Vigente..... 324
Ferrero, Guglielmo: Between the Old World and the New..... 74
Figgis, John Neville: The Fellowship of the Mystery 394
Fitch, Albert Parker: The College Course and the Preparation for Life..... 46
Fonck, Leopold, S.J.: The Parables of the Gospels 323
Ford, H. J.: The Scotch-Irish in America... 599
Frazer, Mrs. Hugh: Seven Years on the Pacific Slope..... 251
Freytag, Rev. Anthony: The Catholic Mission Feast 449
Garnett, Mary Adelaide: Children of the Kingdom 252
Geddes, Patrick and J. Arthur Thomas: Sex. 471
Gibergue, Bishop de: Simplicity..... 277
Graham, Stephen: With Poor Immigrants to America 100
Haggard, H. Rider: Allan and the Holy Flower 656
Harris, Charles: Pro Fide..... 543
Harris, George: A Century's Change in Religion 471
Harrison, Henry Sydnor: Angela's Business. 627
Hawthorne, Julian: The Subterranean Brotherhood 449
Henderson, Archibald: The Changing Drama. 419
Houck, Frederick A.: Our Palace Beautiful.. 496
Hulme, Edward M.. The Renaissance, the Protestant Revolution, and the Catholic Reformation 323
Hunt, Gaillard: Life in America One Hundred Years Ago..... 202
Hurll, Estelle M.: The Home Book of Great Paintings 127
Hutchinson, Woods: Civilization and Health. 372
Jenkins, McGregor: The Reading Public..... 176
Jessop, Augustus: England's Peasantry and Other Essays..... 469
Jevons, F. B.: Philosophy, What is It?..... 227
Johnson, Burges: Rhymes of Little Folk..... 497
Johnson, Robert Underwood: Collected Poems 371
Johnston, Henry Phelps: Nathan Hale, 1776. 495
Johnston, Mary: The Witch..... 128
Jordan, David Starr: War's Aftermath..... 324
Jordan, Elizabeth: May Iverson's Career.... 204
Judson, Hanford Chase: Songs Toward the Sunlight 45
Kane, Rev. Robert, S.J.: From Fetters to Freedom 470
Kelley, Francis Clement: The Book of Red and Yellow..... 394
Key, Ellen: The Younger Generation..... 470
Kilmer, Joyce: Trees and Other Poems..... 98
King, General Charles: The True Ulysses S. Grant 74
Knibb, Harry H.: Songs of the Outlands.... 420
Knox, R. A.: Reunion All Round..... 44
Kolb, E. L.: Through the Grand Canyon from Wyoming to Mexico..... 202
Krebs, F. M.: Examen Conscientiæ..... 601
Lafon, André: Jean Gilles, Schoolboy..... 76
Landriot, Archbishop: The Valiant Woman.. 520
Lange, Algot: The Lower Amazon..... 396
Laselle, Mary A.: Vocations for Girls..... 275
LeJune, P.: Introduction to the Mystical Life 600
Lindencrone, L. de Hermann: The Sunny Side of Diplomatic Life..... 202
Lindsay, Vachel: The Congo and Other Poems 653
Logan, Robert Restalrig: Lichens from the Temple 45
Lowell, Amy: Sword Blades and Poppy Seed 653
Lucens: Im Kampf um Lourdes..... 275
Lunn, Arnold: The Exploration of the Alps.. 348
MacGregor, Mary: The Story of Greece..... 127
Mackaye, Percy: The Present Hour..... 653
Mackenzie, Compton: Sinister Street..... 348
MacManus, Seumas: Yourself and Your Neighbors 151
Maeterlinck, Maurice. The Unknown Guest.. 543
Malone, Walter: Hernando de Soto..... 418
Mangold, George B.: Problems of Child Welfare 494
Maresch-Jezewicz, Dr. Phil. Maria: Luxus und Verantwortlichkeit 19
Martin, Edward Sandford: Poems, 126; The War Week by Week..... 346
Masefield, John: Philip the King and Other Poems 653
Matthews, Brander: On Acting..... 175
Maude, Sophie: The Knight of the Fleur de Luce 448
Mausbach, Joseph: Catholic Moral Teaching and Its Antagonists..... 417
McCarthy, M. R.: Religious Terms, 101 Signs 601
McKim, Randolph H.: Romanism in the Light of History..... 19

PAGE

McRory, Dr. Joseph: Gospel of St. John with Notes..... 348
Meader, John R.: Your Pay Envelope..... 519
Meldola, Raphael: Chemistry..... 203
Meynell, Viola: Modern Lovers..... 175
Metlake, George: Saint Columban..... 274
Mirandola, Pico della: A Platonick Discourse upon Love..... 629
Moreton, Lady: A Playmate of Philip II.... 626
Morgan, Anne: The American Girl..... 656
Muir, Ramsey: Britain's Case against Germany 346
Mulholland, Rosa: Norah of Waterford..... 275
Mumby, F. A.: Elizabeth and Mary Stuart.. 519
Murray, Professor Gilbert: Hamlet and Orestes 472
Musser, Benjamin Francis: Outside the Walls 20
Nansen, Fridtjof: Through Siberia, the Land of the Future..... 275
Neill, Esther W.: The Red Ascent..... 99
Newboldt, Henry: The Book of the Blue Sea 204
Nicholson, Meredith: The Poet..... 20
Noyes, Alfred: Rada, A Drama of War..... 152
O'Connor, Armel: Poems..... 18
Oer, Rev. Sebastian van: Our Failings..... 372
Ogg, Frederick A.: Daniel Webster..... 45
Olcott, Frances Jenkins: Good Stories for Great Holidays..... 127
O'Reilly, Gertrude M.: Just Stories..... 627
Paget, H. L.: In the Day of Battle..... 656
Parker, Wm. B.: Edward Rowland Sill..... 519
Phelan, Rev. M., S.J.: The Straight Path.... 542
Phelps, William Lyon. Essays on Books..... 174
Phillipps, Henry Albert: The Photodrama.... 347
Pickard-Cambridge, A. W.: Demosthenes and the Last Days of Greek Freedom..... 74
Plarr, Victor: Ernest Dowson: 1888-1897.... 447
Platz, Herman: Im Ringender Zeit..... 19
Pohle, Rev. Joseph: Grace Actual and Habitual 371
Praetz, Joseph R.: Digest of Savings Bank Laws 75
Pratt, Helen Marshall: Westminster Abbey.. 201
Putnam, Ruth: Alsace and Lorraine from Cæsar to Kaiser..... 572
Quiller-Couch, Arthur: Poetry..... 419
Raupert, J. Godfrey: Christ and the Powers of Darkness..... 472
Reed, E. A.: Hinduism in Europe and America 657
Reid, Christian: A Faraway Princess..... 275
Ribbany, Abraham Mitrie: A Far Journey... 46
Richardson, Ernest Cushing: Biblical Libraries 470
Richter, Emil H: Prints..... 472
Rinehart, Mary Robert: The Street of Seven Stars 76
Roberts, Charles G. D.. Hoof and Claw..... 99
Robertson, John Mackinnon: Elizabethan Literature 347
Roland, John: The Good Shepherd..... 448
Roosevelt, Colonel Theodore: Through the Brazilian Wilderness..... 250
Rosa, P.: I Gesuiti..... 655
Rose, Ellie Whitlock and Vida Hunt Francis: Cathedrals and Cloisters of Northern France 201
Rose, J. Holland: The Origins of the War.. 628
Sarolea, Dr. C.: How Belgium Saved Europe 571
Saunders, George: Builder and Blunderer... 346
Schauffler, Robert Haven: The Joyful Heart 76
Schouppe, Rev. Francis, S.J.: Pulpit Themes 542
Schwager, Frederick, S.J.: The World Missions of the Catholic Church..... 174
Sheehan, Canon, P.A.: The Graves at Kilmora 518
Shell, S.: Jones and Smith Discuss Socialism 277
Sheran, Wm. A.: The Columbiad..... 628
Shumaster, E. E.: The World Crisis and the Way to Peace..... 628
Sichel, Edith: The Renaissance..... 654
Sladen, Douglas. The Real "Truth About Germany" 150
Smith, E. Galbraith: St. Clair of Assisi..... 518
Snyder, William H.: First Year Science..... 373
Stephenson, Burton E.: The Charm of Ireland 227
Stevenson, Mrs. R. L.: The Cruise of the Janet Nichol..... 420
Sträter, Augustine: Die Jesuiten in der Schweiz 472
Streit, Carolus: Atlas Hierarchicus..... 469
Strunsky, Simeon: Belshazzer Court..... 251
Stuart, Janet E.: The Society of the Sacred Heart 599
Sturgeon, Mary: Women of the Classics..... 227
Sutherland, Howard V.: Idylls of Greece.... 471
Taggert, M. A.: The Elder Miss Ainsborough 520
Tarkington, Booth: The Turmoil..... 496
Thompson, Elbert N. S.: Essays on Milton.. 371
Treitschke, Heinrich von: Germany, France, Russia and Islam..... 655
True, Ruth S.: Boyhood and Lawlessness. The Neglected Girl..... 494
Tynan, Katherine: The Flower of Peace..... 448
Underhill, Evelyn: Practical Mysticism..... 600
Villien, A.: A History of the Commandments of the Church..... 628
Walsh, William S.: Heroes and Heroines of Fiction 276
Wentworth, M. C.: War Brides..... 571

PAGE

Wenzlaff, G. G.: Outline of the Fundamentals of Psychology..... 656
Wheeler, H. D.: Are We Ready?..... 627
Whelan, W. W.: The Ex-Seminarian..... 656
Whitridge, Frederick W.: One American's Opinion of the European War..... 150
Wilkins-Freeman, Mary E.: The Copy-Cat... 252
Williamson, C. N. and A. M.: A Soldier of the Legion..... 100
Williston, Samuel Wendell: Water Reptiles of the Past and Present..... 347
Wilm, Emil Carl: Henri Bergson..... 251
Zweig, Stephen: Émile Verhaeren..... 542

BOOKS

Abide with Me..... 396
Acta Synodi Roffensis Tertiae..... 396
Advanced Anglican Assumption, The..... 420
Ainsborough, The Elder, Miss..... 520
Allan and the Holy Flower..... 656
Alsace and Lorraine from Cæsar to Kaiser... 572
American Girl, The..... 656
America's Tribute to Pope Pius X..... 420
Among the Hurons..... 75
Ancient Greece 126
And So They Were Married..... 252
Angela's Business 627
Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1914..... 653
Appetite of Tyranny 571
Apostleship of Prayer in Schools, The..... 420
Appearances 152
Are We Ready?..... 627
Arnold, Matthew, Essays of..... 396
Atlas Hierarchicus 469
At the Gate of the Temple..... 421
Audacious War, The..... 571
Awakening, The 276
Basket of Plums, A..... 252
Battles, The Boys' Book of..... 228
Bayeux Tapestry, The Book of the..... 173
Belgium, The Facts About..... 150
Belgium in the Present War, The Case of... 150
Belshazzar Court 251
Between the Old World and the New..... 74
Biblical Libraries 470
Blue Sea, The Book of the..... 204
Book of Red and Yellow, The..... 394
Bo'sun's Bride, The..... 421
Boyhood and Lawlessness..... 494
Breviarium Romanum, 19..... 628
Britain's Case Against Germany..... 346
Broken Rosary, A..... 100
Bücherkunde zur Geschichte der Kath. Bewegung in Deutschland im 19 Jahrhunderd... 497
Builder and Blunderer..... 346
By-paths to the Presence of God..... 420
Cæsare Putti, The Conversion of..... 100
California 347
Can Germany Win?..... 571
Capers: His Haps and Mishaps..... 276
Cardinal Mercier's Pastoral Letter..... 544
Catechism of the Third Order of St. Francis, A..... 420
Cathedral and Cloisters of Northern France. 201
Catholic Belief and Practice..... 544
Catholic Encyclopedia, Knights of Columbus Edition 20
Catholic Mission Feast, The..... 499
Catholic Moral Teaching—Its Antagonists.... 417
Catholicism—Peace 420
Centenary of Scientific Thought, A..... 420
Century's Change in Religion, A..... 471
Changing Drama, The..... 419
Chemistry 203
Chemistry of Common Things..... 629
Children of the Kingdom..... 252
Chinese Superstitions, Researches into..... 45
Christ and the Powers of Darkness..... 472
Christianity as Mystical Fact..... 496
Church and Anti-Clericalism, The..... 420
Church at Home—Abroad, The..... 420
Church in the Netherlands..... 420
Church in Portugal, The..... 420
Church in Scotland, The..... 420
Church in South Africa, The..... 420
Civilization and Health..... 372
College Course and Preparation for Life, The 46
Columbiad, The..... 628
Commentary on the Psalms..... 654
Conferences for Boys..... 395
Congo and Other Poems, The..... 653
Copy-Cat, The..... 252
Criticism 175
Curly-Haired Hen, The..... 204
Cruise of the Janet Nichol, The..... 420
Daily Life of a Religious..... 420
Daily Mass..... 420
Daniel Webster..... 45
Demosthenes and the Last Days of Greek Freedom, 394-322 B. C..... 74
Digest of Savings Bank Laws, A..... 75
Dilemmas 447
Doctrine of Indulgences, The..... 420
The Doers..... 128
Dr. Lyn..... 656
Down West..... 202
Dread of Responsibility, The..... 203
Duchesne, Life of the Ven. Philippine..... 151
Early American Churches..... 228
Early Life of Man, The..... 252

PAGE

Edward Rowland Sill..... 519
Eldridge, Seba, Problems of Community Life. 544
Elizabethan Literature..... 347
Elizabeth and Mary Stuart..... 519
Elsass-Lothringen und Einsiedeln in ihren gegenseitigen Beziehungen..... 396
Émile Verhaeren..... 542
England's Peasantry and Other Essays..... 469
English Essays, A Book of..... 348
Ernest Dowson: 1888-1897..... 447
Eskimo Twins, The..... 204
Essays on Books..... 175
Essays of Matthew Arnold..... 396
Essays on Milton..... 371
Evidence in the Case, The..... 346
Examen Conscientiæ..... 601
Excommunications—Anathemas 420
Explorations of the Alps, The..... 348
Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, The.... 420
Ex-Seminarian, The..... 656
Faber, The Works of Father Frederick..... 99
Far-away Princess, A..... 275
Far Journey, A..... 46
Fellowship of the Mystery, The..... 394
Find the Church..... 544
Fine Clay..... 75
Fireside Melodies..... 421
First Year Science..... 373
Five Birds in a Nest..... 128
Flower of Peace, The..... 448
Forbidden Fruit of Mixed Marriages, The... 544
France Herself Again..... 226
Freckles 276
Fremont and '49..... 250
Frequent Communion..... 420
From Dublin to Chicago..... 176
From Fetters to Freedom..... 470
Fruit of the Tree, The..... 448
German Enigma, The..... 150
Germany and England..... 150
Germany, France, Russia and Islam..... 655
Gesuiti, I..... 655
Gideon's Band..... 126
Glories of Ireland, The..... 447
God of Philosophy, The..... 420
Good Shepherd, The..... 448
Good Stories for Great Holidays..... 127
Gospel of St. John with Notes..... 348
Grace Actual and Habitual..... 371
Grand Assize, The..... 175
Grant, The True Ulysses S..... 74
Graves at Kilmorna, The..... 518
Greece, The Story of..... 127
Guardians of Liberty—Roman Catholics, The. 420
Half Hours..... 449
Hamlet and Orestes..... 472
Handicapped 128
Hand of Mercy, The..... 228
Haunted Heart, The..... 495
Henri Bergson..... 251
Hernando de Soto..... 418
Heroes and Heroines of Fiction..... 276
Hinduism in Europe and America..... 657
Historical Records and Studies, Vol. VII.... 46
History of the Commandments of the Church. 628
Home Book of Great Paintings, The..... 127
Hoof and Claw..... 99
Hour, the Present..... 653
How Belgium Saved Europe..... 571
How It Happened..... 227
How to Help the Dead..... 396
Idylls of Greece..... 471
Im Kampf um Lourdes..... 275
Im Ringen der Zeit..... 19
In der Schule des Evangeliums..... 657
In a Flower Garden (Cantata)..... 204
Indian Days of the Long Ago..... 47
International Encyclopedia, The New..... 570
In the Day of Battle..... 656
In the Heart of the Meadows..... 348
In the Service of the King..... 656
Introduction to the Mystical Life, An..... 600
Ireland, The Charm of..... 227
Institutiones Theologiæ Fundamentalis..... 655
Instructions d'un Quart d'Heure..... 543
Italians, First Book for..... 520
Ivy Hedge, The..... 226
James 496
Japanese Grammar, A..... 324
Jean Gilles, Schoolboy..... 76
Jesuiten in der Schweiz, 1814-1847, Die..... 472
Jesuits and Their Centenary Celebration, The 420
Jesuit Myth, The..... 543
Jones and Smith Discuss Socialism..... 277
Joyful Heart, The..... 76
Joy of Finding, The..... 495
Jugendbrot, Sonntags und Festagslesungen für die reifere Jugend..... 396
Just Stories..... 627
Kaiser, The..... 252
Kardinal Newman und sein Weg zur Kirche. 497
King Albert's Book..... 627
Kitchener, Organizer of Victory..... 628
Knight of the Fleur de Luce, The..... 448
Ladder, The..... 543
Lady Rum-Di-Doodle-Dum's Children..... 204
Las Religionas Legún la Disciplina Vigente.. 324
Layman Revato, The..... 628
Legends of King Arthur and His Knights.... 252
Letters and Addresses on Women Suffrage by Catholic Ecclesiastics..... 152
Lichens from the Temple..... 45

PAGE

Life in America One Hundred Years Ago... 202
Lingard's History of England, Vol. XI..... 446
Listener, The..... 371
Little Catechism for Children and Converts.. 396
Little Eve Edgarton..... 100
Little Sir Galahad..... 276
Little Women Letters from House of Alcott.. 127
Loneliness? 653
Lord Clandonnell..... 127
Lower Amazon, The..... 376
Lucas' Annual..... 324
Luxus and Verantwortlichkeit..... 19
Marienkalendar 47
Mason-Bees, The..... 226
May Iverson's Career..... 204
Meaning of Life, The..... 48
Medieval English Literature, An Introduction to 74
Meditations on the Rosary..... 48
Meditations for the Use of Seminarians and Priests 448
Meditations on Votes for Women..... 373
Memorials of the German Cardinals..... 47
Methods for Life's Big Business..... 420
Mexico, The Boy Fugitives in..... 100
Missions of China, The..... 420
Missions of India, The..... 420
Modern Lovers..... 175
Monsignor Villarosa..... 20
Mrs. Martin's Man..... 419
Mustard Seed..... 151
My Examen..... 396
My Heart's Right There..... 395
Nathan Hale, 1776..... 495
Need of Courage, The..... 277
Norah of Waterford..... 275
Oddsfish! 126
Offene Antwort auf Öffentliche Angriffe..... 497
Office of Holy Week, The..... 396
Oklahomensis, Statuta Dioeceseos..... 127
Old Testament Stories..... 420
On Acting..... 175
On the Eve of Home Rule..... 395
On the Fighting Line..... 496
Open Letter to the Nation with regard to a Peace Plan..... 472
One American's Opinion of the European War 150
On the War Path..... 76
Ontology 18
Orchard Pavilion, The..... 420
Origins of the War, The..... 628
Origin and Destiny of Imperial Britain..... 655
Our Boys..... 20
Our Failings..... 372
Our Lady of Dolors..... 420
Our Palace Wonderful..... 496
Outline Course of Study of the Diocesan Parochial Schools of the Diocese of Rochester 396
Outlines of the Fundamentals of Psychology.. 656
Outside the Walls..... 20
Pageant of the Thirteenth Century, A..... 496
Parables of the Gospels, The..... 323
Parker, Life of Lieutenant-Colonel Moses.... 472
Pastor's Wife, The..... 152
Path Flower and Other Verses..... 653
Pax 203
Pebbles and Brambles..... 420
Penitential Psalms, Commentary on the..... 228
Philip the King and Other Poems..... 653
Philosophy, What is It?..... 227
Photodrama, The..... 347
Pinocchio 252
Platonick Discourse upon Love..... 629
Playmate of Philip II, A..... 626
Poems 371
Poet, The..... 20
Poetry 419
Police Practice and Procedure..... 496
Popular Sermons on the Catechism..... 496
Practical English Punctuation..... 497
Practical Mysticism..... 600
Practical Talks with the Christian Child..... 228
Prayers of St. Paul, The..... 495
Principles of Christianity, The..... 420
Prints 472
Problems of Child Welfare..... 494
Problems of Community Life..... 544
Prodigals and Sons..... 73
Pro Fide..... 543
Prophet's Wife, The..... 127
Protestantism in Cuba..... 129
Pulpit Themes..... 542
Purgatory 420
Rada—A Drama of War..... 152
Rambles in Catholic Lands..... 251
Reading Public, The..... 176
Red Ascent, The..... 99
Religious Development between the Old and New Testaments 418
Religious Terms—One Hundred and One Signs 601
Renaissance, The..... 654
Renaissance, The Protestant Revolution and the Catholic Reformation, The..... 323
Reunion All Round..... 44
Reims, A Poem..... 176
Rhymes of Little Folk..... 497
Richard of Wyche..... 274
Roman Catholic Church: for What Does She Stand? The,..... 544

PAGE

Roman Index of Forbidden Books, Elementary Questions Concerning the..... 544
Romance of the Beaver, The..... 324
Romanism in the Light of History..... 19
Rome 348
Rosie World..... 76
Round About Home..... 394
Saint Columban..... 274
Scotch-Irish in America, The..... 599
Set of Six, A..... 418
Severinus, St., The Life of..... 471
Sex 471
Scrap of Paper, A..... 346
Secret of Pocomoke, The..... 204
Secrets of the Elves, The..... 276
Sermons for the Children's Mass..... 395
Seven Champions of Christendom, The..... 127
Seven Years on the Pacific Slope..... 251
Shadow of Peter, The..... 75
Shipmates 128
Short Sermons on the Gospels..... 395
Simplicity 277
Sinister Street..... 348
Socialism, Anti-Christian..... 519
Society of the Sacred Heart..... 599
Soldier of the Legion, A..... 100
Son of Man, The..... 495
Songs of the Country-Side..... 421
Songs of the Outlands..... 420
Songs of Sixpence..... 75
Songs, Sonnets and Essays..... 421
Songs Toward the Sunlight..... 45
Spiritual Instructions for Religious..... 371
Spiritual Life, The..... 447
Standard Dictionary of the English Language, The Desk..... 448
Stations of the Cross for the Sick and Dying. 544
St. Claire of Assisi..... 518
Stories for Carmencita..... 629
Straight Path, The..... 542
Street of Seven Stars, The..... 76
Struggle for Scutari, The..... 174
Studies 372
Subterranean Brotherhood, The..... 449
Summa Theologica..... 419
Sunday Gospels Explained to Children..... 395
Sunny Side of Diplomatic Life, The..... 202
Swollen-Headed William..... 346
Sword Blades and Poppy Seed..... 653
The Dial..... 276
The East I Know..... 543
The Prussian Hath Said in His Heart..... 496
Thoughts of Many Minds on the Temperance Question 420
Through the Brazilian Wilderness..... 250
Through the Grand Canyon from Wyoming to Mexico..... 202
Through Siberia, the Land of the Future..... 275
Trees and Other Poems..... 98
"Truth About Germany," The Real..... 150
Turmoil, The..... 496
Uncle Remus and His Friends..... 152
Unfolding of the Little Flower, The..... 494
Universe and Mayonnaise, The..... 75
Unknown Guest, The..... 543
Upper Room, The—A Drama of Christ's Passion 346
Valiant Woman, The..... 520
Valley of Fear, The..... 572
Vatican, The..... 226
Vexilla Regis..... 252
Virtue of Bigotry, The..... 420
Vocations 420
Vocations for Girls..... 275
Wall of Partition, The..... 47
War Brides..... 571
War's Aftermath..... 324
War, N. Y. Times Current History of the.... 346
War Week by Week, The..... 346
Water Reptiles of the Past and Present..... 347
Webster, Daniel..... 45
Westminster Abbey..... 201
Westminster, Version of Sacred Scriptures... 471
What Do the Methodists Intend to Do?..... 420
What is Wrong with Germany?..... 571
What Think You of Christ?..... 252
Wisdom of Father Brown, The..... 395
Witch, The..... 128
Within My Parish..... 252
With Poor Immigrants to America..... 100
Woman's Misery and Woman's Aid..... 620
Women of the Classics..... 227
Wonderful Romance, The..... 204
World Almanac..... 497
World Crisis and the Way to Peace, The.... 628
World Missions of the Catholic Church, The. 174
Worst Boy in the School, The..... 100
Younger Generation, The..... 470
Your Pay Envelope..... 519
Yourself and Your Neighbor..... 151

COMMUNICATIONS

Alaska, The Purchase of..... 537
All Germans!..... 38
AMERICA: in Catholic Colleges, 592; and Neutrality 67
Anachronism, A Ludicrous, 512, 18; Anti-Catholicism 649
Anglican Retreats..... 268
Asia Minor, Missionaries in..... 220

PAGE

Bad Taste in Society Women..... 563
Belgian: Neutrality, The Violation of, 167; Orphans..... 143
Belgium, Catholic Dailies in..... 39
Bigotry, The Extent of..... 617
"Bishop of Royal Blood," A..... 487
Blackest of Lies, The..... 388
Carnegie's Testimony..... 464
Catholic: Children are Catholics, 562; Colleges, Why are They Preferred? 621; Daily, 266, 315, 316, 317, 389, 512, 536, 561; A Critic of the, 646; The Demand for a, 339, 340, 341; More about the, 365; The Proposed, 439, 440, 441; More Light on the, 465; Not Necessary, 413; Extension Society and Mexican Refugees, 193; Graveyards, 362; Initiative, 413; Leaders, 317; Press, 39; Press Association, 488, 561; University Professors, Dearth of, 220; Voters, 118; Weekly, Need of a, 267; Weeklies, 438; Women, Work for, 363; Interest, Questions of..... 512
Catholics in the Y. M. C. A., 589, 620..... 647
Chaplains in the Field..... 69
Chinese Students in America..... 364
Christ and Total Abstinence..... 66
Concerted Action..... 197
Conversation, A Help to..... 269
Converts, Literature for..... 621
Deadly "Perpendicular," The..... 315
Deadwood of Catholicism..... 38
Death, The Time of, 513..... 645
Delirious Gallomania..... 121
Dispassionate Readers..... 120
Do We Lack Leadership?..... 245
Editor in War Times, The..... 37
English Easter in the Seventeenth Century... 562
Examinations in England..... 513
Extent of Bigotry..... 563
Fair after All!..... 389
Fair Play for Austria and Prussia..... 563
Filling the Gap..... 119
France and Atheism..... 120
France's Religious Awakening..... 437
French Army and Navy Chaplains..... 219
Germany and Kant..... 120
Germany, Luther and Kant..... 221
Gothic Vestments, 489..... 593
Greek-Catholic Church Abolished by Russia... 117
Half Truth and Whole Truth..... 438
Help for Destitute Mexicans..... 589
Indifference is Impossible..... 119
International Almoner, The..... 37
Ireland's Attitude, Another View of..... 38
Is Mr. Lind a Moral Coward?..... 387
Italians: in the United States, 92; Religious Conditions of the..... 120
Italian Question, The 118, 144, 145, 168, 193, 194, 195, 196, 221, 243, 244..... 245
Italy, Religious Conditions in, 66..... 93
Jewish Encyclopedia, The..... 37
Leaders Wanted..... 269
Liberty or License?..... 487
Life, Open Letter to the Editor of..... 513
Life of St. Catherine of Genoa..... 511
Louvain: An Incident of the Capture of, 12; Memories of..... 68
Menace, How to Get Rid of the..... 13
Mexican Jesuits..... 464
Mexicans, Help for the..... 196
Mexico, 66, 119; The Outrages in, 145; Reparation for Outrages in..... 119
Midnight Mass for Peace..... 243
Munich, Catholic Men and Women of..... 38
Neutrality: A Danger in, 220; as to War News..... 13
Newman's Famous Libel Suit..... 564
Old-Time Catholic Editors, 388..... 464
Opera, A White List for the..... 93
Opinion of an Expert..... 197
Organized Catholic Artists..... 413
Other Side, The..... 219
Outlook's Correction, The, 645; Suggestion... 591
Pater a Catholic? Was..... 67
Persecuted Mexican Jesuits..... 412
Physician's Angel, The..... 591
Plays of Baneful Influence..... 341
Plays, A White List of..... 511
Political Catholics..... 437
Practical Suggestion, A..... 245
President's Ornithological Agent, The..... 364
Professional Studies, Requirements for..... 437
Pro-German "Reptile," A..... 168
Prohibition..... 619
Prominent Catholics..... 317
Protestants, Consideration for..... 621
Protestant Generosity, A Tribute to..... 268
Psychological Problem, A..... 13
Reading, A Course in..... 513
Regulating the "Foundations"..... 535
Religion of French Generals, The..... 317
Retreats, Missions, Socialism..... 65
Russian, The Metamorphosed..... 593
Russians and the Church..... 197
Saving the Children..... 439
Servia, Some Facts About..... 12
Social Reform, Workers for Real..... 93
Solution of an Important Question, One..... 92
Sorrows of Mexico, The..... 436
State: Support for Parochial Schools, 412; Support for Schools Undesirable..... 561 Stimulating Signs of the Times..... 268

PAGE

Temperance against Patriotism..... 565
War. A German View of the, 12; Help for the Victims..... 196
What Are We Teaching?..... 388
Whither Indeed?..... 616
Why We Lack Organization..... 438
Witches not Burned..... 565
Woman and Public Morality..... 69
Women and Public Activity..... 269
Wealthy Catholics and the Deadwood of Catholicism..... 64
Young Girls, An Appeal to..... 387

EDUCATION

Academic Freedom on Halsted Street..... 421
American Colleges, The Association of..... 449
Buying Opinions..... 545
Carnegie Foundation, The Latest Apologist for the..... 153
Church Music in the Schools..... 277
Content of the Youthful Mind..... 601
Current Events in Education, Recent..... 573
From Sixty to Six Hundred..... 629
Higher Perfection, A Model of..... 521
His Own Master..... 177
Immoral Morals..... 253
Is Johnny Overworked?..... 101
Little Things, The..... 473
Medical Schools and Their Critics..... 205
Olive Branch and the Catapult, The..... 349
Papal Document for Teachers, A..... 657
Protestant Arguments for Religious Education 397
Reconstruction, The Era of..... 21
Reign of the March Hare, The..... 373
Religion in the College, Putting..... 497
Reverence, A School for..... 49
Salvation by Knowledge..... 129
Studying the Child..... 77
Why Send Girls to School?..... 229

LITERATURE

Angel, A Fallen..... 625
Aquinas "Redivivus"..... 225
Balthasar Gracian..... 393
Benson, Robert Hugh..... 97
Catholic's Bookshelf, The..... 149
Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry, The: II. Alice Meynell, 43; III. Katherine Tynan-Hinkson, 124; IV. Louise Imogen Guiney, 200; V. The Voices Which Endure, 273; VI. The Coming Voices, 369; VII. To-morrow and To-day..... 445
Greek Schoolmaster Still Teaching, A..... 249
Ignorance of the Past, The..... 172
Literature's Debt to Pius X..... 416
Literature and Weather..... 541
Magic Carpet, A..... 569
Old Farmer's Almanack, The..... 321
Poetaster's Friend, The..... 652
Poetry and the People..... 517
Poetry of the War..... 468
Postern Gate of Happiness, The..... 72
Twenty "Don'ts" of Science..... 598
Twenty Historical "Don'ts"..... 493
Two Types of Apostolic Virtue..... 17

NOTE AND COMMENT

Advice for Parents..... 500
Alcoholic Stimulants, Opposition to..... 24
American Assistant for the Society of Jesus.. 524
American Peace Centenary Celebration, The. 352
Anglicans and Confession..... 52
Anglican "Stations"..... 80
Anti-Catholic Bills..... 548
Anti-Profanity League, The..... 207
Appropriations for Catholic Institutions in Massachusetts..... 631
Army Laws and the French Clergy..... 604
Atlantic Monthly and Catholicism, The..... 604
Beaconsfield's "Jesuit"..... 280
Belgian Benedictines Settle in Ireland..... 279
Belgians, The Catholic Spirit of the..... 207
Belgium, Changed Views of..... 180
Benson, Death of Monsignor..... 51
Biblical Inaccuracy in Periodicals..... 475
"Billy" Sunday's Methods..... 476
Bishop Williams and Sunday Schools..... 52
Boston Metaphysical Club, Thought Path of the..... 79
Brandts, Franz, Death of..... 156
Burke, Bishop, Death of..... 400
Caldey Monks, The..... 23
Calvinism Losing its Grip..... 660
Care of Drug Fiends..... 575
Catholic Alumnae, International Federation of 232
Catholic Alumnae Meeting in Baltimore..... 524
Catholic: "Big Brother" Movement, 180; Charities, Work of, 376; "Dissenters," 452; Heroism, A Modern Instance of, 208; Oratorio Society, 548; Parish Schools, The Standing of, 79; Press Vigilance Committee, 351; Sisters on the Battlefield, Bravery of the, 256; Social Workers Needed, 327; Statistics, The Difficulty of Collecting, 164; League of Women Undertake War Relief Work..... 155
Chance to Make $25,000, A..... 232
Changes the War Has Made..... 452
Child Labor Law Bill, A Campaign for the... 352
Christ, The Spirit of, In Modern Life..... 476
Chrysostom, Rev. Brother, Death of..... 500
Church and Divorce, The..... 604
City Marriage Bureau Black List, A..... 230
Classics, A Revival of the..... 207
Conrady, Rev. L. L., Death of..... 104
Constitutional Convention in New York, The. 604
Convent Inspection Bills..... 523
Convention of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society..... 328
Cortie's, Father, Successful Observations..... 23
Course, A Novel..... 52
Danbury Hatters' Dilemma, The..... 476
Deaf Mutes, Help for..... 400
Death Penalty, Abolishing the..... 351
Defamers of the Church, A Convincing Answer to..... 208
Deplanck, Mother, Death of..... 399
District Attorney, A Righteous..... 631
Doddering Scripture and Church History..... 179
Dowling, Death of Rev. Father..... 475
"Dry" Campaign, An Interesting..... 132
Education in England and Wales..... 424
Efficiency in the Kitchen..... 575
English Catholic Statistics..... 475
English Church Union, The..... 376
Era of the Great Sob, The..... 351
Exiled Belgians, A Paper for..... 179
Faith, The Propagation of the..... 131
Fathers and Sons..... 279
Federation of Catholic Alumnae..... 180
Fictitious Outrages..... 23
Foolish Laws, Too Many..... 131
"Freak" Laws..... 131
French Anti-clerical Skulkers..... 131
French Priests, A Libel on..... 604
"Foundation" Dole vs. Living Wage..... 576
Good Shepherd Sisters, A Lutheran Defender of..... 660
Governor Walsh, Lecture by..... 399
Growth of the Hierarchy in Eleven Years.... 328
Hasty and Improvident Marriages..... 231
Hearing all Sides..... 207
Homesickness among Prisoners of War..... 327
Homicides in the United States..... 132
Hurter, The Late Father von..... 400
Ignorance of Housewives and the High Cost of Living..... 280
"Impartial" War News..... 256
Impropriety of Modern Fashions..... 279
Intellectual Light not Moral Power..... 280
Intemperate Language of Prohibitionists..... 547
Irreligion and the Firing Line..... 660
Italian Immigrants, Seminary for Priests for. 500
Jesuit: Father General, Election of the New, 476; University at Tokyo, The, 424; Statistics..... 103
Jews and Irreligious Schools..... 179
John Burroughs and Chemistry..... 632
Justice, The Cost of..... 399
Knights of Columbus War on Religious Prejudice..... 376
Know-Nothingism, Repudiating..... 103
Lecturer, A Remarkable..... 51
Loe de, Mother, Death of..... 523
Longing for Light..... 604
Louvain, Leeds Sympathizes with, 79; University..... 155
Lowering the Medical Standards at Harvard. 476
Malicious Bigots, How to Silence..... 24
Malthusianism in America, Growth of..... 132
Martin, Rev. M., Death of..... 524
McKim, Rev. Dr., Idea of Press Censorship of..... 632
Medical Inspection of School Children..... 327
Menace, The: Publishers Indicted, 376; Rejecting the, 79; Verdict against..... 399
Methodist: Vagaries of Bishop Burt, 400; Missionary Disregard for the Eighth Commandment..... 500
Mexico, The Anarchy in..... 180
Minimum Wage, The, 103..... 375
Minnesota Minimum Wage Law Unconstitutional..... 256
Missions to Non-Catholics..... 659
Modern "Education"..... 424
Moral Lesson from the Weather, A..... 500
National: Child Labor Commission, The, 232; Employment Bureau..... 375
Newark's Parish Schools..... 475
New York Ozanam Society, Social Work of the..... 256
"Orthodox" Archbishop, A Wandering..... 604
Orthodox Russians in North America..... 103
Our Lady, National Shrine of..... 475
Palmer Labor Bill, The..... 500
Pastor Russell's "Ads"..... 523
Philosophy in Training Schools for Teachers. 351
Pittsburgh's Public Manifestation of Faith... 80
Political Quacks, Discarding..... 231
Pope and the War, The..... 327
Popular Delusion about the Middle Ages..... 328
Prayers for the Dead..... 452
Preaching the Gospel in France..... 399

	PAGE
Priest, A Brave	156
Priest and a Minister, A	51
Priests: on the Firing Line, 232; and Nuns on the Battlefields, Heroism of	207
Professional Uplifters	24
Prohibition: as a General Policy, 351 and Revenue	659
Proselyting Social Workers	208
Proposed National University, The	576
Protecting Vocal Rubbish by Law	280
Protestant: Alliance and Catholic Convents, 575; Episcopal Retreats, 156; Missionary Calumnies in the Philippines	632
Protests against the Slanderers of the Church	576
Public School Teachers' Labor Union	156
Religious to Secular Education, The Movement to Add	352
Punch and Army Orders	547
Real Christian Charity, The, 548; Religious Education	452
Reformation, The Glory of the	660
Religious: Services at a University, 51; An Appeal for Teaching, 51; Tolerance and Religious Indifference	500
Retreats for Laymen	523
Rhyme of All Saints, An Episcopal	132
Rosary for the Souls in Purgatory	207
Sex Hygiene in the Schools	351
Singular Service, A	328
Road to Success, The	548
Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth	524
Smith, S.J., Rev. James, Death of	660
Social Pathology in the Public Schools	104
Sororities and Fraternities in Chicago High Schools	155
Sparing the Rod	80
Strange Contentions in Anglican Fields	424
Stuart, Death of Mother Janet Erskine	80
Sunday Programmes	132
Supreme Court: and Open Shops, 475; and the Oregon Labor Law	547
Teaching, Old-Fashioned Methods of	208
Temperance and Total Abstinence	475
Training Girls for Home-making	424
True Social Service	499
Underfed Children in Public Schools	279
United Christianity Can End the War	632
Unprofitable Advocate, An	523
Varieties of High Church Belief	576
War Prayer of Cardinal Newman	547
Working Women and Marriage	575
World's Purity League, Methods of the	156

SOCIOLOGY

	PAGE
Child Labor and Legislation	374
Convict J 3217	22
Dilettanti Doctors	278
Divine Test, The	50
Doing God's Work	602
"Don't" for Sociological Workers, A	178
Drifting	546
Father Brown's Stick	450
Federal Law on Habit-forming Drugs, The New	498
Grim Fairy Tale, A	630
"Jim"	78
"Kid Brother," Your	658
Law and Lazarus, The	102
Not Divine Enough	254
Open Fireplace, The	422
Philanthropy, The Modern School of	130
Playing With Fire at Hull House	473
Samaritan, The Bad	154
Sisters of the Good Shepherd, The	398
Social Legislation and Juvenile Delinquency	230
Tuberculosis, Divorce and Eugenics	350
Widows, State Pensions for	522
Window Breakers	326
Woman's Place	574

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 1 } WHOLE No. 288 } OCTOBER 17, 1914 { $3.00 A YEAR PRICE 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Oct. 6, p. m.-Oct. 13, a. m. —Belgian's Defeat—Fall of Antwerp—Its Effects —Northern France—Russian Operations—Other Items of Interest. France: Death of a Catholic Champion—The French Government and Religion. Germany: Prisoners of War — The Clergy and the War. Ireland: The Volunteers and Mr. Redmond. Mexico: Decree of Toluca. Rome: Death of a Great Cardinal.....1-4

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Teaching—Religious Conditions in Italy—Building Roads—Failure of International Socialism—The Religion of Masonry —England in War Time.....5-12

COMMUNICATIONS

A German View of the War—An Incident of the Capture of Louvain—Some Facts About Servia—Neutrality as to War News—A Psychological Problem—How to Get Rid of the Menace 12, 13

EDITORIALS

Yale and Prayer—American Witnesses of Mexican Horrors—Who Owns You?—A Catholic and a Gentleman—A Letter, Some Remarks, A Solution—Nobody Cares.....16, 17

LITERATURE

Two Types of Apostolic Virtue.

REVIEWS: Ontology—Poems—Breviarium Romanum —Romanism in the Light of History—Im Ringen der Zeit — Luxus und Verantwortlichkeit — The Poet.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Knights of Columbus Edition of the "Catholic Encyclopedia" — Monsignor Villarosa—Outside the Walls—Lives of English Martyrs—Our Boys—Hilaire Belloc the Worker —Oddsfish.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....17-21

EDUCATION

The Era of Reconstruction.....21, 22

SOCIOLOGY

Convict J 3217.....22, 23

NOTE AND COMMENT

Father Cortie's Successful Observations—Fictitious "Outrages"—The Caldey Monks—Opposition to Alcoholic Stimulants — Professional "Uplifters"—How to Silence Malicious Bigots. 23, 24

CHRONICLE

The War.—The principal interest of last week's fighting centred on the dying struggle of heroic Belgium. Her courage was undaunted to the end, but her final resistance found her hopelessly outnumbered. Her army, or the remnant of it, was able to make good its escape from the ruined and burning city of Antwerp, and is said to have arrived at Ostend, resolved to block the progress of the Germans as long as there remains a man to put in the field. She has gone down to utter defeat in glory, and even her enemies yield to her their tribute of admiration. Even as it is she is still holding out in a number of the forts. She has ceased, however to be an important factor in the war. Anything like serious cooperation with the Allies is now an impossibility as far as she is concerned, but she has not yet paid the full price of her refusal to allow Germany to march through her territory. Liége, Namur, Louvain, Termonde, Malines, have been destroyed, but the end is not yet. Ostend, Ghent, Brussels and Bruges still remain. Most of her people are refugees, and the whole country is in desolation.

Bulletin, Oct. 6, p.m.—Oct. 13, a.m.

Belgian's Defeat

The fall of Antwerp came with surprising rapidity. The operations which reduced it to the necessity of surrender lasted just ten days. On September 29, according to the reports of the German staff, the siege proper began, although remote preparations in the form of the capture of towns included in the general plan, began long before. Antwerp was very strongly fortified with three lines of defences, made up of great forts and redoubts, besides other defences recently constructed by the Belgians in anticipation of the siege. The rivers Nethe and Scheldt offered a further bar to the Germans. Great carnage on both sides marked the German progress, as the Belgians disputed every step of the way and the Germans hesitated at no sacrifice in order to accomplish their object. What contributed most to the victory was the deadly fire of the heavy German guns. The fall of the city was inevitable, even the Belgians foresaw this, unless reenforcements were received in numbers large enough to beat off the besiegers. The reenforcements, however, did not come. The flag was hauled down on Friday, October 9, from the Cathedral spire, and the last and strongest of the Belgian fortresses is now in the hands of the Germans. King Albert is reported to have been constantly in the field, and to have left the city among the very last.

Fall of Antwerp

What advantage precisely Germany had in view in their attack on Antwerp is not certain. One thing, however, is clear. A very large body of German troops, composed, it is claimed, of upward of 400,000 men, who have been hitherto operating in Belgium, are now free to be used in either of the two principal theatres of the war. The morale of the entire German fighting force must have been greatly improved by the victory; and a new and strong base of operations has been created. Antwerp has become a standing menace to England. It is true that the neutral waters of the Scheldt River preclude the possibility of utilizing it as a naval station, but the fact that it is not more than 100 miles distant from the English coast, brings British possessions, which have so far been immune, within easy striking distance of the German airships. It is no wonder that London's anxiety has greatly increased, especially as it is reported that the Germans are already making for Ostend and Calais.

Its Effects

The campaign in Northern France has undergone no important change. The Germans have been making desperate efforts to break through the left wing of the Allies, but have nowhere succeeded.

Northern France

The principal points of attack have been Lassigny, Roye, Arras and Lille. There have been gains and losses on both sides at all these places, but the results of the week's fighting have left the situation very nearly what it was eight days ago. The Allies have pushed forward to the north in large numbers as far as Cassel, which is within twenty miles of the coast. All about Lille there have been numerous engagements between the French and German cavalry, but with little effect except that the Germans have been prevented from blocking the progress of the Anglo-French army toward Belgium. Indeed, it is reported that the extreme French left has already crossed the Belgian border. On the other hand, General Joffré failed to push forward in time to cooperate with the Belgian and British forces at Antwerp, and the German right wing is no longer in danger. It looks now as though the line of battle, which is already 350 miles in length, would be steadily extended until it reaches the coast, probably at a point beyond Ostend, and that both sides would settle down in the trenches for the winter. The heavy guns used in the bombardment of Antwerp are said to be on the way to the army of the Crown Prince, and it is expected that they will soon be employed for a more vigorous attack on the Verdun-Toul barrier.

With regard to the Russian campaign, it seems fairly certain that Austria is more than holding her own. In her dispatches she claims that she has driven back the invaders and has recaptured Rzeszow.

Russian Operations

Przemysl, according to Austrian dispatches, has been relieved, and the besieging army driven across the San. Russia, which has been so active in chronicling her advance in Galicia, has contented herself with declaring that recent events have compelled her somewhat to modify her original plans, otherwise she has maintained complete silence as to the movements of her left wing. In Northern Poland there is still fighting of a very serious character along the East Prussian border. It is reported that the Germans are still engaging the Russians in Suwalki, but have been obliged to fall back to Thorn and beyond Lyck. There is little news of what is going on at the centre of the long line of battle to the west of Warsaw. Contradictory reports confuse the situation in Hungary. Russia claims that the invasion is proceeding satisfactorily; Austria asserts that she has successfully checked the Cossacks in the passes of the Carpathians. The Servians and Montenegrins have made no real progress in Bosnia, and the bombardment of Belgrade still continues. The deadly German submarines have sent another warship to the bottom. This time it was the Russian cruiser Pallada. They met in the Baltic sea, two Russian ships opened a heavy fire, but a torpedo soon sent the cruiser to the bottom.

Holland is being overwhelmed by Belgian refugees, and is doing her best to provide them with hospitality, a thing which has been made more difficult by the impoverishment due to the cutting off of most of her foreign trade. She is confident that her neutrality will be respected, and has no intention of entering the war.

Other Items of Interest

Japan and China have come to an agreement about the Shantung railroad. Japan has temporarily assumed control; and the ownership which China claims to be vested in herself and not in Germany, is to be decided at the close of the war. The Japanese fleet continues to seize German territory. Jaluit, the German island on the Marshall archipelago, which lies midway between Hawaii and the Philippines, and Yap, the largest of the Caroline group of islands, which are situated to the east of the Philippines, have both been occupied. The operations in the vicinity of Kiao-Chow are progressing slowly. Japan has, it is reported, mounted guns on Prince Henry Mountain which overlooks all three forts at Tsing-Tao. If this be true, a regular and destructive bombardment should now be in progress. In other respects the situation in the far east is unchanged. Bulgaria, while still maintaining her army on a war footing, has declared for neutrality, without, however, having been able to allay Russia's suspicion that she favors Austria. Portugal, although she has not yet joined the conflict is constantly reported to be on the point of doing so. A propaganda similar to that which has been carried on in Portugal apparently with success, has failed in Spain, which has declared that she will not enter the war. The war cloud that has been hovering over Roumania has grown blacker as the result of King Charles' death. The late King as is well known threw all his influence against the war party. He would have preferred to help Germany, but his people were bent on attacking Austria. Failing in his desire to help the Hohenzollerns he worked for peace. King Ferdinand, his successor, is not expected to be able, even if he so desires, to keep his country from joining fortunes with Russia. Relations between Russia and Turkey are still very strained. Constantinople fears that Russia will overrun Asia Minor. Apparently Turkey would like to attack Greece, but is afraid to do so, owing to her failure sufficiently to enlarge her fleet and also to her anxiety about the intentions of Russia. The Italian attitude toward the war has been further complicated by two events of serious importance. Two men who worked to keep Italy out of the war have ceased to exert their influence: the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Marquis di San Guilano is dying, and the Minister of War has resigned.

France.—By the death of the Comte Albert de Mun, Academician, and leader of the Conservatives in the Chamber of Deputies, the Church in France has lost one of her greatest sons. A man of splendid intellect, brilliant attainments, and simple faith, in Comte de

Death of a Catholic Champion

Mun were realized the finest traditions of old Catholic France. Against the ignoble crowd of politicians whose highest constructive efforts during the last decade have manifested themselves in a war against Christianity, the Comte stood out like a paladin of old, in the defence of justice and true political reform. Comte de Mun was the author of several works on social and patriotic themes, and for years generously devoted his time, and his splendid abilities, to the foundation and maintenance of societies for French workingmen. The great services of this modern Knight of the Cross will never be forgotten.

If the French people are on their knees in prayer, the atheistic Government of their country still retains its attitude of hostility to Christianity. While the Government has graciously consented to the presence of chaplains in the army and navy, it obstinately refuses them all official recognition, as well as the slender stipend granted by most civilized governments for the support of the representatives of religion. The French press regrets that the action of President Wilson in asking prayers for peace will not be imitated by the Government of a Catholic people. "The American Republic," says the Gaulois, "is not ashamed to kneel before the Most High. May our own Republic soon follow the example of the United States, and not fear to show its faith and confidence in God!"

The French Government and Religion

Germany.—A problem for Germany will be the employment of her prisoners of war. According to an official statement issued by the German Ministry of War on September 11, and published in the German press, the number of prisoners in Germany at that time amounted to roundly 220,000, among them 18 generals. By September 24, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Berlin, it had risen to 240,000, and may now exceed a quarter of a million. But little manual labor has hitherto been assigned to them. It is thought that hereafter they will be employed in the building of roads and the reclaiming of marsh land. An exchange of prisoners will, of course, likewise take place.

Prisoners of War

German Catholics demanded the evidence for the accusations which had been made against the Belgian clergy in connection with the events in Louvain that brought about the destruction of a considerable portion of the city. Such evidence was not forthcoming; instead it was found that the clergy had made great efforts to prevent the shooting. The religious Orders in particular are praised by the German soldiers, and the fact that religious houses have suffered little or no harm shows that they had excited no suspicion. The Jesuit college in Louvain is likewise intact. It is acknowledged that Belgian priests have done heroic service in tending to the wounded German soldiers in the hospitals. German military officials in Belgium have strictly forbidden the further publication of such calumnies. The German Catholic clergy have received the Emperor's testimony that his trust in them is founded "firmly as the hills." Cardinal von Bettinger recently issued a protest against the wide-spread reports about atrocities against priests, remarking that a large proportion of the German army consists of Catholics, implying at the very least that the atrocities were exaggerated.

The Clergy and the War

Ireland.—The original Provisional Committee of the Irish Volunteers issued a manifesto declaring that the nominees Mr. Redmond imposed on it are dismissed from its membership, and summoning a Convention for November 24 to elect a permanent governing body. The reason assigned is that Mr. Redmond had declared it the duty of the Volunteers to take foreign service, which is contrary to their accepted aims and pledges, as they were enlisted for national defence in Ireland only, a condition on which Messrs. Redmond and Devlin had previously insisted. Mr. Redmond replied by organizing the rejected nominees into a governing committee and also calling a convention. Colonel Moore accepted appointment as Inspector General in the new organization on the understanding that foreign service shall be not a duty but a choice. It is not yet clear which body has the largest support, but recruiting is not popular. Its advocates seem to be chiefly those who are not eligible for service. Cardinal Logue was quoted in its favor and also as violently anti-German; he repudiated the interview, saying, he had merely spoken in sympathy with Belgium, and against the destruction of Louvain and the Reims Cathedral. As to Home Rule he said: "I don't trust your politicians in England very much. They have an amending bill to bring in. What that will be I don't know."

The Volunteers and Mr. Redmond

Mexico.—Indubitable information with regard to the relentless warfare that is being waged on the Church in Mexico is being put on record by archbishops, bishops, priests, and lay people. In Orizaba all the churches have been closed except one, in which, however, Mass is not allowed to be said; the priests, without exception, have been banished. In Puebla all the canons are under sentence of banishment, many confessionals have been burned; on the confessionals of the cathedral were painted Masonic signs. The cathedral itself was converted into a hall. A ball was given in the chapel of the Jesuit College and a naked woman was put on the altar in place of the statue of Our Lord. The house of the archbishop was changed into a barracks. In Mexico City, Carranza appointed Father Vandes vicar-general. More than thirty priests are in prison, and one priest was publicly beaten. All the bishops are being persecuted, or have already been banished or put in prison. In the whole of Toluca and the surrounding districts there is not a single priest. The state of affairs may be judged from the following decree:

DECREE OF TOLUCA.

This Decree is in force in the City of Toluca, Capital of the State of Mexico.

Conditions under which Catholic worship is allowed in Mexico:

(1) It is forbidden to preach, as has been done until now, exciting people to fanaticism. (2) Fasting and all penances are forbidden. (3) All kinds of revenues, such as offerings for baptisms, marriages, etc., and any other alms to the clergy or to the Catholic Church are forbidden. (4) Requiem Masses are entirely forbidden. (5) Two Masses only are allowed on Sunday; but it is not allowed to ring the bell to call the people. (6) Confessions are absolutely forbidden, either inside or outside the churches, and any priest who hears a Confession is liable not only to banishment, but also to capital punishment. Churches may be open on Sunday morning only. (7) Only one priest (designated by the Governor of the State) is allowed to say Mass on Sunday in Toluca City, and he must not live near the church but in some private house. (8) This priest must wear the same attire as an ordinary civilian; he may not wear even the Roman collar or anything that will denote that he is a priest. (9) This priest is to be the oldest priest in the town, even though he should have been retired on account of old age. He may select only one fixed church in which to say Mass on Sunday, and this must have the approval of the Governor. (10) All are forbidden to salute any of the men who formerly were priests, or even the sole priest allowed in the town, by kissing the hand, a custom which has been observed up to the present time. (11) With the exception of the one Mass allowed on Sunday, all ceremonies, services such as baptisms, services for the dead, blessing of the grave, etc., are entirely forbidden. The priest appointed by the Governor must sign a statement attesting his obedience to the civil authorities in Church affairs.

The following letter, sent to the Secretary of State, speaks for itself. It will be noted that it is the letter of a non-Catholic:

To his Excellency, Hon. W. J. BRYAN,

SIR:—On July 22 last, I had the honor of addressing your Excellency on the subject of the persecution of the Catholics in Mexico, as practised by the revolutionary parties now in power in that country. The Third Assistant Secretary of State, under date of July 24, acknowledged receipt of my letter. Since then I have made the acquaintance of Rev. R. H. Tierney, Editor of the Catholic paper AMERICA, published in New York City, who writes me that he visited your Excellency concerning this subject, and that you wished to hear me on the same matter. I have thought well, therefore, to note down for your Excellency's convenience the principal points, and I wish to say that I have written down nothing that I am not fully aware of and can personally vouch for. I have lived in Mexico twenty-three years, am a German by birth, by religion a Lutheran, and am sixty years of age.

(1) I know of Catholic clergymen who, under pain of death, were made to sweep the streets of a city and do menial work for common, illiterate soldiers. (2) Of a bishop, seventy years old, deported to the penal colony on the Pacific coast. (3) Of a parish priest, eighty years old, so tortured that he lost his mind. (4) Of several priests in the Monterey Penitentiary as late as August 30 last. (5) Of many deported to Texas, both foreigners and Mexicans. (6) Of priests and teachers tortured by hanging and strangling. (7) Of a priest in hiding who was enticed out to hear a confession and instead was thrown into a dungeon. (8) Of forty Sisters of . . . who have been violated, of which number four are known to me, and one of these four has become demented. (9) I have been instrumental in saving six Sisters and seven girl pupils from the same fate. (10) Of an Englishman, who tried to save the personal effects of these thirteen women, being fined $2,000 for the attempt. (11) Of all the confessionals of the Monterey churches being piled in a public square and burned. (12) Of valuable paintings stolen from churches, and supposedly brought to the United States by filibusters. (13) Of Constitutionalist soldiers, led by a man who is now Governor of a State of Mexico, doing on the altar what decency does not permit me to say. (14) . . . [too vile to print.—The Editor.] (15) Of decrees published by the present Governors of States, prohibiting the practice of religion and closing the churches, convents and schools.

I am respectfully your humble servant,

MARTIN STECKER.

General Maytorena, the commander of the Villistas at Naco, has been vigorously attacking the town, alleging that General Hill, the commander of the Carranzistas, has violated the armistice. The town is still holding out. General Villa himself is refraining from hostilities and apparently intends to do so until after the close of the peace conference at Aguascalientes. The delegates have not yet met. Villa persists in his demand that Carranza should resign. Carranza, on the other hand, is now resolved not to do so. There seems to be little likelihood of an understanding being reached. Steps, however, are being taken, so it is reported, to set up a government at Mexico City, despite Villa's protest. The withdrawal of the American forces from Vera Cruz has been indefinitely postponed, according to the statement of Secretary Daniels, owing to the unsatisfactory state of Mexican affairs. The United States Government has signified its intention of maintaining a strictly neutral attitude toward both factions. De la Barra, the Mexican Ambassador at Bordeaux, has stated that he does not understand his country's recent declaration to mean that the loans negotiated by previous governments will be repudiated.

Death of a Great Cardinal

Rome.—After a short illness Cardinal Ferrata, the newly created Secretary of State, died in Rome on October 10. The deceased prelate had a most distinguished career, fruitful in great work for the Church. To learning and zeal he united such wonderful tact that he was regarded as a most able diplomat. It was he who smoothed over difficulties in Switzerland and Belgium, that at one time threatened to cripple the Church. He was Nuncio at Paris during a most critical period and conducted himself with so much dignity and honesty of purpose that the crisis which later became inevitable, was postponed many years. In Rome itself his activity was little short of marvelous. He held positions of trust on many Congregations and was tireless in his efforts to promote every good cause. Pope Benedict XV appointed the dead Cardinal, Secretary of State, a little over a month ago. His demise at the comparatively early age of sixty-seven is a great blow to the Pontiff and the whole Church.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Teaching*

Teaching as a profession has never strongly attracted young men, and few deliberately select it. It has been, and to some extent it still is, a stepping-stone to some other line of endeavor. Sometimes it offers the means of continuing studies or of support while the young man is establishing himself in law, medicine or business. But there are advantages in the career of teaching which should make it attractive to those who are not too much dazzled by dreams of wealth and power.

Teaching has the advantage over other occupations in offering to the beginner a salary sufficient to cover his immediate needs, with a promise of increase as he gains experience. The long vacations, with the comparatively short hours of prescribed active service, hold out the prospect of leisure for study to those who enjoy intellectual work, and of recreation to those whose zest for athletic sports has not lost its keenness. There are prizes to be won, even though they are small in comparison with what may be gained in other occupations after efforts or sacrifices no more arduous than those of the conscientious and able teacher. There is the realizable opportunity of advancement to higher position. In many places, a pension is available when old age or illness brings incapacitation. Another advantage attached to teaching is that its exercise does not impair growth that may be useful in other professions, so that if the young man finds some other outlet for his genius or predilection, he is but slightly hindered and greatly benefitted by the time he has spent in the classroom. Success in teaching brings with it attainments of value in other directions. The power of concentration, the personality which is of such moment in teaching, the ability to look at matters from the standpoint of others, the moral attributes which the successful teacher is expected to possess, all have a wide application to affairs of the active world. A census of successful business or professional men would reveal a great number who laid in teaching the foundations of their success.

In determining to become a teacher the young man should not make the foregoing considerations the deciding ones. If he seeks temporary employment, there are other fields in which his efforts may be utilized without the possibility of harm that comes to pupils taught by a person whose sole object is to earn a little money. Teaching is more than an occupation; it is a calling. It demands peculiar qualities of heart, mind and temperament. St. Jean Baptiste de la Salle defined the twelve virtues of a good master, and his category, as well as his definitives, can scarcely be amended to-day. He has in mind more particularly the elementary teacher, but the high-school teacher or the college professor would be a rarely perfect being who could not study the virtues with profit.

No person should become a teacher who does not love teaching, who does not fully sympathize with those he engages to teach, who does not know the subject-matter which he is to teach, or at least is not willing to learn it before trying to teach it, who does not purpose to prepare fully and carefully what he is to teach, and who is not inspired with the ideal of benefiting his pupils. To fail in these respects is not only dishonest, and unworthy of the teacher, but it places on him the responsibility for the effect of his omissions on the character of his pupils. The lazy teacher is a poor teacher, and the bad teacher is more than the bad man.

The young man who feels that his vocation is in the classroom should set about diligently to prepare himself. In some of our large cities teaching can not be taken up without due preparation. Such preparation is now offered by most colleges in courses more or less extensive, covering work during the senior and junior years. In preparing to teach, the young man should be guided by the kind of teaching in which he expects to engage. The elementary teacher concerns himself with the foundations of all studies, and with minds of the least maturity. The studies are the three R's, with such additions as social conditions have demanded. Simple as the studies may appear, to teach them requires careful preparation. The high-school teacher requires greater scholarship as to subject-matter, as his work is to a greater or less extent that of the specialist. The college instructor ought to have made special studies in advance of the high-school teacher. In our large cities, the salaries often attract to the high schools men of the scholarship of college professors, or college professors themselves, and to the elementary schools men competent to render satisfactory service in high schools. When these men are able to temper their instruction to the ability of their students, their scholarship and culture are not without a salutary effect on the students.

The number of young men in the elementary schools employed as teachers is becoming less every year. Women are employed not only because men are not greatly attracted by the salaries, but because, as a rule, women prepare their work better and are not so impatient of promotion. In high schools the number of men teachers is growing proportionately less by slower degrees, but there still is a wide field open to men of scholarship and teaching ability. In most colleges, where high-school teachers are not appointed directly to professorships, the novice begins as tutor, and if successful gradually advances to a professorship through the positions of instructor and assistant professor. In large high schools there is a corresponding progress from novice to teacher-in-charge or principal.

The opportunity for advancement constitutes an important factor in entering a profession or remaining in it. The elementary teacher has open to him, according to certain tests of ability and experience, promotion to principalships or superintendencies. It is unfortunate that here and there politics still intrude, and perhaps it is still more unfortunate that the influence of bigotry is by no means quiet. But even where these prevail, it is not impossible for the able teacher to secure adequate recognition. The large cities are generally freer from religious and political prejudice than the smaller ones. Sometimes promotions are denied to persons in the system, and these have to seek advancement elsewhere.

*The seventeenth of a series of vocational articles.

Superintendencies, principalships, and professorships are the prizes of the profession. They do not compare favorably with the prizes in other professions for no greater relative ability or experience. But the teacher who begins his career with the idea of becoming wealthy is doomed to grievous disappointment. The rewards of the teacher, even of him who has attained the highest rank, are seldom material. He may be able to save a little money and to invest it profitably, or he may happen to write a successful book; but for the great number of teachers, the greatest hope must be that of modest comfort, just escaping penury.

It would be unjust and untrue to have it appear that the time spent by many men in teaching has been to the detriment of their pupils. Temporary service in the classroom does not merit condemnation. The tenure in many places is uncertain, and teachers have the responsibilities of other men. If they engage in new lines of employment before they become too old to be adaptable, they are not to be blamed. Many men who have left their impress on the affairs of the world have spent their day in the classroom, and to the advantage of their pupils. Their ambition for a career outside the classroom has not stood in the way of devotion to their present occupation, nor of the careful preparation for the conscientious discharge of their duty which successful teaching demands.

But the young man who takes up teaching with the view to making it a stepping-stone to some other activity, has a trying and difficult task ahead of him. Many successful lawyers and physicians have taught school successfully while studying for their profession. But severe study and close application are demanded by law and medicine, and it happens that where the demands of professional study are greatest, there also the greatest demands are made on the teacher. Not only is the actual work of teaching very exhausting, but the conditions attending teaching in our large cities are growing increasingly difficult. It thus becomes very hard for the young teacher to divide his attention between his class and other interests. To attempt to study for a profession while teaching usually means that the teaching will be unsatisfactory or the study unprofitable, or both. If teaching is to be used as a stepping-stone, the young man should devote himself to teaching exclusively until he has accumulated sufficient means to enable him to devote himself entirely to preparation for his chosen profession.

Teaching begun as a temporary employment not infrequently develops a love for the work and reveals to the young man his true vocation. He may not have chosen deliberately to become a teacher, and he may only have accepted the opportunity to teach in the hope that after a time he would be able either to take up a chosen profession or to discover some other occupation which might appear more congenial. He may not even have made any adequate preparation for the work of teaching. But he had the habit of doing well whatever he undertook. What was lacking in pedagogical equipment was supplied by youthful enthusiasm, knowledge of subject-matter, ability of presentation, power of control and influence, and that sympathy with young minds which leads to an understanding of them. Perhaps he has reaped success and gained promotion. He has won the respect of his community, and honors and responsibilities have come to him. He has gradually come to be regarded as a leader in his profession, for he has made up his deficiencies of professional training, and his studies have been all the more comprehensive and satisfying, because they had the substantial background of experience. The material return for his labor is, perhaps, too important to be sacrificed even to enter the more lucrative field that may have dazzled his early imagination, were he even tempted to abandon the calling on which he had entered without deliberate choice. And so he goes on, putting away his early ambitions, satisfied in his labor, enjoying his success, and realizing that his true vocation came to him in a guise scarcely recognizable, but found him not unprepared.

JOHN H. HAAREN,
Associate City Superintendent of Schools,
The City of New York.

Religious Conditions in Italy

The strained political relations between the Italian Government and the Holy See, the neglect of their religious duties by a number of the Italian immigrants to the United States, and the abuses of a few ultra-radical Italian papers, make people in this country believe that religion in Italy is going from bad to worse, and that there are there only a few really good Catholics. This, however, is an altogether false idea. Religious conditions in Italy are infinitely better than many people are inclined to think, misled, as they are, by deceitful appearances or misinformed by a prejudiced and ill-intentioned press. For many and peculiar reasons Italy's attitude with regard to the Holy Father is not an index of the religion of its people, nor do the accounts published about Italy's religious conditions, especially in non-Catholic papers, do justice to the truth.

The Catholic spirit is keenly alive to-day among the Italian people; it hovers over you wherever you go; it is felt in their feasts and in their mournings, in their public joys and public calamities; it asserts itself in their homes. The spotless purity of the Italian home life is due, without doubt, to the strong influence of the Catholic Church. Even people whose conduct is not altogether edifying can not avoid feeling that beneficial influence, and often must give in and comply with its requirements. Persons who have lived in Italy for some time, as we have, bear witness to this fact, and even mere travelers can not fail to notice it. But this is not all. The Italians do not content themselves with what we might call acting unconsciously under the influence of the Catholic spirit; they go farther; they practise their religion. Of course, it is not our intention to state that all the 33,000,000 Catholics of whom Italy can boast are church-going Catholics. No; there is to be found among them, as among all large bodies of men, many a black sheep; still we can, and do, affirm that the majority, the bulk of the Italian people, are good, practical Catholics.

We will not prove our assertion by pointing to the large number of dioceses in Italy, a number unequaled the world over, nor to the many flourishing social and political organizations that glory in the open profession of their faith, nor to the thousands and thousands of churches—rather we simply invite our readers to glance at the numberless sodalities spread all over Italy, with the sole purpose of furthering Christian piety and perfection, to consider the well-attended and well-taught Sunday schools, the very large number of priests and religious busy in zealous works for the spiritual welfare of the people. We invite our readers to look at the large crowds of the faithful frequenting the churches at all hours, filled with simple yet strong piety and trust in God. A public joy gladdens the hearts of the people, and behold! churches and shrines are decorated. A public sorrow spreads its gloom over cities and villages, and the churches become the refuge of the people, and God and His Blessed Mother are audibly invoked with great faith and earnestness. In 1906, while ashes and lapilli darkened the sky of Southern Italy and a descending torrent of lava was cleaving a broad pathway of death, then it was that the people's hearts turned to God and implored mercy. Along the slopes of Mount Vesuvius, while the lava was destroying all that many a poor peasant had in this world, no blasphemies were uttered, but a humble prayer, a simple yet sublime act of conformity to God's holy will: "Signore," repeated the poor, afflicted peasants, voi ci deste questi beni, voi ce li togliete: sia il vostro nome benedetto!

It is not necessary to travel all over Italy in order to see that the Italians are calumniated when it is said of them that they do not comply with their religious duties. Let us take one province, nay, one city, and a city, moreover, that is not infrequently rumored to contain within its walls rather a pleasure-loving than a God-loving population, namely, Naples. In Naples there are at least four hundred churches, in which a number of Masses are said through the hours and half hours of Sunday morning. As a matter of fact, in many of the churches, there is Mass from 5 or 6 o'clock to noon, or even 1 o'clock. Immense crowds of people attend these Masses. Surely, this is proof that the Italians practise their religion. We say the Italians, and not the Neapolitans, because what is true of Naples, is true almost, without exception, of every town and hamlet dalle Alpi alla Sicilia.

If, in addition to this, we take account of the many retreats and missions, the attendance at which often overtaxes the capacity of the very largest churches, the devout and numerous pilgrimages, the display of profound piety during Lent and the months of May and June, when in many churches no day passes without a sermon to huge throngs, as we ourselves have witnessed, if, we say, we take account of these things, there will be bred within us the sincere conviction that faith is not dead nor dormant, but emphatically active and living, blossoming and bearing fruit throughout all the length and breadth of Italy.

If Italy's children showed no other proof of their deep religious feeling than their love for the Madonna, a love childlike yet strong, which makes them treat her as their dearest Mother, a love that knows no bounds and makes them hope to obtain all heavenly favors through her, a love that adorns her numberless shrines throughout the land, and has turned the desolate Valley of Pompeii into a valley of Paradise, that makes Mary the most revered and loved of all names—this alone would be proof of the strength of their religion, and would be more than sufficient to show that they still keep enshrined in their hearts the faith preached in their country by the Prince of the Apostles, sealed by the blood of thousands and thousands of their forefathers, tenderly reflected in their art and letters.

Joseph M. Sorrentino, S.J.

Building Roads

The Catholic Church has a great social message for the United States. But that message is yet unheeded by a vast multitude. In fact, astonishingly few outside the Church have any idea of what her teaching contains. Protestants and atheists look on the Church as a solid rock; but to them it is not a rock of strength. It is a rock of obstruction.

We must try to remember their view is not surprising. Our first effort to deliver our message should be to put ourselves in the places of those who despise or fear us. Only by doing this can we expect to give them the answers they look for and correct the somewhat extraordinary ideas they have of us.

It is my good fortune to know a very talented Catholic authoress, who happens also to be a convert. She was, of course, brought up in a strictly Protestant environment. Her education was distinctly Protestant, not what is now miscalled "non-sectarian," and the books of history and literature put in her hands were invariably stuffed from cover to cover with the old and familiar lies against the Church and the Papacy. Only the accidental associations of her later life gave her the chance to see things as they were. Two lessons this lady has taught me. One is to be lenient with those who seem to cherish lies maliciously against the Church; the other is to be very careful in all arguments with non-Catholics to find out first of all what they think we believe.

We must be ready to give our opponents credit for sincerity. If we called all who disagree with us bigots, we should only be proving ourselves still greater bigots. My convert friend was quite sincere as a girl in thinking the Pope Anti-Christ. The "History of England" she was given to read had pictures of the Pope with this title underneath. Like all normal children, she accepted the printed word unquestioningly. Those early impressions were deep and very nearly enduring.

If we remember that our opponents are sincere, we shall be far less likely to commit that great diplomatic error of losing our tempers. We shall also become more sincere ourselves in our efforts to set forth our own side, for we shall begin to think our task more pleasing and worth while. It is no easier to explain your views to a person you think mentally deaf than to carry on a conversation with a person you know to be physically deaf. The charm of intelligent discussion is ease, and you are only at ease when you talk to some one you respect. And after learning to respect our adversaries, we must find out exactly what they think we believe.

For example, a non-Catholic asks you: "Do you honestly and firmly believe in the Papal infallibility?" You reply that you do, whereupon your questioner immediately loses all respect for your mentality and starts to argue as if you were a fool and not a rational being. Why? Simply because he thinks that by Papal infallibility you mean that the Pope would, let us say, be infallible should he make a pronouncement on the causes of the Great War.

Only a few days ago I talked with a workingman who was a fairly constant reader of the Menace. Quite naturally he had little love for "Romanism." He had expressed most of his stock views before I told him I was a "Romanist" myself. Being a good, straightforward man, he did not attempt to retract a thing he had said; he only repeated it all with emphasis. Among other things, of course, he assumed that the Church was bitterly opposed to social progress. Why? Because the Church was a body that never changed. How could an unchanging body welcome progress, democracy and other ideals of the sort?

We agreed at once to discard the authority of the Menace, which he was fair enough to call prejudiced. He had better authority than the Menace, he said. A Catholic lady with whom he had recently talked had told him with a great deal of pride that the Church never changed. This had made a great impression on him.

He had failed to see the difference between an unchanging body of religious and moral truth and an institution whose methods might be adapted to the conditions of a special day. His Catholic friend had spoken proudly of the changeless body of religious and moral truth, and he had understood her as referring also to all the methods and activities of the Church. He complained of the political activity of the Church, and yet he himself took the first occasion to confuse her religion with her politics. He knew that the Church had once held temporal power; and all that was undesirable, speaking mildly, in the vision of a Pope as the head of the United States had been conjured before him. So far as he was concerned, a Catholic, and a reputable one at that, had confirmed the very charges of the Menace.

And so it is very often with us. We speak to Protestants and Socialists, and, in fact, to all who dislike the Church, as carelessly as if we were speaking to Catholics, who would understand all our allusions and references. If I say I believe in the authority of Rome, it is clear to you as a Catholic that I mean the spiritual authority. But a Socialist might easily think I meant a temporal or political power to be established here at home. And sincerely thinking that, he might reasonably argue that I was a menace to American liberty.

To speak carefully, then, is the first step toward speaking clearly. But more is needed if we are to deliver our message as we should. We must be prepared not only to say clearly what we believe, but why we believe it. Do not forget that Protestants are not in the habit of appealing to authority. No appeal to authority will convince them in argument. We say we are opposed to socialism because Pope Leo XIII condemned it, and, possibly, if we are decently informed, because certain socialist "authorities" have declared socialism opposed to Christianity.

To a Protestant or a freethinker these reasons for opposing socialism seem no reasons at all. What we really say is that we are opposed to socialism because we are, and because it is opposed to us. This seems like begging the question. Instead of argument we cite fact, and fact that has little or no weight with those who despise authority, whether Catholic or Socialist.

We are too lazy to learn the reasons why our "authorities" have taken a definite position. What a freethinker is anxious to find out is the mental process of the authorities we quote. Why did Pope Leo XIII condemn socialism? Did he include everything that calls itself socialism, or was he condemning only orthodox Marxism and its legitimate offspring? And why did August Bebel declare socialism and Christianity to be as mutually opposed as fire and water? If, as the result of laziness, we can not answer these questions and a hundred others, we are directly to blame for the ignorance and hostility of many a freethinker to-day.

In trying to persuade them to our views, we must state not only our conclusions, but why we or our authorities reached them. Many men who believe merely in a rather extended government ownership and call themselves socialists are genuinely hurt to think that the Church opposes socialism. How surprised they would be to learn what the Church's real views are! And how pleased! These are the men our own carelessness and laziness antagonize at the very time when we need all possible moral support in sending out our message. By believing in their sincerity, by defining our views, and then giving reasons for "the faith that is in us," we can, instead of antagonizing thousands, build firm, smooth roads for the couriers who must bear our message, and by doing this we can help, during the coming days of peace, to prevent the outbreak of those new and terrible wars, the wars of social blindness and revolution.

Richard Dana Skinner.

Failure of International Socialism

When the first war clouds arose on the political horizon meetings of protest were called by the numerous Socialist bodies of Europe. The impending war was denounced as another capitalistic plot. Not content with these tirades, the speakers went further and likewise denounced the Catholic Church in terms equally strong. Their purpose, as we shall see, was clear.

Socialist leaders in Europe foresaw that war was well-nigh inevitable, but they were also aware that many of their followers confidently trusted it could never take place, hoping, as they did, that the International Socialist Bureau at Brussels would effectually prevent its proclamation or stay its progress. An awful dilemma, therefore, confronted the leaders. They knew they could do no more than call futile meetings of protest. On the other hand, they had told their followers, year after year, that the Socialist party was the only political body of Europe which would stand for peace, and that it never would tolerate the general slaughter of fellow-proletarians. Not a few simple-minded Socialists were absolutely convinced of the impossibility of a general war; for had not the Bureau at Brussels threatened to proclaim a general strike the moment hostilities seemed near? "Let them try to carry on war when the miners refuse to bring coal to the surface, when engineers and railway men refuse to carry troops to the frontier, when postal and telegraph employees refuse to deliver letters, messages and commands," were the common expressions of the "comrades."

It is true that war would have been utterly impossible if all such workmen, in conjunction with some others, had begun a permanent strike at a command from Brussels. But the Socialists in the Belgian capital never gave that command. They never thought of giving it, for they dared not risk the tremendous failure that would be consequent on their folly. They would not expose the utter feebleness of their party to the world. They knew that a war can not go on indefinitely, and they had to provide for the future. They had to consider how new electoral victories could be won. Votes do not follow on after incompetence.

Yes, something was to be done to comfort disappointed followers. Consequently the Socialists resorted to the easiest and always efficacious expedient of finding a scapegoat. Needless to say this was to be the Catholic Church. As if by mutual agreement Socialist leaders in the different countries that were now on the brink of the great war attacked the Catholic Church for "doing nothing" to prevent the coming calamity. As an instance of political party wisdom this method was highly efficient, but the different leaders should have agreed upon a common argument. They did not so. As a consequence the Socialist speeches delivered toward the end of July contain some highly interesting and rather amusing contradictions. Thus Mr. Kleerekooper, a Dutch leader, said in Amsterdam: "Now behold the Pope at Rome, my friends! He claims to be the mightiest potentate on earth, and no one will deny this claim, for he commands more than two hundred million souls, yet he has not spoken and will not speak one word to prevent this horrible war." The well-known conclusions about the mutual understanding between Church and capital naturally followed. At the same time M. Hervé, in Paris, said: "Look at the failure of the Church of Rome, once so powerful. The Pope has not spoken a single word, because he knows that he has lost all influence upon nations and governments; because he knows, too, that the Church is only a shadow of her former self." Poor Pope, poor Catholic Church! Both can be proved guilty of crimes by contradictory statements.

A refutation of these accusations is not needed. The call to arms and the mobilization of the troops were measures undertaken without any reference to the Holy Father. Yet the late Pope had done all in his power to preserve peace, and when his efforts proved futile he died broken-hearted at the thought of the human misery he could not avert. Could a nobler example have been given of the desire of the Church to keep the world free of this great calamity? How unsafe then must be the footing of a party whose leaders have recourse to such an expedient as calumny of the Church and of her venerable Pontiff, in order to save their own reputation.

But what of these leaders themselves? By telling their followers that they would make war impossible they lured many an honest workingman to an acceptance of their unsound and utopian policies. They boasted of the growth of their international party. They claimed four million electors in Germany out of a total of eleven million; three million in France, out of eight; and almost a third of the entire electorate of Belgium and Austria. Why have they not forbidden these many millions to bear arms against one another? What became of the threatened general strike in case of war, and the many other undoubted means of preventing such an event? Neither France nor Germany could have entered upon this war if the seven million Socialists in these countries had preferred to stand aloof. Why did they not do so, and why did not the International Bureau at Brussels give the watchword?

To understand the pertinence of these questions we must advert to the fact that Catholics indeed could not have been ordered by the Church or Pontiff thus to disobey and frustrate the orders of their governments in the present crisis. Their doctrine that all true authority comes from God made them loyal, though they might seek to influence their governments, by all rightful means, to preserve peace. But the principle of authority did not bind the International Socialist Party. They repudiate the teaching of the Church upon this as upon other vital points. As a revolutionary party they acknowledge no authority save "the will of the people," and this they acknowledge if it conforms to their own revolutionary ideals. Genuine patriotism is denounced as a vice. There was consequently no reason that could have prompted them, as Socialists, to obey the orders of their Government. But the truth is their leaders realized that the enormous figures they had paraded were very deceptive. Such numbers indicated, indeed, the harm that had been done among the people by a constant propaganda of irreligion, but not the real strength of the party. Its leaders could not count upon one-tenth of their so-called followers when theoretical principles were to be applied in practice. It is one thing to boast of numbers, quite another to muster those numbers for action. In this case socialism had little grasp on its so-called clients. It was not a philosophy of life, a rule of action, but rather a protest against mistakes and abuses on the part of governments.

Two results have already followed from this war. He who runs may read. It has brought about the revival of the religious spirit, and this nowhere more conspicuously than in France, where M. Viviani had "extinguished the Lights of Heaven" some years ago. It has in the second place shown the utter failure of international socialism and the falseness of its revolutionary cry: "Equality, Fraternity and Liberty!" It would not be overbold to predict that if Germany should win this war, not more than fifty out of one hundred and eleven Socialist representatives will return to the next Reichstag, while in the Austrian Parliament, Dr. Adler may find himself surrounded by some twenty adherents out of eighty. Should the Allies conquer the number of Socialist representatives will probably dwindle in France from one hundred and ten to about sixty, and in England they may practically disappear. Let us wait and see. A. HOFHUYS.

The Religion of Masonry

The American Freemason insists, as we have seen, that "between Freemasonry and the Catholic Church there is an inherent antagonism" which admits of "neither peace nor truce," also that Freemasonry is not a Christian institution nor the handmaid thereof; but yet that it is not opposed to Christianity, has no dogmas of its own, and is not itself a religion. The incompatibility of these propositions is evident. The Catholic Church has very definite dogmas, and the institution that is inherently opposed to them and specifically rejects them must of necessity be definitely dogmatic. The same editor wrote in the April issue: "Romanism and Protestantism, as theologies, are alike impractical, intolerant and out of date." This is a dogmatic statement, the denial of all the dogmas of both forms of Christianity. For the rest, the editor must have forgotten his Ritual. Past General Grand Master A. G. Mackey, author of the Masonic "Encyclopædia," "Lexicon," "Symbolism," and other standard works of the American Craft, includes in the inaugural charge to the Grand Chaplain: "Though Masonry be not religion, it is emphatically religion's handmaid;" and his "Encyclopædia" defines Masonry as "an eminently religious institution, that is indebted solely to the religious element which it contains for its origin, and its continued existence." Albert Pike, "the greatest name in Masonry," informs the 33rd degree adepts that Masonry contains all that is true in the religions of all time and none of the impurities with which all of them are tainted, and he trumpets its religious pretensions in the very title of his masterpiece: "Morals and Dogma of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite."

That American Freemasonry, which its authoritative exponent rightly declares is not a Christian institution and is inherently antagonistic to Catholicity, is itself a distinctive religious society, is a matter of legal record that forms part of American law. Its religious character has been attested by the judicial authority of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Robert Kopp, Master of the Lodge of Strict Observance, No. 94, having been expelled in 1899 by Grand Master W. A. Sutherland of Rochester, on the charge of arbitrary conduct, appealed to the courts, and finally, in 1903, to the Appellate Division, First Department of the Supreme Court of the State, on the ground that he had been expelled for opposing the financial irregularities of the governing body. Grand Master Elbert Crandall and Grand Secretary E. M. L. Ehler, respondents on behalf of the New York Grand Lodge, submitted, through Crandall and Truax, the following brief:

> The right to membership in a Masonic fraternity is very much like the right to membership in a Church. Each requires a candidate for admission to subscribe to certain articles of religious belief as an essential prerequisite to membership. Each requires a member to conduct himself thereafter in accordance with certain religious principles. Each requires its members to adhere to certain doctrines of belief and action. The precepts contained in the Landmarks and the Charges of a Freemason (see pp. 92 to 100 of the Book of Constitution, Edit. of 1900) formulate a creed so thoroughly religious in character that it may well be compared with the formally expressed doctrine of many a denominational Church. The Masonic fraternity may, therefore, be quite properly regarded as a religious society and the long line of decisions, holding that a religious society shall have sole and exclusive jurisdiction to determine matters of membership, should be deemed applicable to the Masonic fraternity.

It was. The Landmarks and Charges convinced the judges that Masonry is a religion, and the Masonic defendants' claim, that "McGuire vs. St. Patrick's Cathedral" was a precedent in the case, was allowed. Masonry having been proved a religion, the civil courts were estopped from adjudicating the injustice or irregularity of its excommunications, and the Masonic heads were enabled to hush Mr. Kopp's revelations of their financial transactions.

Their plea that Masonry is a religion protected them; and the court was bound to accept their proofs. The "Masonic Ritualist" contains all the forms and substance and functions of a religion complete in itself and the handmaid of none. It shows conclusively, with marvelous detail, that Masonry has its own distinct altars and temples, its own priesthood and croziered high priesthood and Sancta Sanctorum, and complete sacerdotal ceremonial; its own consecrations, anointings, invocations, purifications, benedictions and religious festivals; its own baptism and communion of the brethren; its own creed of morality and belief; its own peculiar theory of God and the soul and the soul's relation to the Universe and its Architect; and, finally, a ritual hymn proclaiming it "divine." This surely is a distinct religion; and that can be no handmaid of any which proclaims all others corrupt.

That the religion of Masonry is diametrically opposed to every Christian conception is made quite clear by Messrs. Mackey and Pike, who insist with the American Freemason that its distinctive purpose is not benevolence or sociability, but enlightenment; that is, the spread of Masonic truth. The applicant stands at its portals "in darkness, ignorance and helplessness," and if he absorbs enough of Masonic light to guide him over all the Landmarks, he finds that "the last and crowning Landmark of all is that these Landmarks can never be changed." Its creed is as unchangeable as the Christian Deposit of Faith, for, says the Masonic Ritualist: "It is in the power of no man or body of men to make the least innovation." Its adept has achieved all attainable truth. What is it?

Brothers Pike and Mackey, the supreme American authorities, having cleared away the corruptions with which all religions had overlaid primeval truth, disclose it in all its simplicity, at least to perfect Masons of the 33rd Degree. Briefly it amounts to this, that Nature and God are interchangeable; that the Deity is a bisexual conception of which man is the highest expression; that morality follows the law of bisexualism of which phallic worship is the primeval and, properly understood, the true interpretation; that "The Absolute is Reason," and "the conception of an Absolute Deity outside of Reason is the Idol of Black Magic, the Phantom of the Demon"; that the Devil is the idea of deity reversed, and, "for the Initiates, Satan is not a Person, but a Force, the instrument of Liberty or Free Will." Thus we have a pantheistic, rationalistic, hedonistic God, which is humanity deified; and therewith the kind of morals that would emanate from such a deity.

All this, with much that is worse, is in the standard books of American Masons according to degree; and the American Freemason, the New Age, and the leading Masonic organs, are constantly urging them to learn it, especially in its practical applications, and to make Continental Masonry their model in theory and practice. But Americans, it seems, have slight taste for real Masonic work and study, and Brother Morcombe agrees with Brother Mackey, that ninety per cent. of them have not yet been roused to the true Masonic spirit. Entering for social, business or political advancement, few of them frequent the lodge for instruction or have a mind for its peculiar enlightenment. Even when they do, it does not follow that they get it. Most of them belong to the Blue Lodges, and Brother Pike thus instructs the 30th Degree of the Scottish Rite:

> The Blue Degrees are but the outer court or portico of the Temple. Part of the symbols are displayed there to the Initiate; but he is intentionally misled by false interpretations. It is not intended that he shall understand them; but it is intended that he shall imagine he understands them. Their true explication is intended for the Adepts, the Princes of Masonry. . . . It is well enough for the mass of those called Masons to imagine that all is contained in the Blue Degrees; and whoso attempt to undeceive them will labor in vain, and without any due reward violate his obligations as an Adept. . . . Masonry conceals its secrets from all except the Adepts and Sages, or the Elect, and uses false explanations and interpretations of its symbols to mislead those deserving only to be misled. Truth is not for those who are unworthy or unable to receive it or would pervert it.

We can thus understand why many Masons can tell us sincerely that they see no evil in Masonry, and that hearing in their initiations, etc., long passages from the Bible, which they are unaware have been expurgated and adapted for Masonic purposes, they believe it is a Christian institution. Even the editor of the American Freemason may not have plumbed all "Truth," for he is but a Blue Lodge Knight, not a Prince of the Elect. But he is proving worthy of promotion. He is striving hard to raise, or lower, the Blue Lodge to the level and the spirit of the atheistic and persecuting Grand Orient of France. His views of Christianity's sphere and functions are in accord. Protestantism he finds a help against Romanism's attempt to "mix religion with politics" and influence men in other than "the vague domains of faith"; but as theologies they are alike beneath contempt, and

> If one or the other comes into the arena of material life, commanding there the attention or the obedience of men on the score of any spiritual light and leading, the sooner such a champion is kicked out bodily the better will it be for all concerned.

We shall see that Catholicity is the one religion that Masonry would "kick out bodily" from every arena of influence in American life, and that therein it is true to its history. The Masonic heads who have mastered Brother Pike's philosophy, and the rank and file who have not, have slight belief, if any, in a personal Devil; but with both Satan is a potent if unconscious "Force," and the enemy of each is the Church.

M. Kenny.

England in War Time

It is nearly incredible how great a change has passed over England and how wholly for the better, since the tremendous war cloud broke suddenly six weeks ago. Two months ago Great Britain was in a deplorable state, at least to all outward appearances. She was torn by party strife to such an extent that civil war was within calculable distance; she was nervous; she was fretful; she was selfish; she was pleasure-loving; she was tormented by social troubles; she resembled an idle, self-indulgent person of uncertain temper who does not know what she wants and complains bitterly of not getting it; she was, in short, in as unsatisfactory a condition as a nation well can be that is not actually corrupt or ruined. And now, without boasting, it may be said that she has never been more worthy of her destiny or of her place in history. On the report of at least one magistrate, never, in recent years, have the statistics of crime fallen so low.

It is not hard to see why it is that this extraordinary transformation has taken place. It is as true of nations as of individuals—of nations, that is, that have not altogether lost nobility of character—that when they are once confronted by a call to really great sacrifice, all littleness and peevishness disappear. It is at any rate one part of the truth to say that they who again and again fall before small temptations can yet resist great ones; that there are certain types of character which need great crises if they are to do justice to themselves.

For about three weeks the test of Britain's character hung in the balance. The troops disappeared to the front, and the navy into the fogs of the North Sea; and financial conditions were readjusted; and the party politicians said what was expected of them; but the rest waited. There were still voices which, almost unrebuked, deplored the war, and eulogized the good intentions of the Germans as distinct from the Prussians; there were still arm-chair critics who discussed strategy with a detached air; and prudent housekeepers who laid in stocks of provisions, and hosts of young men in flannels who argued philosophically and congratulated themselves on being wise enough to keep out of trouble. At last Namur fell; and a silence fell with it. Men had supposed that gallant little Belgium could repeat for ever the miracle of Liége; it was a shock to find there were limits to human possibilities. Then the British force reappeared at Mons, fighting desperately, losing men desperately and retreating.

At this the silence was broken; and to the heartfelt relief of all who loved England, it was broken in the right way. The arm-chair critics laid aside their newspapers on their club tables and went home to see whether, after all, forty was too old; the voices that had talked smooth nonsense now began to discuss facts; the young men disappeared from the watering places and reappeared at recruiting offices; business men left their business; carters left their horses; travelers came home and home-birds became travelers. In one word, Britain woke up as never since the Napoleonic wars and woke sane and reasonable.

When Louvain fell there was no screaming, only one more resolve was taken; when the wounded men began to stream back to hospital, there was neither wailing nor hysteria; when tales of outrage began to come across the channel, there was no yelling for revenge or reprisals; there was just quiet determination, quietly expressed, that the enemy should be restrained and punished. When the gallant little affair of Heligoland was reported, again there was no exultation; there was just a quiet triumph with a few smiles and nods. In short, disaster and peril did for us in three weeks what prosperity could not have done in thirty years; and now that at last the tide seems to be turning and German culture to be going back home, once more there is no hysteria; there is just the resolve that it shall go all the way back to Berlin and shall there learn a few lessons in a school which perhaps it will respect.

Such is the temper of England to-day. But who would have dreamed of such restraint and such determination even six weeks ago?

ROBERT HUGH BENSON.

COMMUNICATIONS

A German View of the War

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I suppose by this time news of the great German victories over Russia, France and the English auxiliaries will have reached America, and you will also be in a position to judge of the real, immediate causes of the war. It was certainly not the Emperor William's fault, if peace was not maintained. War was of course bound to come, but it was not Germany that longed for it or hastened it, although, as events have proved, she was prepared for it.

It will hardly be necessary for me to correct the many glaringly false statements made by Reuter & Co. The loss of 25,000 men in dead and wounded and captured before Liége on Aug. 7, is a fairy tale, as is also the Emperor's supposed request for an armistice. With but few exceptions the people of Alsace-Lorraine have displayed the sincerest loyalty to Germany. Nearly 100,000 volunteers from these provinces reported during the first week of mobilization, a relatively greater percentage than in any other German province. France declared war on Austria before a single Austrian soldier had set foot on German soil. The only assistance thus far given by Austria to Germany was the sending of a battery of mountain artillery to northern France. Austria needs all her troops against the Russian millions. France invaded German territory before declaring war. I have this from a resident of Upper Alsace. In regard to the violation of Belgian's neutrality by Germany, it is now admitted, even by Dutch and Italian papers, that Belgium had a secret understanding with France to permit her to pass unhindered through her territory in order to invade the unprotected Rhineland. I know from personal knowledge that Belgian sympathies were all for France and all against Germany. I also saw French aeroplanes in the Rhineland on August 2nd and 3rd, which could have got there only by flying over Belgian territory; which was also a breach of neutrality. The alleged "barbarities" of the Germans in Belgium are nothing but just punishments for murders committed by Belgian civilians, who shot down German soldiers and mutilated the wounded and dying. One of my friends who took part in the storming of Liége was shot in the head by a civilian of Gemmenich whilst engaged in transporting baggage and wounded to Aix-la-Chapelle. In the article "Causes of the War" (AMERICA, August 15, p. 417) the statement is made that "Germany announced the acquisition of a private port in Holland, fully 20 miles nearer to England than Antwerp." This is nonsense. No such announcement was ever made. The whole article, in fact, is one-sided and full of inaccuracies, to say the least. Only one part of Louvain has been destroyed; the Townhall was saved by the efforts, heroic efforts, of the German soldiers themselves; St. Peter's Church is sadly damaged; the library could not be saved.

In regard to the editorial "The Lessons of the War," it may not be out of place to remark that at least as many Catholics are engaged on the side of Austria and Germany as on that of France, Russia, England, Belgium, Servia, Montenegro and Japan, the Catholic population of Austria and Germany, according to the last census, being somewhat more than sixty millions. Finally the Poles of Russia are welcoming the Austrians and Germans as their deliverers.

Knechtsteden, Sept. 8, 1914. J. J. LAUX.

An Incident of the Capture of Louvain

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following details are an extract from a letter recently received from Hastings (England), and are a résumé of the authentic account of a summary execution published by the Bien Public of Ghent, revised and completed by Père F. Villaert at that time Superior of the Jesuit students at Louvain. My correspondent says:

> . . . After the burning of Louvain about twenty Jesuits were arrested. They were in the Avenue de Tervueren, in front of a palisade, not far from the Musée du Congo, with an American bishop, the rector of the American College, one of the vice-rectors of the University and others. They were searched. On the young scholastic, Eugène Dupierreux, was found a memorandum containing a short summary of the daily events of the war. In it there was a sentence something like this: "I had never believed until now what had been said of German cruelties, but, after the burning of Louvain's library, I do believe that their deeds are worthy of the Sultan Omar." The German officer thought he found in these words a sketch of a sermon to be preached to the people against the conquerors. "That's enough," he said, and he immediately gave orders that the scholastic be taken out and shot. Père Villaert gave him the last absolution. After the shooting the scholastic still gave some signs of life. The officer then ended his life with a bullet from his revolver. He was calm and serene and died with the Crucifix in his hands. He was buried in the place where he had been shot.
>
> It is not true, as has been stated, that the community, in which there was a brother of the scholastic who was killed, had been forced to witness the execution. The Jesuit Fathers were then conducted to Brussels, and had to walk with the soldiers through the streets of the capital. They were released at last through the kind mediation of the Spanish and American Ministers.
>
> The German military Governor of Brussels afterwards expressed his deep regret to the Provincial of the Belgian Jesuits, and assured him that the officer who had ordered the execution would be removed from office. The Jesuit Scholasticate of Louvain has not been destroyed.

Granite, Md. P. M. TELESE.

Some Facts About Servia

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me to correct some items of the communication on the Austro-Servian conflict signed V. S. in your issue of September 12. An Austrian Ambassador named Reppmann is unknown in Europe. The Austrian Minister, Baron Giesl, who delivered the ultimatum to Servia, certainly never took the alias of Reppmann. Neither is there a party leader or politician called Mowokovich in Servia. Had the Servian Premier, a veteran skilled in diplomacy, committed the solecism of receiving a foreign representative together with a newspaper man, Baron Giesl, so far as I know him, would certainly not have tolerated such a breach of international etiquette. Prince George of Servia and Major Voya Tankositch are known to me as to every inhabitant of Belgrade as two distinct individuals who have little in common and do not even resemble each other, therefore it is only at a great distance that they can be fused into a single identity. Such a feat was scarcely attempted in Vienna, and Holland, posing as a neutral State, may keep the credit of it.

It is inexact for your Innsbruck correspondent to say that the Servian Government offered no denial of complicity in the Sarajevo murder. Before the accusation was made Servia's official press condemned the deed, and later repudiated emphatically any connection with a dastardly attentat liable to bring Servian patriots of Bosnia into trouble. The charge was unsubstantiated except by factors wholly discredited in previous political trials. Reservoir poisoning is too common an accusation and has been made too often by each army against its enemy to need special comment.

The weeping and mourning in Tyrol when the recruits were summoned to fight for what they could not well grasp had no counterpart in Servia, where women saw their loved ones depart in calm resignation, convinced of their just cause and of Servia's duty to defend her liberty.

London. E. CHRISTICH.

Neutrality as to War News

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Noticing in this week's issue of AMERICA that you receive letters complaining of your attitude regarding the war, and ordering subscriptions stopped because of their disgruntled writers' indignation, I wish to assure you of the fact that at least one reader considers that your attitude toward the war is entirely sane and commendable, representing perhaps better than any other I read the ideal of neutrality that is asked for by President Wilson in his address to the American people. I desire you to continue sending AMERICA to me, and have no intention of stopping my subscription. I recommend AMERICA to my friends as the best Catholic weekly in this country. If we had more publications of your high standard and calibre, there would be less complaint about Catholics not supporting a Catholic press.

Bangor, Me. JOHN P. FLANAGAN.

A Psychological Problem

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial this week in regard to those who stop their subscriptions because they do not like the war news in your columns emphasizes a peculiar attitude of mind of many Catholics toward Catholic enterprises. Many a man will withdraw his support from a Catholic undertaking the first moment it diverges from his personal views, though he will not do so in regard to non-Catholic undertakings. One of the most estimable men I know wrote a sharp note and stopped his twenty-year-old subscription to a prominent Catholic magazine, because there appeared in it an editorial of which he did not approve, but he kept on reading and paying for his daily paper, with whose editorial column he seldom agreed and of whose news columns he could seldom entirely approve. Never in his life did he write a letter to any other editor. He could not be made to see how unreasonable he was. You yourself must certainly have found how prevalent is this attitude of mind. If the psychology of it could be studied, and proper remedies administered from our pulpits and in our schools, would not one great obstacle to a strong Catholic Press be removed? Do you suppose any of your late subscribers could be got to analyze themselves for the general good?

New Jersey. SOUTH ORANGE.

How to Get Rid of the "Menace"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I should like to suggest to the readers of AMERICA who are continually being annoyed by receiving the Menace to adopt my method of getting rid of this pest. Every copy I receive I remail to the Postmaster General at Washington or to our Congressman. Let all Catholics who are receiving this paper adopt this plan, and Mr. Burleson will soon wake up.

Chicago, Ill. JOSEPH A. FEILEN.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Yale and Prayer

The chief discordant note in the nation's prayer for peace came from Yale University. President Hadley gave expression to some very pertinent and practical reflections on the spirit of animosity, to which, in his opinion, must be traced much of the misunderstanding that has brought on the present war. His utterances have been praised, and not without reason. He made a strong plea for tolerance of other men's views and self-repression in the expression of one's own. So far he spoke well. He deserves only sympathy for his words of protest against discourtesy and arrogance and the utterance of half-truths as if they were the whole truth. All will agree with him as to the propriety of following up our prayers "by intelligent help in promoting peace on earth." But with another part of his matriculation sermon general exception is likely to be taken. He said in part:

> With our illusions shattered and our very ideals shaken, we crave helplessly for peace; and as far as the mere craving goes we are ready to pray for it.
>
> But how little this mere craving amounts to! What effect will it have on Englishman or German, Frenchman or Russian, each desperately convinced of the righteousness of his own cause, for which he has already suffered and is prepared to die if need be, that prayers for peace are offered by members of other nations comfortably distant from the fray and from the passion that evoked it? No direct effect whatever.
>
> It is wrong to dignify this profitless expression of desire by the name of prayer. Unless we follow up our prayers by intelligent help in promoting peace on earth they are but the "vain repetitions" of the heathen. They may have a certain use as a public recognition of the controlling power of God over the affairs of men; otherwise they are no better than the peace parades and the children's peace cards and other similar manifestations of misdirected zeal with which we are now familiar.
>
> People think they are doing their duty when they are simply indulging the luxury of expressing their own emotions in public. To expect such prayer to be answered is folly on the part of the ignorant and blasphemy on the part of those who should be wiser.

If these words have any point whatever, they refer to the prayer addressed to almighty God by the entire nation on the day when Mr. Hadley preached. They are not only a misconception of the efficacy of the prayer of petition, but also an unfair characterization of the attitude of the millions of reverent worshipers who lifted their hearts and their voices to heaven in humble yet confident entreaty for peace. Those who made their petition with any understanding were by no means under the delusion that by so doing they would produce any direct impression on those at war. It was precisely because we realized that the peoples of Europe had fixed their hearts on fighting to the end, and that all hope of influencing them directly had altogether passed, that we turned to God, in the hollow of whose hand all men are and within whose power it is to enlighten men's minds and to soften their hearts. Our own efforts to bring about a cessation of hostilities had failed, and in our helplessness we had recourse to the Prince of Peace. We have no guarantee that our prayer will be answered in the way we most desire, by immediate restoration of universal peace; but we have abundant warrant for invoking divine assistance when all human endeavors fail.

The nation's prayer, therefore, bore no resemblance whatever to "peace parades and children's peace cards." It was not a mere demonstration, it can not be described as "simply indulging the luxury of expressing one's emotions in public." There may have been some who were possessed by the sentiments above described, but the vast majority of those who responded to President Wilson's invitation had a full consciousness of what they were doing. Their prayer was certainly not "profitless," nor was the expectation of having it answered "folly on the part of the ignorant and blasphemy on the part of those who should be wiser." It is not out of place to ask parents who have sons at Yale under the care of Mr. Hadley, what measures they are taking to safeguard their faith from such rationalistic teaching? If such things are said in public by the president of the university, what are we to suppose is said in the privacy of the classroom by irresponsible professors?

American Witnesses of Mexican Horrors

Corpus Christi is on the Mexican border. It has been in close touch with Federals and Constitutionalists, is an asylum of the refugees, and is, therefore, in a position to judge Mexican conditions. The Knights of Columbus of that city met on September 23, and arrived at a conclusion. The testimony of those American citizens who are on the spot, and speak of what they themselves had seen or had heard from actors and witnesses in the terrible drama, should convince the few among us who are still skeptical of Mexican atrocities. Their report recites that "one by one unnamable horrors were mentioned till the recital of their savagery dulled the mind." For generations Mexico's disastrous revolutions had been accompanied by conditions of religious intolerance that outraged even the natural rights of man, but now this irreligious mania has reached its climax. It has found vent in the commission of crimes so numerous and abominable that:

> The nearer one approaches unfortunate Mexico, the stronger is the atmosphere charged with the conviction that conditions there are immeasurably worse than even their witnesses and victims can describe them.

They express amazement that such monstrous deeds are passed over in silence by the secular press of this land, where no principle is so dearly prized as liberty of worship and freedom of conscience, and that while national prayer is being offered for the cessation of war, so much apathy exists regarding the war of religious persecution that is torturing Mexico. To awaken from this apathy their fellow-citizens of all denominations, the Corpus Christi Council passed these resolutions:

> Whereas, we American citizens, prizing above all material things, the religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution to every inhabitant of the United States, are sorely grieved that the inhabitants of Mexico, our neighboring Republic, are deprived of it; and, for its sake, are made to suffer the most cruel and brutal persecution;
>
> And whereas, the United States, through its Administration, has been so contributory to the triumph of the cause of the Constitutionalists, that it is not entirely without responsibility for the religious persecution that has followed in the wake of this triumph;
>
> And whereas, the Administration, having aided the cause of the Constitutionalists, is now, as far as we know, endeavoring to influence the de facto government of Mexico to practise tolerance of religion; to aid therein,
>
> Be it Resolved, That we, the undersigned Corpus Christi Council No. 1202, Knights of Columbus, labor to create a public opinion condemnatory of the cruel deeds committed in Mexico in the name of liberty;
>
> That we appeal to all Americans, regardless of their methods of worship, to do all that is in their power to secure for the inhabitants of Mexico that religious tolerance that we, here, find so conducive to concord and prosperity;
>
> That we endeavor to interest, as much as we can, the daily press, that it may present to the public, in so far as respect for decency may permit, the record of the horrible deeds that are done in that stricken land.

The appeal was ordered to be sent to the President and Secretary of State and the Councils of the Knights of Columbus, and ordered to be published in the papers of the country. We have not noticed that these papers have published them. It is the right and duty of Catholic subscribers to ask them why Mexican religious atrocities alone are excluded from their catalogues of crime; and it is the right and duty of all Catholics, as individuals and societies, to ask their representatives why our Government permits such atrocities, and thus give effective support to the Knights of Columbus and the Federated Catholic Societies in their manful defence of the civil and religious liberty of our fellow-Catholics of Mexico. If our millions can not exact justice in this matter, they may prepare in future to be treated as ciphers.

Who Owns You?

"Gurth, the son of Beowulph, is the born thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood," was engraved on the collar of the Saxon serf. Gurth, the swine-herd, is a surly fellow, when first we meet him with Fangs and the Jester in the darkening walks of the forest. But he afterwards did his master loyal service, and when his collar was struck off, the words it bore were graven yet more deeply in the freeman's heart. To follow his lord to the wars was now his glory, the privilege not of slaves, but of the free.

Who owns you? We, too, once were thralls, and although we did our Master no loyal service, Christ freely ransomed us, and gave us to His Father as His brothers; henceforth, the sons of the King. No longer may we sit in comfort by the pleasant fireside with Fangs and Wamba, when freemen are off to the wars. Our place is at the side of the Prince. Our bodies are not our own. They are Christ's. Our hearts, our souls, the best that is in us, are not for our own service, but for Christ's. Our dignity as sons of the King means personal service in the field with Christ, our Captain. Ye are Christ's, says St. Paul, and Christ is of God. But do you believe that you own yourself, that you may use your soul, your body for evil, if you wish? to the hurt of others, if you wish? that Christ's other brothers, and Christ our Redeemer, and God the Father of all, have no claims which you are bound to respect? If you do, you are no freeman. You are the old Gurth, back in the tangled forest, herding the swine.

A Catholic and a Gentleman

When John Ball, the famous contemporary of Wycliffe, instigated the peasants of England to rise against the gentry in 1381, he composed the historic couplet:

> When Adam delved and Eve span
> Who was then a gentleman?

The obvious, and totally fallacious, conclusion derived from this couplet is that the gentry were those fortunate persons, who, like the lilies of the field, toil not, neither do they spin; and it is an opinion that lingers still. But there is an old and much-used saying about "behaving like a gentleman"; and so, the whole art of being a gentleman is bound up with conduct.

Then again, there are certain technical qualities which are said to pertain to a gentleman; such as being of noble lineage; having the right to bear heraldic arms, and many another. There is a family of royal and noble ancestry which gives to its members the right to an armorial insignia; which boasts of a long line of heroic sons and daughters; which has family traditions so sacred that its members have on occasion shed their blood rather than prove themselves unworthy of their calling and untrue; this family is the Catholic Church.

And the true Catholic, who is a loyal and faithful scion of this family, is the true gentleman.

The family of the Catholic Church, like all other families, had a Founder, who was blessed beyond all the sons of men in His Mother. She is Queen of Heaven, Mistress of Angels, and has many another title, which it is the delight of her children to recount in loving litany. But an age of chivalry and romance, an age that lifted up the glory of womanhood higher than it had ever reached, could find no more glorious or more excellent title for this sovereign Mistress than Madonna, Notre Dame, Our Lady; a title which has endured through the centuries and which shall endure. And so long as the world shall last and the religion of Christ prevail, mankind shall know that the genius of the Catholic Church could endow perfect womanhood with no more splendid halo of glory than the simple title of "lady." She is Our Lady, and she is set as a pattern before each daughter of the Catholic Church, that she, too, may be a lady after this perfect example.

As is the Mother, so is the Son, the First-born of our race; the Head of the family, the Foundation. He is King of kings, and Lord of lords, begotten before the worlds, and He has made us heirs by adoption and grace. By the grace of the Blessed Sacrament His Blood flows in us, and He lives in us; therefore are we of His lineage. He has given us a name to bear before all the world, Christian and Catholic. For our emblem and patent of nobility He has given us the sign of the holy Cross.

By the laws of heraldry and primogeniture the Catholic is a gentleman by right of birth. He is armiger; for he proudly bears as his armorial crest the sign of the Cross. He is of royal and noble ancestry; for the Son of God is his Brother, and Our Lady, the Queen of Heaven is his Mother. He has a name by which he may be known; for in baptism he was called Christian. He is knightly; for by his calling he is to fight against evil, and succor the poor and needy. This is the noble inheritance of every Catholic, who must be continually on his guard lest by sin he stain his scutcheon and cast a slur on the honor of his family. For in whatsoever degree a man is raised on high, in the same degree shall be the greatness of his fall; and the dishonored and fallen Catholic drags the honor of God and his Church in the dust.

A Letter, Some Remarks, A Solution

The Solicitor of the Post-Office Department has sent broadcast the following circular letter:

DEAR SIR OR MADAM:

Receipt is acknowledged of your recent communication with reference to the newspaper entitled the Menace and similar publications.

Under the United States laws the admissibility to the mails of a newspaper or periodical is not affected by the insertion of articles advocating any particular views or criticising the views held by others in matters of religion or religious teachings or discussions, or that may be abusive, scurrilous, derogatory, defamatory or libelous, unless the language used in such articles is obscene, lewd, lascivious or filthy, or unless there appears "upon the envelope or outside cover or wrapper" containing them "libelous, scurrilous or defamatory" written or printed matter.

Referring to the exclusion of the Menace from the Canadian mails, I have been informed that such action is based upon the Canadian laws, under which it is "forbidden to post for delivery or transmission anything of an indecent, immoral, seditious, disloyal or scurrilous character, etc.," in which respect it differs materially from the United States' statute.

The United States Attorney for the proper district now has under consideration the question of whether the criminal statutes have been violated by sending through the mails copies of the paper in question.

Respectfully,
W. H. LAMAR,
Solicitor.

Here, then, is the case in a nutshell. The Canadian laws prohibit the passage of the Menace through the mails; our laws do not.

Wherein lies the difference between the statutes? The former interdict indecent matter: the latter forbid obscene articles. Indecent is spelled with eight letters; obscene with seven only. There is the first difference. Canada forbids immoral matter; the United States, lewd matter. There is a greater discrepancy here, the difference between four and seven letters. Finally, Canada frowns on scurrilous articles; the United States rejects filthy articles. Ten letters and six letters; that is an impassable gulf!

But the Solicitor of the Post-Office Department is a gentleman and not an expert in "filthy articles." This is admirable, but in the present instance disadvantageous. However, the case is not entirely hopeless. There is at hand an authoritative judgment about the vexed problem. It comes direct from the editor of one of the scurrilous papers. Surely, he is qualified to judge. His issue of April 18 reads:

> The reason the Menace is dirty and vile and filthy is because it publishes the news and chronicles the current events about a dirty, vile, filthy organization.

The difficulty is solved. Our laws forbid the post to filthy matter. The editor of the Menace pronounces his paper filthy. The conclusion seems clear; it is recommended to the Solicitor of the Post-Office Department.

Nobody Cares

This is a sad cry to utter. When a man or woman allows that complaint to take shape in the soul and fill the mouth with its bitterness, you may be sure it is a black, severe storm which has flung such salt spray to the lips. Loneliness goes deep in the human heart. Man is a gregarious animal, and he loves to flock with his kind. Even if you maroon him in mid-ocean, he will not yet say, "nobody cares." Enoch Arden did not utter those sad words when he looked over miles of ocean, but he did when he looked a few feet into a lighted room and saw his wife and children belonging to another. One need not be a chip on the high seas to be alone. The stranger in a large city feels his isolation all the more because millions around him are going somewhere, and he is heading nowhere. They exchange with daily definiteness home for work and work for home, and in both they meet some who care. It is the man who is away from home and business that feels himself a drifting waif on these shifting tides of life. The blaze of the saloon, the hilarious music and dancing, the shrillness of forced laughter, make an irresistible appeal to his loneliness. When John visits the city he may easily become Don Juan. He finds that the doors on the saloon are light and easy swinging and yield to a finger's touch, while it takes several strong arms to push open the heavy church doors. "Nobody cares" is often found just before "Here goes" in the text of many biographies.

The famous Haroun al Raschid, who lived in golden days, used to wander around on Arabian nights, and visit the poor of his city. He was an early Oriental slummer. No doubt, he was charitably inclined toward others, but he was also practising a very special kind of charity toward himself. Men in high office have to be very much alone. And Haroun was a founder of a Get-together Club. Our good President took the country, that is the newspapers' reporters, into his confidence not so long ago, and gave no uncertain evidence that he felt the isolation of his position. How would he have felt if he were the Pope, whom Italian compatriots, with no pity for his seclusion of office, have restricted still more to one house and one garden. One of the sad privileges of old age is attending more funerals than dances, and the old must often shake their heads sadly, whispering: "What does my presence matter? Nobody cares." Criminals, too, feel the spell of this attraction for their kind. When they have slipped through the meshes of the law, when they have escaped the scent of the blood-hound, the patient detectives know the weakness of the human heart. It is a pitiful necessity which makes these agents of the law pounce down on their outlaw prey as it goes back from its lonely isolation to some one who cares.

There are several ways of breaking down the barriers of isolation, all more helpful than dissipation or despair. When the aloofness of office or the helplessness of age do not allow one to be the hail-fellow well met of college days, when the body narrows its horizon, the mind can widen its horizon. If you can not boisterously slap many chums on the shoulder, you can along the broad highways of literature clasp hands of fellowship with the myriads who throng those goodly ways. The one who reads has correspondents from all places and times, and the mail is heavy.

Farther and better! If it is hard to maroon the mind, it is harder to maroon the heart. Give a mother the love of one child and she is never lonely. The soldier out on the picket-line or scouting alone, bears warm within him trust in his leader and feels no isolation. If with underwater cables and overhead wireless one throb of electricity makes the whole world kin, there is swifter message, more sensitive response, far stronger bonds from heart to hearts. Would you never be lonely, never isolated, then make the heart keenly alive toward Him Who always cares. With Him you can never be marooned or alone, but rather will be a multitude. "One with God is a majority," said an American orator, and an earlier and greater has written: "Casting all your care on Him, for He hath care of you."

LITERATURE

Two Types of Apostolic Virtue

The Church, like the mother of the Gracchi, has her jewels to exhibit to the world; and these are no other than the lives of her saintly children. Among other things, they attract by their remarkable variety; for holiness, though one in its essence, is seen under various aspects in different natures. Grace does not supplant nature. It rather grafts itself upon nature. While imparting to nature something of its own superior qualities it does not destroy its integrity. Hence as natures differ, the life and work of any two saints, respectively, will receive a decided color from the native character of each. The one may, for instance, leave the mark of his personality upon the world by imbuing his disciples with his own knightly spirit of loyalty, as in the case of Ignatius of Loyola; the other, like Francis de Sales, may have for his mission the distilling of the oil of meekness and gentleness into every soul brought within the range of his influence. The fact we have been noticing has its practical significance. It has an important bearing both upon the appraising of sanctity, so far as we can appraise it all, and upon the training of those who aspire to it. No greater mistake could be made than to attempt to force sanctity always into the same mold. Even in religious orders, each of which has its ruling idea, there is ample scope for the independent development of the individual, and the orders are so numerous that each aspirant after perfection can find a spiritual mold to his own liking.

The above reflections have been suggested by two biographies that have lately been translated from the French: the Abbé Michaud's "Life of the Venerable Louis Marie Baudouin" (Benziger, $3.25), and Father Calvet's biography of Father Paul Ginhac, of the Society of Jesus (Benziger, $2.50). Father Baudouin played an exceptional part in the restoring of religion in the west of France after the appalling desolation caused by the great Revolution. Forced into exile by the great upheaval, he was back again in his native La Vendée as soon as the first lull in the storm occurred, though for a considerable time he was tracked by the priest-hunters of the period. His appointed task under Providence was the education of the young and the training of candidates for the priesthood. Possessing no little power of initiative and a boundless trust in the divine bounty, he inaugurated work after work destined to have a far-reaching influence. Among other things he instituted an order of teaching Sisters and laid the foundation of a congregation of regular clerics.

But all this, memorable as it is, holds little that is distinctive of the saintly Baudouin. The force that sustained him was his indomitable courage and his boundless trust in Providence, but the more immediate instrument of the good he effected was a unique power of personal influence, especially as exercised upon young minds. For this he found a special field in the seminaries over which he was so providentially placed. If it is asked what was the secret of his influence we shall find it chiefly in the fact that in many respects he was a replica of St. Francis de Sales. He had all that saint's suavity and gentleness and charity as well as his talent for steering his enterprises through a host of difficulties. He had all his unction of speech and something resembling his natural, simple yet effective eloquence. He had, too, the natural grace and dignity with all the sweet attractiveness of the Bishop of Geneva. But there was much in his composition that was more peculiarly his own and which bore its own distinctive fruit. The stream of natural affection in his nature flowed none the less freely for being mingled with the stream of divine grace. He had an immense love of children. He found the keenest delight in the song of birds and in fragrant meadows and in the sight of beautiful landscapes. These, especially in his declining years, he made stepping-stones to higher things. His special dedication to the Scriptures gave a tinge to his conversations and his discourses which made them peculiarly attractive. Finally, he had a genius for training young minds; and who will ever question genius about the secret of its success?

In turning from Father Baudouin to Father Ginhac the coloring in the picture is found to be more sombre, but the effect more intense. In his case nature lent little to grace, but that little was endued with enormous power. Father Ginhac was destined to leave the deep impress of his own spiritual life upon the young priests of his Order; and God prepared him for his work by endowing him with a firmness of character and a power of will that were truly astonishing. This strength of character was with him from childhood, but toward the close of boyhood it was warped from its truest aims and threatened him with moral shipwreck. But on one occasion circumstances rather than his own inclination brought him to a people's mission. He had come to scoff, but remained to pray. The first discourses of the missionaries changed him not a little, but his real conversion was effected at a stroke. Toward the close of the mission, happening to turn a corner of a street, he lighted upon a procession in which a large crucifix was being carried on a litter. A glance at the blood-stained face was enough. In a moment he was wholly God's. His resolution was taken, and never to the end of a long career did he cease to pursue the high perfection to which he then and there dedicated himself.

His life was a marvel of humility and mortification. The strong, uncompromising will, making relentless war upon natural inclination, was the distinctive badge of his sanctity. Indeed this aspect of his life was so prominent that scarcely any other was discernible. Yet Father Ginhac was almost a total stranger to spiritual consolations, a fact which alone raised his sanctity to the plane of the heroic. Just as little pleasure entered his soul through the gates of his senses: we doubt if he ever permitted himself to be regaled in the slightest degree by any sight or sound in nature. Gifts of speech or of manner he had none. His exposition of the Institute of the Society to his young "Tertian" Fathers was dull; and yet, when his heart was particularly interested, how his words did brand their meaning and spirit into the souls of his hearers. His gift of direction was unsurpassed; and it was chiefly this, together with the holiness of the man, that made the superiors of the French provinces desirous to place their young priests under his instruction.

In these biographies, therefore, are sketched two distinct types of apostolic virtue. Though brought to an equation by grace, how different they are in point of natural qualities! And what marvels are effected here by grace, whether with the aid of or in spite of natural qualities!

MICHAEL P. HILL, S.J.

REVIEWS

Ontology, or the Theory of Being. An Introduction to General Metaphysics. By P. COFFEY, Ph.D. (Louvain) New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $3.00.

Following the two learned volumes on "The Science of Logic," by this professor of Maynooth College, now comes an exhaustive treatise on the general aspects of being. The author is not of those who think that ontology is a thing of the past. "Perhaps not a single one of these problems," he observes, "is really and in substance alien to present-day speculations." Indeed, no question of importance has been omitted. One would like to see Dr. Coffey take sides on the distinction between actual essence and existence, a question in which the human mind closely scrutinizes the inner nature of reality. Not every philosopher acquainted with the writings of St. Thomas will agree that the great doctor holds a real distinction between the two. The subjective and objective factors of the beautiful are well set forth in this volume and it is good to find the author insisting that the beautiful which offends morality is not really a thing of beauty at all.

A clear explanation and solid proof of the principle of causality and of the objectivity of the four causes is necessary for all philosophers, but especially for those imbued with modern English and German sophistries. Though it has been the custom to deal in scholastic text-books on ontology with the four causes, many would prefer to see this treatise placed after the constitution of bodies, so that the full purport of material and formal causality would be better understood. The author in fact admits as much when he says that these causes are properly subject-matter for cosmology. Dr. Coffey maintains that notions and realities receive their logical explanation, not a priori and by way of results obtained, but in a gradual manner as a result of investigation so that the mind is made to think out and to build up the right view. This, however, should not have prevented the writer from prefixing to each chapter by way of summary or thesis the main points of doctrine to be proved in the course of the chapter.

The author deserves great credit for providing the English public with a clear exposition of the deep problems of general metaphysics. Other treatises we hope will follow. What is especially needed now is an "up-to-date" work on cosmology, or more explicitly on inorganic bodies, for this field of philosophy requires to be brought more into harmony with the conquests of natural science.

J. J. O.

Poems. By ARMEL O'CONNOR. Mary's Meadow. Ludlow, England. $1.00.

In this modest little volume the author gives us to breathe the fragrance of a lyrical nosegay which he gathered for "Violet" in Mary's Meadow. And it is a delicate, quiet fragrance that we scent, like to sweet odors after bitter rain. For from the intimately personal note in many of the poems, it is plain that the writer has heard and felt deeply in his heart the beat of a rain which humanwise we call tears. They are tears for a reality, a truth, an ideal which he loves now the more because it was lost a while. He is not unfamiliar with the sweet, sad music of humanity, and so he has pitched his key in a sympathetic quaver. In "Sorrow's Voice" he strikes the buoyant note.

That Life is Sorrow's voice of joy, with such philosophy his vision lifts

> From cares that tie one to the mean
> And little things of life to "the radiant path that lies behind the stars." And so his singing for the larger part of the book is hopeful and pensively sweet. It is religious, too, with many a stave for Our Saviour and His Mother.

It is well that Mr. O'Connor gave last place to "The Ghost" and "Inspiration," for they seem to be vague, hazy, groping, evidently of the twilight hour, "when bleeding feet were puzzled" before "The Quest." We suggest that "February Dawn" be omitted from a second edition of the "Poems." H. H.

Breviarium Romanum .Ex-Decreto Sacrosancti Concilii Tridentini Restitutum, S. Pii V, Pontificis Maximi Jussu Editum Aliorumque Pontificum Cura Recognitum, Pii Papæ X Auctoritate Reformatum. Neo-Eboraci: Apud Fratres Benziger. $8.75 et $11.00.

Those who have been waiting for the arrival of the new edition of the "Roman Breviary," that H. Dessain, of Malines, announced, will be glad to hear that a consignment of these moderate-priced volumes has at last reached this country. The books must have been well on their way, perhaps via Antwerp, some weeks before Malines was shelled. In view of the fact that the only business now being transacted in Belgium is that of war and destruction, many American priests will probably have to wait some time longer for their new "Mechlins." The attractive features of the present edition are its convenient size, low price and extended text. It is an 18mo, not an inch thick, can be had in flexible morocco for $8.75, or in Alaska seal for $11.00. The priest can read his "little hours" without turning back for the hymns and prayers that occur every day, and all the responses of the second nocturn actually follow the lessons.

Since breviaries are our theme, mention should also be made here of the beautiful 12mo Ratisbon edition Pustet is selling in this country for $14.50. In our issue of June 6, a notice was given his attractive 8vo edition, the price of which is $11.25. The present set is more sumptuous still, and, of course, has all the practical conveniences the smaller volumes possess. If to these three varieties of breviary is added the 12mo, $11.50, Tours edition, of which Benziger Bros. are the American agents, even the most critical should be able to find the set that pleases him best. W. D.

Romanism in the Light of History. By Randolph H. McKim, D.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

The function of words and names is, ordinarily, to convey meanings, and because of this it is an established convention that the speaker should so speak that his auditor may know what he is talking about. There are, however, classic instances where this rule has been departed from, and a word has assumed a terrible and far-reaching connotation on the part of the user. There is the case of the old lady who found a world of meaning tucked away in the word "Mesopotamia": clearly an example of litotes. Then again, when Humpty Dumpty used the word "impenetrability" he explained to Alice that the inward meaning or thing signified was far in excess of the mere word. Let us take an example nearer home. Generally speaking, the word "Republicanism" connotes the whole extent of the substantive "Republican"; and by the same token the word "Romanism" should indicate the whole art and practice of a Roman. But there are Romans and Romans; from Horatius Cocles, who performed feats at the breach of the Tiber bridge, to Ernesto Nathan, who performed feats at the breach of the Porta Pia; and Dr. McKim's book is about none of these. With him "Romanism" is a kind of synthetic way of saying: "The Devotions and Practices of the Catholic Church whereby she is distinguished from all the heresies and schisms." This is, of course, a great responsibility to place on one word; but it is an admirable example of twentieth century efficiency.

To say that Dr. McKim understands neither the Catholic Church nor its doctrines would be stating the case very mildly; and the fact that he mixes up the "Denial of the Cup to the laity" and the Temporal Power of the Pope with such things as the dogma of the Immaculate Conception and Infallibility shows how inadequate is his conception of what the Catholic Church demands as the standard of Catholic belief. That Dr. McKim is conservative is shown by his heroic clinging to the old Protestant interpretation of the Petrine texts: this in the face of modern scholars such as the Anglican divine Plummer, and Montefiore the liberal Jew, neither of whom has any Catholic interest in the true interpretation of these texts. Nor will he have it that St. Peter ever was in Rome, although the ancient tradition is supported by such modern scholarship as the historical researches of Mr. Edmundson in his Bampton Lectures at Oxford in 1913.

Any serious intention this book might possess is vitiated by the fact that its objections to the Catholic Church were all refuted long before Dr. McKim set pen to paper. Nor can references to the Protestant Alliance Magazine of London call forth respect any more than references to the Menace, of which journal it is an English cousin: and excerpts from the statistics of Joseph McCabe, ex-friar, ex-priest, and agnostic prove—that arithmetic is the science of numbers. In attacking the doctrine of Transubstantiation and Confession the Doctor places himself at issue with a large number of his fellow Anglicans; and a cheap descant upon such topics as the Inquisition, Catholic marriage laws, and the morals of Catholics, shows the purpose of this book, which is to discredit Catholics in general before the eyes of the world, and American Catholics in particular, before the eyes of their fellow citizens. What becomes of the Anglican appeal to sound learning when we are entertained with the spectacle of a divine, gracefully bearing up the Fathers with one hand, whilst with the other hand he slings mud? It is an effort that would have delighted the hearts of the "glorious Reformers" of old, who found in such tactics an effective expression of liberty of conscience. H. C. W.

Im Ringen der Zeit. Sozialethische und Sozialstudentische Skizzen von Dr. Herm. Platz. M. Gladbach: Volksvereins-Verlag. 1.20 Mark.

Luxus und Verantwortlichkeit. Von Dr. Phil. Maria Maresch-Jezewicz. M. Gladbach: Volksvereins-Verlag. 40 Pfennig.

One danger often contingent on attendance at institutions of higher education is the excessive attraction which sports exercise over so many of our best and most promising students. The consequence is that they enter upon life without any preparation for the social mission which awaits them. This holds true, likewise, of our Catholic graduates. If they have been accustomed to devote all their leisure to pleasure, they are not likely to change their habits and suddenly to sacrifice themselves to the service of others. It was not thus that men like Ozanam, Kolping and Bishop von Ketteler were formed. Sodalities in particular must afford the needed opportunities of preparation during student years for a life of charitable, social and civic usefulness. Our young students can in particular be taught to participate in the organized works of charity and other forms of religious and social service, undertaken by approved Catholic organizations.

Suggestive for this work, and filled with noble incentive and enthusiasm, are the successive volumes of the Studenten-Bibliothek, edited by the Secretariate for Students' Social Work at M. Gladbach, the centre of Catholic social activity in Germany. The first of the booklets mentioned here is the twentieth of the "Students' Library" series, and contains discussions of social problems from an ethical point of view. The second deals with the part played by luxury in our modern life and the struggle which must be waged against it by our Catholic young men and women who have been given the advantage of a Catholic higher education with the great accountability it implies. Other volumes of this series are even of a more directly practical kind. Though not always applicable to our own conditions they can not fail to be suggestive. All of them should be familiar to our students and professors in order that they too may go and "do likewise."

J. H.

The Poet. By MEREDITH NICHOLSON. With Pictures by Franklin Booth and Decorations by W. A. Dwiggins. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.30.

When not engaged in composing imperishable verses the central figure of this charming story is chiefly occupied in bringing smiles to little children's faces, arranging lovers' meetings, and ending the estrangement of a wife from her husband. He is the "poet all people love" and the reader is sure to be infected with their enthusiasm. Men and women who frequent the divorce courts, the poet complains, interfere seriously with his business. He refuses to stand by and see the little fringes he has attached to old fabrics torn off. He protests against the modern widening of the gulf between poetry and life, and speaks to his fellow authors these words of warning:

> None of us lives all to himself. All of us who write must keep that in mind; our responsibility. When I was a schoolboy I found a misspelled word in a book I was reading and I kept misspelling that word for twenty years. We must be careful what we put into print; we never can tell who's going to be influenced by what we write. Don't let anybody fool you into thinking that the virile book has to be a nasty one. There's too much of that sort of thing. They talk about warning the innocent; but there's not much sense in handing a child the hot end of a poker, just to make it dread the fire.

The reader is sure to like the poetical reporter, and winsome Little Marjorie. Marion, though she thinks herself a pantheist, is very amiable too. The novel is pervaded by Mr. Nicholson's whimsical humor and the important element in human happiness idealism holds is adroitly shown. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus Catholic Truth Committee, the Encyclopedia Bureau of New York is getting out at low prices a new edition of the "Catholic Encyclopedia." The twelve editors and directors of the publication announce that the work "is designed to be the starting point of a movement among Catholics, a great educational movement in every Catholic home in the land, the source of a literature that will re-Catholicize the English tongue." Such a worthy enterprise merits complete success. As the sixteen handsome volumes of the "Catholic Encyclopedia" can now be had bound in cloth for $29.00 and in half-morocco for $49.00, this valuable work of reference should soon be in thousands of Catholic homes.

G. P. Putnam's Sons have asked us to correct the implication in our note on "Monsignor Villarosa," in AMERICA for September 26, that the author, Pompeo, Duke Litta, is not a real personage. We are aware that he is, for a reason that need not be discussed here, and we fully accept the Putnam statement that their transactions with him were bona fide; but it still remains true that the intrinsic evidence points to feminine authorship of the English Protestant fanatical type. An Italian nobleman may hate the Pope, but he would hardly call him "the secular omnipotence of the Scarlet Woman of the Seven Hills." The publishers are protected by a foreword which declares that the main incidents are untrue; and their "Advance Book News" states that Duke Litta's agrarian experiments, which are ascribed to Bishop Villarosa, were frustrated by the Socialists, whereas the novel assigns their frustration to the wicked clericals. The book is false in fact, sentiment and trend; and that it should be written by some other than the reputed author would not be unprecedented among decadent nobles. The only intrinsic evidence in favor of foreign authorship is its frequently ungrammatical and unidiomatic English.

"Outside the Walls" (Herder, $1.25) is the title of a book into which Mr. Benjamin Francis Musser has gathered certain "tributes to the principle and practice of Roman Catholicism from our friends Fuori le Mura, which he contributed originally to the New York Freeman's Journal. Under twenty-three chapter headings the compiler arranges the results of a diligent inspection of papers and periodicals and of standard authors, and he furnishes an index of "sources." But the rambling, disconnected character of the citations is, of course, the common drawback of books of this kind. Preachers, controversialists and "seekers after light," however, should find the book useful. Mr. Musser calls Walter Pater a convert. Many would like to learn the authority for that statement.

The first series of the "Lives of English Martyrs" whom Pope Leo XIII declared blessed was published originally by Burns & Oates, in 1904 and 1905, as the hundredth and hundred and first numbers of the "Quarterly Series." The valuable work has now been reissued by Longmans, Green & Co. ($5.00). Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B., it will be remembered, is the editor of the two volumes and has also written a number of the lives, Fathers Bowden, Keogh, Phillips, Pollen, Morris and Stanton being the other contributors. In the first volume are sketches of those who suffered under Henry VIII, and in the second are short lives of twenty-four martyrs that Elizabeth made from 1570 to 1583. Each volume is furnished with a scholarly introduction by the editor. No Catholic library that is without these books can be called well equipped.

The Christian Brothers of Ireland brought out on September 8 the first number of Our Boys, a monthly journal. The new publication has for its aim:

> To interest, instruct and inspire the boys of our Catholic schools, to create in them a taste for clean literature, to continue the character-forming lessons of their school days, to fire their enthusiasm for what is noble and good, to inflame their love of country, and to help in preserving them as devoted children of Our Holy Mother the Church.

An inspection of the twenty-four pages of the paper shows that the editors are already realizing these high purposes pretty well. There are some reminiscences of his school days by Father McSweeney, of Maynooth. Mr. Denis McCarthy, of the Sacred Heart Review, contributes a stirring poem, and the stories are varied and interesting. There is also a Gaelic page for the erudite and "Sport" for the athletic. "Our Boys" of Ireland are those, of course, to whom the new journal makes its chief appeal, but Catholic lads of other countries will also like the paper. One dollar mailed to Kenny's Publishing Department, 65 Middle Abbey Street, Dublin, will secure a year's subscription. AMERICA wishes Our Boys a long life and a prosperous one.

Mr. Joyce Kilmer, whose "Trees and Other Poems" Doran, by the bye, is announcing, writes from England to the New York Times that many London publishers are giving to the Prince of Wales Relief Fund all the profits they are deriving from the sale of war books. As there is not much else being published, that means a great deal. Moreover, a number of authors, not to be outdone in patriotism, are offering their royalties to the fund. Mr. Kilmer reports that:

> Hilaire Belloc had intended to make a tour of the United States this winter, lecturing in the principal cities. But he is now so busy writing about the war for Land and Water, a weekly paper to which his contributions have given great popularity, that he may decide to postpone his trip. Also there is a possibility of his going to the front as soldier, interpreter or correspondent.

The latest book of that remarkably versatile author, who has taken all literature as his province, is "The Book of the Bayeux Tapestry," recently published in this country by Putnam.

The London Times Literary Supplement has these words of commendation for "Oddsfish!" Mgr. Benson's new novel:

> "Oddsfish!" unlike many of its kind, may claim its value as history. It is also a novel. It tells a pretty and tragic love-story, which is just sufficiently woven into the history not to seem a concession and a patch. But the remarkable thing in the book is the characterization of the King. He may be said, in the cant phrase, to "live in these pages." . . . Mgr. Benson seems to understand Charles, good and bad, merry and woful, wise and foolish, fascinating and repellent; and he has put all the contradictions together into a single and recognizable human being. His success with the Duke of York is scarcely less; but that was an easier task. The story is told by a young Catholic who is sent from Rome on a secret mission to help the King where he can, the ultimate end, of course, being his admission into the Church of Rome; and it is chiefly the King's relations with the Catholics in which Mr. Mallock is concerned. He sees all the affairs of Oates' Popish plot and the murder of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey; he takes a very important and difficult hand in the complicated game of the Rye House plot; finally, it is he who brings the priest to the bedside of the dying King. There never was, we suppose, such a person as Mr. Roger Mallock; yet Mgr. Benson's description of the King's death may fairly take its place as a piece of just and absorbingly interesting history.

Mgr. Benson's new historical novel seems to equal in excellence his two stories of contemporary life, "The Average Man" and "Initiation." "Oddsfish!" will soon be published in this country by P. J. Kenedy & Sons and by Dodd, Mead & Co.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Bros., New York:
Fine Clay. By Isabel C. Clark. $1.35; Im Kampf um Lourdes. Ein Deutscher Roman von Lucens. Mk. 3.50; What Think You of Christ? By Francis H. A. Cahusac. $0.35; The Conversion of Cæsare Putti. By W. Hall-Patch. $0.35.

Century Co., New York:
The Renaissance, the Protestant Revolution and the Catholic Reformation in Continental Europe. By Edward Maslin Hulme. $2.50.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The College Course and the Preparation for Life. By Albert Parker Fitch. $1.25.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
The Rosie World. By Parker Fillmore. $1.30.

Jewish Publication Society of America, Philadelphia:
The Jewish Year Book 5675 (1914-1915).

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Simplicity. By Bishop de Gibergues. $0.60.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
The Single Hound, Poems of a Life Time. By Emily Dickenson. $1.00.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Christianity and Economic Science. By W. Cunningham. $0.90.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
They Who Question. $1.35; Hoof and Claw. By Charles C. D. J. Roberts. $1.35.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
On Acting. By Brander Matthews. $0.75; Poems. By Edward Sandford Martin. $1.50; Gideon's Band. By George W. Cable. $1.35; Criticism. By W. C. Brownell. $0.75.

University of Chicago Press, Chicago:
The Problems of Boyhood. By Franklin Winslow Johnson. $1.00.

Joseph F. Wagner, New York:
The Signification of BERAKA. A Semasiological Study of the Semitic Stem B-R-K. By Thomas Plassmann, O.F.M.

United States Catholic Historical Society:
Historical Records and Studies. Vol. VII. Edited by Charles George Herbermann, LL.D.

World Book Co., Yonkers, New York:
Indian Days of the Long Ago. By Edward S. Curtis.

EDUCATION

The Era of Reconstruction

In education, as in theology, there is a Modernism which is unto death, and a modernism which is nothing more than a common-sense adaptation of lawful means to attain a desirable end. Happily, Modernism in theology can be defined and condemned by ecclesiastical authority. Unfortunately, modern pedagogy bows down to no Pontifex Maximus. However carefully it may arrange its school programs, it can send them forth from the pedagogical laboratory with no guarantee of their orthodoxy. Their value as a means of educational salvation can be fixed only after they have been tried. Of necessity, they are in the nature of an experiment, and the corpus vile of the experimentation is the mind of the child.

Since the program makers began their work, at least as far back as Aristotle, this tinkering with the mind of the child has a fairly long history. The experience of these centuries has supplied us with a mass and variety of results, from which a consistent body of pedagogical principles, true for all times and places, may be drawn; principles which, if properly applied, will help the child to take his proper place in this world, and to remember that there is another world beyond these bounds of time and space. Certainly, human activities vary with the changing requirements of civilized existence in succeeding centuries. Therefore these principles must be readjusted from time to time. But it must be a readjustment, not an abandonment, nor an essential change. For human nature, which is the principle of this activity, remains itself essentially unchanged.

Modern pedagogy, unconsciously perhaps, has suggested many a new and useful application of old principles to modern instances. Let this be freely acknowledged. But its fundamental error seems to lie in its practical assumption that new activities necessarily require a new principle of activity. Hence, programs of study, not without value in an age when man's activity was confined to a restricted sphere, must be rejected in our larger day, or so fused with newer plans that their real nature and consequent efficiency are destroyed. This principle of the new pedagogy was stated with emphasis some years ago by Dr. Eliot, who cited "the immense widening and deepening of human interests brought about in the nineteenth century," as the first and final justification of his theory of electivism in the colleges.

With this concept of education, forced at last by the great authority unthinkingly conceded Dr. Eliot, rather than by a willing approbation accorded after critical examination of happy results in the classroom, came the lauded "deepening and widening" of the college curriculum. This radical change soon made itself felt in the secondary, and even in the elementary, schools. The champions of the older pedagogy were loath to part with a curriculum which, subject as it always was to readjustment, was yet thought to contain all that the experience of centuries had fully proved to be of prime importance in the educational process. For a time, the conservative schools held to the sufficiency of a training which was based upon mathematics, the cultural subjects and philosophy, which exacted in the primary schools a thorough discipline in reading, writing, spelling, grammar and arithmetic, and which from the outset stressed the duty of submission to authority. This training they believed to be both cultural and disciplinary. Schools of this type freely admitted that their curriculum left the student in ignorance of many subjects of interest, yet of secondary importance. But they held that they could best fit the student for the professional and intensive studies of later years, by concentrating his attention upon a few subjects of known value. They were not ready to cram the curriculum with a variety of uncorrelated topics, nor to adopt a new method of education which had nothing to recommend it, beyond the approbation of a system which, as yet, had not justified even its own existence.

But it soon became clear that, outside the Catholic Church, these champions were fighting a losing fight. With the abandonment, in varying degree of completeness, of the old standards, came an era of attempted reconstruction, in which education has fared as badly as did good government in the South, in the days of the carpet-bagger. For the last quarter century, the American school has witnessed a bewildering succession of reform movements. New methods have been introduced, new studies have replaced the old, on the plea that these changes were "a necessary readjustment to the great revolutions that have taken place in industrial and social life and in scientific progress generally." While a thing is not necessarily good or bad because it is old, neither is novelty alone an adequate guarantee of value. Like the Areopagites of St. Paul's time, our school authorities have exhibited a striking fondness for hearing, and for adopting, new and untried things. Child-study, for instance, pursued in a spirit of sympathy which knew too little of scientific precision, gave a new impetus some decades ago to the Kindergarten. Affecting the very root of the educational process, it was to renew in time the face of the educational world. Experience has cooled the enthusiasm of those earlier years. The Kindergarten is still with us, although in some parts of the country it is little more than a day-nursery. Very properly, superintendents of public instruction are not always free to shout from the housetops the secret sentiments of their hearts, but one need not be a searcher of hearts to be well aware that many among them regard the toys of Froebel with distrust. It is fairly clear, that either from a misapplication of Froebelian principles, or from some defect inherent in the principles themselves, the Kindergarten too often fails to prepare the child for even the light and easy discipline of the primary grades. And when, as frequently happens, the methods of the kindergartner are allowed to slip into these grades, the results are even worse. Dr. C. A. McMurry, Director of the Training Department of the Illinois State Normal School, complains that "in primary reading, bright-colored pictures are sometimes used so profusely as to draw the children's attention away from the essentials of reading," and further, that "in primary number work, the children are kept too long working with blocks, splints, and counting material." It may yet be found that we too eagerly discarded the old-fashioned New England Primer and its legitimate descendants for the empty toy-books, exquisitely edited by the modern publisher, and obligingly adopted by careless school boards.

In the grammar schools, "the immense widening and deepening of human interests" has introduced domestic science, iron-working, military and naval training, nature-study, calisthenics, dancing, basket-weaving, classes for little mothers, carpentering, language lessons to the exclusion of formal grammar, commercial geography, commercial English, moving-pictures, and is now threatening phonetic spelling and sex-hygiene. As mere knowledge, many of these subjects are undoubtedly useful and, perhaps, valuable. But it is not at all certain that they are either cultural or disciplinary, to a degree which properly entitles them to a place in the curriculum of a school intended primarily for normal children. It will be understood, of course, that in no one program do all of these "studies" appear. But if even two or three of them be added to the already well-filled program, what is to become of the fundamental subjects of the grammar school, reading, writing, arithmetic? "The few pre-adamites who still cling to the long obsolete gospel of the three R's," writes the editor of the New York Sun, "must be hopelessly dazed by that all-sciolist compound which the wisdom of the modern calls education." The further fact that our modern reformers are now determined to cut down the daily time-schedule, and to shorten the preparatory courses by two or three years, gives us reason to fear that the old-fashioned "plain-schooling," which very often turned out a boy who could "write legibly, read intelligently and cipher accurately," is soon to be replaced by a system whose choicest product will be a callow youth with well-developed fingers, under-developed wits, and a bulky, ill-balanced assortment of facts about a variety of things, which he will probably forget a year or two after he has left school. Mental training, as a purpose in education, seems to have been lost in the welter of an overcrowded, unsymmetrical curriculum. To impart information and to develop the body, appears to be the aim of the modern school.

> Broad indeed is our education, writes the New York Sun, and as deep as a rain drop; and happily able to dispense with fundamentals and essentials. So broad that a good many public school graduates habitually use two negatives, and can't spell.

It is always easy to pick flaws. But in these days, when the charm and power of the modern pedagogy, particularly as exemplified by the public school, are dinned into Catholic ears, and when in some quarters devotion to the public school is held to be essential to true patriotism, it is well to demand, with some peremptoriness, the credentials which justify the perfection claimed. The demand can not be satisfied. Nor will the ungrateful task of "picking flaws" be wholly useless, if it leaves us with a truer valuation of our own schools. These, for all their faults, are founded upon principles which are not of yesterday, principles justified alike by history and by present experience.

P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

Convict J 3217

Huddled in the corner of his cage, Convict J 3217 mumbles that he "never did have no chanst." As I know something of the early history of Convict J 3217, I append a nihil obstat to the only line of autobiography which he will ever give to the world.

Convict J 3217 was born in "The Bottoms," a section of our town which has furnished alumni to the penitentiaries of several States. An unwelcome guest, he came when the leaves were falling. Nobody wanted him, but it was a bit hard to get rid of him, and no questions asked. How he managed to live through his first winter no one knows, least of all his mother, who, when sober, eked out a precarious existence as scrubwoman in one of the downtown office buildings. She called him "Johnny, darlin'" in her maudlin moments, poor thing, and something else when the glow of the spirits, that for the moment made her hard world seem a little less brutal, had died away. After a hulking loafer had appeared, to preside over the fortunes of the dingy menage down by the tracks, he heard that his other name was "Jones." Early in his conscious existence Johnny had learned two paths. Along one he toddled with a pail to the corner saloon. At a somewhat maturer age he trudged down the other to the tracks to steal coal. This last was a distinct advance, postulating a keen eye to note the proximity of "cops," a swift foot to elude their pursuit should a flank movement bring them unexpectedly upon the scene. By the time he had outgrown his baby lisp the conversation of his excellent parents had supplied him wth a choice vocabulary. These sometimes had differences. Johnny soon learned that an argument which admits of no immediate rejoinder is a flat-iron or a beer bottle, accurately aimed at the head of your opponent. At the age of ten Johnny could lie and curse and steal and fight and drink. He had his own "gang," and his admiring companions united with the police in putting him on the waiting list of that choice organization known as "Egan's Rats." But, although Johnny did not know it, his education was woefully incomplete. A great college had not as yet put her mark on him. This want was soon to be partly supplied, for one day he hit a policeman in the ear with a rock, a sharp-edged rock of fair weight, a rock aimed hard and true. As is well known, to assault a policeman is a crime only less heinous than to murder a blind man for the sake of his pennies. The next policeman who laid eyes on Johnny enwrapped him in the meshes of the law, and thus entangled Johnny remained three days in the Bridewell awaiting trial. This was in the eighties, remember. We no longer throw children into jail, even bad children, for throwing rocks, even at policemen.

In the indiscriminate crowd of men and boys, ranging from "plain drunks" to appalling degenerates, who were herded in the "bull-pen" of the Bridewell, Johnny learned some methods of making evil profitable as well as pleasant, of which in his small and sordid world he had never dreamed. Brought into the police court the judge momentarily surveyed Johnny's small figure with amusement, and looked over the next case on the docket while a policeman told a direful story of how Johnny was not only a neglected boy, but a bad boy, headed straight for the gallows. "He oughta be tied up somewhere." Perhaps the policeman was right. At any rate this judicial hearing in which the only factor considered was Johnny's tear-stained, frightened little face, took about five minutes. At its conclusion the judge looked up from his papers and told Johnny to "get out and don't do it again." Let us not blame him overmuch. He didn't want to send Johnny to jail, but he was too busy just then to figure out a plan for Johnny's reformation. Besides, that was none of his business. As he understood it, the law did not propose to reform people, but to punish them, thereby warning other possible evil-doers. The common criminal law, it is true, made no distinction between an adult and a minor who, like Johnny, reached the age of criminal responsibility at ten years. Custom, however, allowed him to shield minors by discharging them from custody, i.e., by immediately returning them to the environments which were the occasion and the contributing cause of their crimes.

As this is not a complete biography, with notes and appendices, of Johnny Jones, now known as Convict J 3217, we will only say that Johnny returned to the "gang" a crowned hero. Attached to the wheel of his triumphal car was a policeman with a wounded ear. His path was lighted by the aura of three glorious days spent in jail. Henceforth throughout the "Bottoms" Johnny possessed kudos and auctoritas. For a discussion of these terms you are referred to your dusty Greek and Latin dictionaries. Briefly, however, they imply that Johnny was the glorious and undisputed monarch of all he surveyed. He now advanced rapidly. By the time he had learned to vote more than once in the same election, but in different precincts, under a name previously supplied by its "Boss," and always at a price, he had an excellent police record, and was among the leaders of "Egan's Rats." He surely would have become Grand Rodent or something of that illustrious body had not an untimely raid of the police resulted in the snuffing out of the life of Policeman Murphy, an honest, conscientious guardian of the law, who left a widow and four or five small children to mourn him. The police said that Johnny was the gun-man, but the benefit of a slight doubt changed the sentence from the scaffold to life imprisonment.

Johnny was never an asset to Society. He never did an honest day's work in his life, except when he was in jail. In property, stolen or destroyed, in the cost of many arraignments and jail terms, he represents a financial loss of thousands of dollars. He destroyed a useful life. He brought grief and disgrace upon many decent poor folk whose sons, and daughters too sometimes, he taught to follow him.

Who's to blame? Do you remember Nast's famous cartoon of the Tweed Ring? Circle-wise they stand, these worthies, and every man of them points the accusing digit at his neighbor. Our acquaintance with Johnny's parents allows us to say that these gave him "no chanst." What they taught him led him to the Bridewell where he got his start in a career of active disorder. As Johnny views the matter from his cage, all that Society ever did for him, Society as represented by that police judge, was to teach him disrespect for law and order. When Johnny began to practise that lesson Society protected itself by throwing him into jail. In providing for the welfare of the many, by depriving the individual of his misused liberty, Society was but doing its duty. But, oh the difference to Johnny and to Johnny's victims, had that police judge, instead of looking on him as a useless bit of driftwood, seen in him a neglected, ill-used child, whom decent care and a little love might have developed into a man, a useful citizen, instead of Convict J 3217. No, we can't blame the judge much; but we can look back with wonder at the crass stupidity of a system which, in the letter of the law at least, made no distinction between adults and minors of seven or ten years of age, and which in imposing or remitting sentence cared little or not at all for the child's reformation.

Only after a great many Johnnies had passed in hurried review before busy or undiscerning police judges did we begin to realize that, in default of proper guardians, Society had some charge, as yet unfulfilled, over these poor waifs. By degrees a principle long recognized in law, the parens patriæ power of the State, found expression in the Children's Court. Catholics are rightly jealous of any undue assumption of parental authority by the civil power. But we do not think that the principle upon which the Juvenile Court is based implies undue invasion of parental rights. In fact the Juvenile Court's greatest triumph is its success in awakening negligent parents to a sense of their duty. The neglected, ill-treated, or apparently incorrigible child is taken in charge by the State only after the parents have been clearly shown to be unwilling or unable to exercise their inalienable parental rights. In its procedure the Court proposes to view these children not as criminals but as children in need of aid, encouragement and guidance. Its primary purpose is not punishment but reformation. Not "is this child guilty or not guilty," but, "considering all the circumstances, what is the best thing I can do to help this child?" is the first question which the Court endeavors to answer.

Let us freely admit that, in practice, the Juvenile Court is still far from perfection. In its two most important functions, investigation and probation, in which it should be strongest, it is weakest. Moreover, it is peculiarly open to the inroads of sociological "cranks." All this may be admitted. But do you think that, if back in the eighties the Juvenile Court had been established in our town, Convict J 3217 could now complain with any show of justice that he "never did have no chanst"?

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Most of the astronomical expeditions arranged to study the solar eclipse of August 21 last were either unable to organize or to reach the positions assigned them because of the war. According to the New York Evening Post, from only two points have reports of successful observations been received. Results of value have been reported by the Rev. Aloysius Cortie, S.J., of Stonyhurst College, who was commissioned to observe the eclipse at Hernoesand, Sweden, by the Royal Astronomical Society.

As noted on another page the charge made in an official communication from the Kaiser to the President of the United States that Belgian priests had been guilty of "outrages against wounded soldiers, doctors and nurses," has, after investigation, been officially withdrawn. While many, no doubt, refused to believe the original accusation, Catholics may feel quite sure that not a few gave it full credence. Bigotry has already begun to exploit the alleged crimes of the Belgian priesthood, and there is little doubt that, for years to come, these cruel slanders will be cited as official and irrefutable proof of the real character of the Catholic priest.

The Rev. Cyril H. Stenson, B.A., an Anglican clergyman, was received into the Catholic Church at Caldey Abbey recently. The monks of Caldey have also been privileged to offer a home to Benedictine refugee monks from two abbeys within the war zone in Belgium. The entire novitiate and some of the oldest monks of the Abbaye de Saint André de Bruges have fled to Caldey. They were received by the Mayor and some residents of the litle Welsh town of Tenby, who offered them assistance as they passed through the town to the island. Other refugee monks at Caldey are from the Abbey of St. Benedict at Maredsous. The famous library of 600,000 volumes which this abbey possesses has been packed for safety in the crypt of the church. The monastery was occupied by German troops, and the latest dispatches state that the monks are all dispersed. The Abbot, Dom Columba Marmion, is at present residing temporarily at Caldey, but his monks have fled for refuge to all parts of Europe. An unconfirmed report states that the abbey church of Maredsous has been destroyed.

One of the astonishing incidents of the great war, says the Boston Transcript, has been its influence in arousing opposition to alcoholic liquors. Yet one fails to see why this movement should be called "astonishing." War is a brutal thing, yet it often exposes shams, and one of these shams is that a nation's greatness is in proportion to the amount of alcohol consumed by its people. The warring nations have simply acknowledged that too much alcohol heightens the general disorder, and checks military efficiency. The Russian Minister of Finance has received an imperial order that the prohibition of the sale of vodka, originally a war measure, is to be continued indefinitely. In France, Raphael George Lévy, a well-known economist, writes in the Figaro:

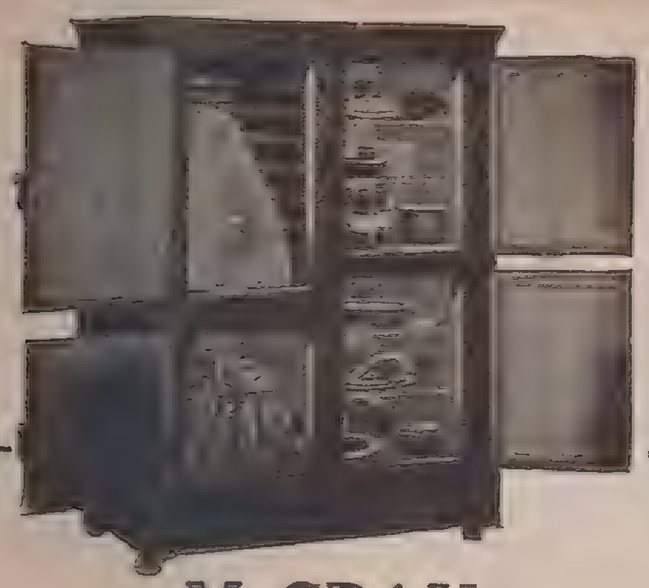
> We have already stopped the sale of absinthe. Why halt on the road? It is often only when favored by a great current of enthusiasm and national revival like that which crosses the country at this moment that virile resolutions can be taken. Vive la France et mort à l'alcool!

While Lévy holds that alcohol is France's greatest enemy, he admits that it will be impossible to close all liquor shops. But he urges a progressive diminution in their number, and an enforcement of law which will put an end to all secret and illegal manufacture and sale of alcoholic stimulants.

New York has recently lost, by resignation, one of the most eminent professional "uplifters" in captivity. For some years, this gentleman has been laying down the lines along which the public, private, official and social life of New York might be lived with his wise approval. Much that was evil had first to be cleared away. Bending his shoulders to this gigantic task, he has been uplifting for some years, with an unceasing energy not surpassed by a steam-shovel unloading a Lake Erie ore-barge. It is sad to relate that most people refused to take him seriously, and that the net result of all this uplifting seems to be a quarrel with the board that paid his salary. The Federal Treasury will miss him, comments the New York Sun, for he was a literary gentleman whose output of letters, filled with advice, admonition, forecasts and corrections, was almost without bounds.

> Some unsung genius, says the Sun, we may have robbed of his due, but to this gentleman we have always attributed those frank and intimate epistles in which the organization over which he presided, generously offered to edit all the newspapers, gather all the news, expose all the rascals, commend all the good men, and bear the burden of credit for whatever of improvement the world might show with increasing years. There has been an assurance, a calm superiority, an assumption of responsibility, about these communications that seemed to mark them as the product of an unmistakably higher spirit.

Non-Catholic schools of sociology weep much over the benighted Catholic methods of reform, which they affect to consider inefficient and anti-social. But if there is one factor, evil above all others, in this sociological work, it is the influence of the paid worker, the product of a school which eliminated grace from the forces of social reform, and which commercializes charity.



In this cultured day, it is scarcely necessary to point out that clubs, half-bricks and table-legs have long been considered unsuitable arguments by those debaters who move in our best society. But suppose that your opponent, suddenly and without justification, attacks your moral character, or worse, questions the good name of your mother? Suppose, further, that he hires a public hall, and to evoke the ribald hee-haws of a foul-minded mob, pours out obscene stories about your wife, your sister, or your daughter? Suppose, still further, that, not content with this, he puts all this vileness in a book or paper, which by favor of a weak-kneed Government, the mails will spread all over the country?

Is one justified in using a club to reduce a moral pervert of this type to silence, or of persuading him, by means of half a brick, to look upon the error of his ways and, in future, abandon them?

Catholics know the restraint which their religion puts upon them. Frugality, moreover, discountenances a course in which a perfectly good club might be spoiled. Deliberating upon this ethical point, a Kansas poet, Walt Mason by name, says in the gentle manner of a poet, that a man guilty of such vileness "deserves anything unpleasant that may happen to him."

> At present, writes the poet in the Emporia Gazette, a lot of noisy people who should be attending to their own business are howling that the Catholic Church is a menace. Newspapers are published for the sole purpose of carrying on this insane crusade, and they are read by hundreds of thousands of foolish people, who actually believe the stuff they find in them. Now be reasonable. There are many Catholics in Emporia. Has anybody the effrontery to say that the Emporia Catholics are a menace to anybody or anything? Can anybody deny that they are excellent citizens? Do they ever bother anybody, or try to force their creed on others? An answer might appropriately come from some of the many poor people who have received generous treatment at St. Mary's Hospital.

If all men were reasonable, these "noisy people" of whom Mr. Mason complains would soon be silenced. But attacks on the Church of a certain kind will always be welcomed by low-browed persons who feed their substitutes for minds upon moral filth.

McCRAY Refrigerators

are used in the best Catholic Institutions and in thousands of the finest Private Residences.

Any McCray can be arranged to ice from the outside. Hundreds of Catholic Institutions use McCray Refrigerators, either stock sizes or built in, and find them the greatest convenience and comfort as well as big savers of ice.

Send us a floor plan with dimensions and our designing department will work out the best and most economical solution of your refrigerator problem, furnishing blue prints, or suggesting a suitable stock size without cost or obligation.

Write for Catalog
No. 50 for Catholic Institutions. No. 91 for Residences.

The McCray Refrigerator Co.
682 Lake St., Kendallville, Ind.
Branches in all principal cities

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says' to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcase

THERE comes a time when every library outgrows its bookcase. Then, if you own a Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcase, you simply add a few more sections for the newcomers. They cost no more than the ordinary kind and are built to endure. On sale by 2000 agents. We pay freight to nearest railroad station. Send for "The World's Best Books" Mailed on request with Catalog RR-10-1.
Cincinnati

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati
Makers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Steel and Wood), Globe Safes, Stationers' Supplies.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

The Coward Good Sense Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

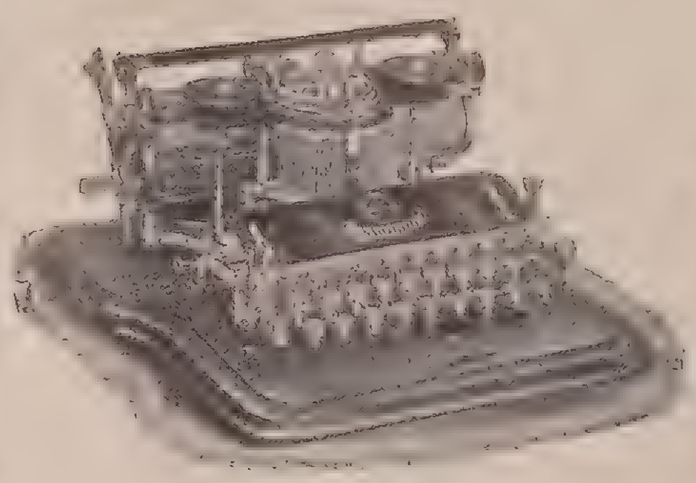
Shoes were originally made to protect the feet. No one expected them to be comfortable and no one was disappointed. Coward Good Sense Shoe is the modern embodiment of foot protection and comfort. A favorite Coward model that constantly finds new wearers.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE
JAMES S. COWARD
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York



Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The MULTIPLEX
HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

Important Multiplex Hammond Users

President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River New York, N. Y.

NOW READY

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on their purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
Hudson, Jay & Staple Sts., New York, N. Y.

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each
Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory BOARDING SCHOOL FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

Taught by Mail, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE ME NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Mr. C. W. Wilcox,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sir:

I feel I must tell you how truly pleased I am to realize that, through my efforts, I have been able to place two of my pupils under your direction.

All my life I have been in search of just such a course as you are now giving them. During my stay in France, I tried everywhere, spent much money for the purchase of books, for lessons from celebrated professors, etc., but could find nothing clear, precise and practical.

I felt the want of just such a course. To my great regret, this privilege has been denied me, for I am at the end of my career. At the same time, I am, as ever, very fond of music. It would be an agreeable diversion for me to go over the lessons.

I saw Mother Provincial a few days since; she was delighted when I told her the work of the Sisters and she gave me the names of several others she would like to take the course just as soon as circumstances will permit. With grateful thanks,

Respectfully,
SISTER MARIE LEOCADIE,
151 Tremont St., Fall River, Mass.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Own The Cleaner That Gives The Greatest Service

The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is the most sanitary because it gets everything, from microscopic, germ-laden dust that low-powered cleaners can not reach, to heavy refuse they can not lift. It runs lightly beside you—you don't have to drag it or push it on a stick.

"It's The Speed and Volume of Rushing Air That Count."

The Bissell has highest efficiency at the tool mouth, because it moves more air—at greater speed—than even built-in cleaners costing five and six times as much.

It is now giving complete satisfaction in many Churches, large Office Buildings, Hotels, Theatres, etc., as well as in private homes of all sizes.

No "extras" to buy for any sort of cleaning. We give FREE an Emery and a Buffing Wheel for sharpening knives, polishing silver, etc. Fittings for washing machines, bread mixers, light lathes, etc., furnished at low cost.

Let It Do Your Cleaning for a Month. We will pay the freight and let you test this wonderful Cleaner, and its handy 1/3 H. P. Motor, for one full month for a ridiculously small payment which you may apply on the machine. But there's no obligation.

Easy payments if you wish. Write to-day.

THE BISSELL MOTOR CO.

344 Huron Street

Toledo, Ohio

Note: The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is made and guaranteed by The F. Bisaell Co., Toledo, Ohio, who have no connection with the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.

REPRESENTATIVES WANTED!

AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week WANTS

Bright, intelligent men or women in cities and towns to handle its constantly increasing circulation.

Agents do not have to go out of their home towns to do a good business.

WRITE FOR DETAILS—CIRCULATION BUREAU

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 55 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.

HAVE YOU GOT ONE ?

We mean a Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator, with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll, that ideal assistant, always ready to quickly make 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), costs $5 but we don't want your money until you are satisfied, so if interested just write us to send it on 10 days' trial without deposit. That's fair enough, isn't it? Then send to-day.

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR

HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept. A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each, $3.00 per hundred Double numbers 10 cents each, $6.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

ORDER NOW LATEST NUMBER, OCT. 8 ORDER NOW

JUSTICE TO MEXICO

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad, and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of CATHOLIC MIND. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated. Special rates are granted for large orders.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1903

10. Galileo Galilei Linceo.

1906

15. I. Object of Federation. Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D.
II. Divorce. Hon. Daniel J. Kenefick

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
11. Catholics and the Social Movement. Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
12. Making of a Saint.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
20. The Mass and the Reformation. J. Canon Moyes
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.
11, 12, 13, 14. Calvin's Conversion. I, II, III, IV. Paul Bernard in Etudes
15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20. Catholic Universities. I, II, III, IV, V, VI. Alfred Baudillart
24. Sermon on Cardinal Newman. Joseph Rickaby, S.J.

1910

1. The French Bishops and the Education Problem. Chambrun
3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
16. The Pastor and Education.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

2. Portuguese Revolution.
13, 14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communion. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocylonometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
5. Capital Punishment. John J. Ford, S.J.
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
11. Early Man. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.
14. The Missions of China. A. Hilliard Atteridge
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
20. Lourdes and Its Miracles. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
17. The Blessed Sacrament and Catholic Unity. Rt. Rev. John Cuthbert Hedley, O.S.B., D.D.
18. The Index. Peter Finlay, S.J.

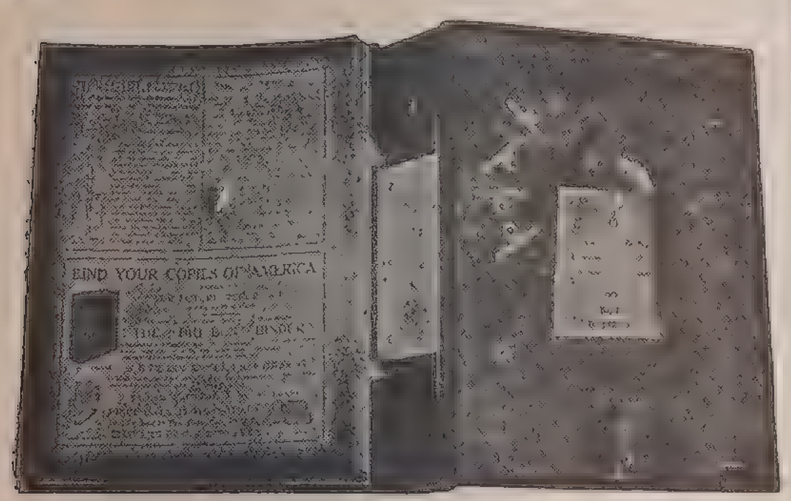
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library



Bind Your Copies of AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

In Book Form

For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen-knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

State .....

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

Mt. St. Mary's College and Academy

PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. College, Academic and Preparatory Courses. Exceptional advantages in Music, Art and Domestic Science. Address Sister Directress.

CARLTON ACADEMY

SUMMIT, NEW JERSEY

A boarding school for boys under Catholic auspices, with laymen as teachers. Resident Chaplain. A country school in the Jersey hills, 21 miles from New York. 7-acre campus, beautiful residence and school buildings. Excellent standing in athletic sports. Small classes individual training. Prepares for college or for business. Catalog on request.

CHARLES H. SCHULTZ, A.M., Headmaster.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

It is in fact a very stirring call for recruits to the highest life, written throughout in a style that will catch the boyish ear, and it might almost be termed a sermon with the Decree of July 15th, 1912, as its text. Father Cassilly makes the most of his case, and does not forget to bring in that eminent member of his Society, Father Ribadeneira, whose vocation took its rise in the very unpromising occasion of a fight with another boy. We wish his pamphlet a large circulation and much fruit, and should like to see a reprint for use in our own country. — The Month.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the

Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth 30 cents	Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70	12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50	100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York

Priests, Brothers and Sisters are much needed in all parts of the United States. Is it not to be feared that many boys and girls who ought to give themselves up to God and to work for souls miss their vocation because they are not properly instructed? Father Cassilly in this "Chat for Young People" explains vocation to religious life and to the priesthood in a simple, attractive way that ought to appeal to our youth.—The Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

SOLID PROGRESS—NO FADS

The man who learns is the man who earns. What of your son? Do not experiment on him.

ST. JOHN'S UNIVERSITY
COLLEGEVILLE, MINN.

a Catholic boarding school for young men and boys can help you shape his manhood. Turns out successful men. Recognized for its splendid location, moral standard, enlightened course of studies, healthy family spirit, the attachment of its alumni, its kindly parental interest in each young man.

Two lakes. 800 acres of timbered rolling woodland. Pure country air. Pure spring water. 291,253 sq. ft. of floor space. All modern improvements. Culinary Department supplied from the Institution's farms and gardens. Opportunity for every young man to enjoy every form of sport. Courses: Shorthand and Typewriting, Music, Drawing, Preparatory, Commercial, High School, College, Science, Philosophy, Theology.

Terms moderate. Petty extravagances discouraged. Limited number only accepted each year. A Personal visit heartily welcomed. For catalogue, address

Very Rev. S. Heid, O.S.B., Rector

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown UniversityHospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

FOUNDED IN 1847

The Alma Mater of numerous prominent ecclesiastics, professional and business men.

XAVIER HIGH SCHOOL
30 West 16th Street, N. Y. City
A SELECT SCHOOL FOR BOYS
Conducted by the Jesuits
Registered by the Regents of the University of the State of New York.
The most accessible school in Manhattan
Near Hudson Tunnels, Sixth Avenue L, Surface Lines and Subway.
Classical Course, Military Drill under the supervision of a U. S. Army Officer, Rifle Practice, Reading-room and Library, Dramatics, Indoor and Outdoor Games and Sports.

XAVIER GRAMMAR SCHOOL
Offers a four years' course preparatory to High School. Separate building and playgrounds.
Classes will be resumed on Sept. 14

For catalogues, address,
REV. THOMAS F. WHITE, S.J.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

IT is good to be in a school that is like a big country home—where 300 acres of field and wood call you out of doors, where the things of the mind are the daily talk, and where the associations train you in a thousand little things. 2 hours from Cincinnati. . . . . Write for our little Brown Booklet.

SCHOOL OF THE BROWN COUNTY URSULINES, St. Martin, Brown County, O.

ACADEMY OF MOUNT ST. URSULA
Bedford Park, New York City
An incorporated school for resident and day pupils. Full elementary course. Four-year academic course preparatory to College and Training School for Teachers. For particulars address
THE MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . . Write to the Directress.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

Academy of Saint Joseph
IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute
For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

MARYMOUNT
Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York
HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the
Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE
WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to
PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY
Adjoining Bronx Park, New York
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city
Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses
St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue
Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest.

Adrian Academy
CONDUCTED BY THE SISTERS OF ST. DOMINIC

THIS new and flourishing institution is offering to the public the greatest educational facilities at the very lowest prices. The Academy enjoys the advantage of a most picturesque and healthful location. The building is commodious, exquisite in construction, and equipped with all the modern improvements.

ADRIAN is situated about 180 miles east of Chicago and is easily reached by the Wabash and Lake Shore Railroads.

TERMS OF TUITION
Including board, washing, mending, etc., $3.00 per week; $12.00 per month; $120 per scholastic year.

LANGUAGES, STENOGRAPHY, TYPEWRITING and TELEGRAPHY taught free

ONLY EXTRAS — Music, full course, two hours' lesson a week and two hours' practice a day, $16.00 a semester (five months), $32.00 per year. Half course, two half-hour lessons a week, two half-hour practices a day, $8.00 a semester, $16.00 per year. No extra charge for use of instruments.

PAINTING — In oil, china, watercolor, pastel, India ink, crayon, charcoal, or pyrography, $10.00 a semester, $20.00 per year. . . . For full particulars apply to

MOTHER SUPERIOR
St. Joseph's Academy - - Adrian, Mich.

St. Viator College
KANKAKEE, ILLINOIS

Boarding College and High School for Young Men

Limited to 400 Students

Board and Tuition, $250 per annum

Catalogue sent free

Very Rev. J. P. O'Mahoney, C.S.V., President

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS
COLLEGE AND ACADEMY
FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Made for St. Vincent de
Paul's Church,
Rev. William R.
Charles, Pastor,
Albany, N. Y.

Processional Crucifix

and other pieces of rare beauty of design true to Byzantine decoration and designed with that reverence which this work so readily inspires.

THE GORHAM CO.

Ecclesiastical Wares

Fifth Avenue and 36th Street

NEW YORK

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

JUSTICE TO MEXICO

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS - 59 East 83d Street, New York

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 2 } OCTOBER 24, 1914 { PRICE 10 CENTS
WHOLE No. 289 } { $3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Oct. 13, p. m.-Oct. 20, a. m. —The Allies' Right Wing—The Allies' Left Wing — Germans Resume Offensive — The New Situation — The Warsaw Campaign — Other Items. Austria-Hungary: The Servian Plot— France: The Careful Censor — Heroes and Heroines of Charity. Germany: Sacrifice and Religion. Great Britain: Mortality Among British Officers. Ireland: Mr. Redmond's Position. Mexico: Riot and War.....25-28

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Catholic Attitude Toward Sociology—The Young Man and Railroading—Some Critics of Pius X—Messengers of Truth—Efficiency in the Fight against Tuberculosis—Cardinal Gasparri: A Personal Impression—Another View of Ireland in War Time.....29-37

COMMUNICATIONS

The International Almoner—The "Jewish Encyclopedia"—The Editor in War Times—Catholic Men and Women in Munich—All Germans! —Another View of Ireland's Attitude—"Deadwood of Catholicism"—The Catholic Press—Catholic Dailies in Belgium.....37-39

EDITORIALS

Calumniating Women—Monkeys and Mortals—Bandages or Bon-bons?—Bombs and Churches—A Masonic Program—A Voracious Monster. 40-43

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry.

REVIEWS: Reunion All Round—Daniel Webster—Lichens from the Temple—Songs Toward the Sunlight—Researches into Chinese Superstitions —A Far Journey—The College Course and the Preparation for Life—Historical Records and Studies—Indian Days of the Long Ago.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: New England Thoughts—The October Month—The Wall of Partition—"St. Joseph's Kalender"—An Interesting Memorial—Carlyle's Advice—A Novelist's Woes—The Tide of Higher Criticism—Some Devotional Works.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....44-48

EDUCATION

A School for Reverence.....49, 50

SOCIOLOGY

The Divine Test.....50

NOTE AND COMMENT

An Appeal for Religious Teaching—A Priest and a Minister — Mgr. Benson's Death — Religious Services at a University—A Remarkable Lecturer—A Novel Course — Bishop Williams and Sunday Schools—Anglicans and Confession. 51, 52

CHRONICLE

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

The War.—In France there has been little change in the situation at the centre, nor has much progress been made by either side on the east or west extremities of the long battle line. Movements, however, have begun both on the right and left wings, which may result in very important modifications of the situation. It is reported that the French have advanced from Nancy as far as Pagny and that Pont-à-Mousson is in their hands. This means that they have thrust back the Germans at one point at least to within a few miles of the Lorraine border, and that they are now within dangerous proximity to Metz. It also means that they have got to the east of the German forces that are trying to maintain their position on the river Meuse. As a consequence one portion of the Crown Prince's army is now being attacked from the east, west and south. So far it has been able to stand firm at St. Mihiel, but at other points it has been obliged to retire before very strong pressure from the south. Should the French be able to make good their advance a few miles further north, and cross over into Lorraine, and at the same time capture Pont-à-Mousson, which is probably still under attack, the Germans may find themselves under the necessity not only of withdrawing from Verdun, but even of fighting for the possession of Metz. It is not, indeed, likely that the German offensive will be brought to a speedy close, for they will probably be able to reenforce the threatened portion of their line; but there is just enough danger to their left wing to make the maneuvres about Verdun very interesting just at present. Renewed activity is reported in Alsace on the part of both armies.

Bulletin, Oct. 13, p.m.—Oct. 20, a.m.

At the western end of the conflict the Allies have been engaged in an effort to push their line into Belgium. In this, however, they have been seriously hampered by the presence of large bodies of German cavalry, which have been overrunning the country west of Lille, and at times have penetrated as far as Cassel and Hazebrouck, with the evident purpose of checking the French advance until General von Goltz's army should be ready to sweep along the Channel. Eventually they were forced to retire, and the Allies have now got well within Belgium. It is said that they have drawn up troops all the way from Ypres to the coast. Here they are waiting to resist the German army which reduced Antwerp and has ever since been advancing, having taken, without resistance, Bruges, Ostend and Nieuport. A battle has already taken place on the river Yser, which the Germans were prevented from crossing by the little Belgian army which now occupies the extreme left of the Allies' army.

The Allies' Left Wing

The Germans have resumed the offensive all along their right wing from Arras, through Lille to Ypres; and there have been many violent engagements. The Allies, however, have not only held their ground, but have even gained notably in the vicinity of Armentières. Their danger lies rather in the new invasion that has already seized all the Belgian seacoast, and to judge from the attacks by airships, hopes soon to be before Dunkirk. Unless the Allies can stop them, this new advance will develop into a new flanking movement, with the inevitable result that the Anglo-French left will have to retire. The Germans seem to be bent on forcing the Allies back, and of clearing them from all Northeastern France. It has been pointed out that their present object appears to be to straighten out their right wing, so that it will no longer turn at right angles near Noyon, but extend in a practically direct line from Metz to the Channel, probably somewhere near Boulogne. Reports from Berlin say that all Germany is ringing with the cry, "On to Boulogne!" Success in this attempt would give them some very distinct advantages. It would relieve them from the danger of having their right wing turned, a danger that has threatened them ever since their defeat on the river Marne; and it would put them into a position to maintain their hold in France with a much smaller force than is necessary at present. This would enable them to use some of the troops that are now on the right wing for the prosecution of more active measures against Russia, or might even result in another march on Paris. Their victory, therefore, in Belgium has had much more than a mere moral effect on the campaign. It has improved their situation considerably, for they no longer have to cope with difficulties that precipitated their retreat from the French capital. They then had left behind them in Belgium a very formidable foe, who never ceased to be a menace to their rear, and they had besides another hostile army on their right, which not only threatened their communications, but even their very existence. Neither of these difficulties would have to be faced if they should succeed in extending their line to the Channel. It will be seen, therefore, that the Germans have retraced their steps and systematically set about removing the obstacles that stood in the way of their success. They have driven the Belgian army before them, and have extended their lines to the coast, but they still have a formidable work to accomplish. The extreme left wing of the Allies still blocks their path. It is no longer, however, on their right. During the next few days the north coast of Belgium and France will be watched with much interest, because on the outcome of the battle that must soon take place there depends, to a great extent, the German's second hope of breaking through the French resistance. It is expected that the brunt of the fighting in the immediate future will be shifted from the line that stretches north and south from Noyon to Lille to the line that extends east and west from Ypres to the coast, at a point probably close to the Belgo-French border. A victory here would mean much for the Germans.

The Allies' Right Wing

Germans Resume Offensive

The New Situation

The surprise of the week came in the news that the Austro-German armies were threatening Warsaw. It was known that the Germans had been concentrating in Central Poland, but it was generally believed that they were engaged in fortifying a long line of defence against the Russian advance, and that they would be content to check the invader before he penetrated into German territory. It was also known that there were at least two Russian armies somewhere in the Warsaw district, but much obscurity shrouded their movements. The world at large, therefore, was quite unprepared for the news that the Germans were almost at the doors of the strong Polish stronghold. It seems now that the Russians had been steadily yielding ground for about two weeks, not so much because of any serious defeat, but rather with the purpose of retiring to a position which they had judged more favorable to them. The engagement which finally took place not far from the Vistula, within eight miles of Warsaw, seems to have been a rather important victory for the Russians, with the consequence that the Germans had to fall back with considerable loss to a line stretching from Lodz to Kielce. The invasion of Central Poland, therefore, has resulted much as the invasion of Northern Poland. There was a steady advance until the Germans had got themselves into difficult country, then the Russians took the offensive and drove them back with severe loss.

The Warsaw Campaign

The Germans claim that they have reoccupied Lyck on the Prussian border; otherwise things are rather quiet in the north; both sides apparently are awaiting the outcome of the great conflict that has now begun at the centre, and extends all the way from Warsaw to the south of Przemysl. The great Galician fortress is still being attacked from the east. Vienna reports a whole series of victories in the Carpathian Mountains. Recent dispatches, however, are so contradictory that an accurate grasp of the whole situation is almost impossible. One thing only is certain, that the Russians have transferred the principal sphere of their activity from Suwalki and Galicia to the left bank of the Vistula, in Poland.

The relief of the pressure upon the Austrians in Galicia has enabled them to make preparations for a new invasion of Servia. Large forces are being moved in the direction of the Drina. Servia, on the other hand, does not seem to be alarmed, because she has again transferred the seat of government back to Belgrade. The Belgians have accepted the hospitality of France and set up their government at Havre. Japan is said to be negotiating an alliance with Russia. She has made but little progress against Tsing-tao. Portuguese troops, so it is reported, are being transported to Africa with the purpose of striking at the German colonial possessions. The rebellion led by Colonel Maritz in South Africa turned out to be not at all serious. The Boers in general are in sympathy with England.

Other Items

The German submarines have inflicted another disaster on the British navy. The cruiser Hawke was attacked off the coast of Scotland, and went down with almost all her crew within eight minutes. The following day four German torpedo-boat destroyers were sunk off the coast of Holland by the British.

Austria-Hungary.—Important admissions were made, according to a press report, at the trial of Gavrilo Princip, the assassin of Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife. Gabrinovic, one of the accomplices of the assassin, admitted that the plot was hatched in Belgrade. A Servian officer, Major Tankosic, had not only supplied him and his fellow conspirators with the revolvers and bombs intended for the Archduke, he is reported to have said, but had likewise supervised the revolver practice as a preparation for the act, had supplied them with means for their journey to Sarajevo and had given every other assistance in his power. To this testimony Gabrinovic added that he had conversed with the Crown Prince of Servia, but would not divulge the nature of the interview. Princip himself, who sought in every way to shield his accomplices, admitted that Major Tankosic had supplied the conspirators with revolvers. It is probable that still more important disclosures will be made bearing, at least remotely, upon the causes that led to the present war.

The Servian Plot

France.—Le Gaulois and other French journals reach America with evident marks of the careful supervision of the censor. In some instances, as the jagged leads and half-lines would indicate, paragraphs, and even sentences, have been excised from the plates, at the last moment before printing. It must be said, however, that while reported reverses of the French arms have not been made a prominent theme, the press is not endeavoring to lull the public to a false and disastrous sense of security.

The Careful Censor

According to the Croix, two Bishops are with the army, Mgr. Ruch, Bishop Coadjutor of Nancy, and Mgr. Perros, Vicar-Apostolic of Siam and Titular of Zoara. The work of priests and monks, but particularly the marvelous heroism of the Sisters, whom Le Gaulois styles, "France's truest heroines," receives universal praise. A wounded officer in France writes:

Heroes and Heroines of Charity

> There have been some fine scenes of devotion and heroism of nuns and doctors tending the wounded when the shells were pounding through roof and wall. . . . One of the Sisters of Mercy, with a deep flesh wound in her arm, would not let go of a poor, dying cuirassier whom she was supporting with her right arm, and made the doctor bind up her wound, while she gallantly remained at the bedside of her charge.

When the day of peace dawns will France remember her debt of gratitude to these religious exiles who returned to succor her in her hour of great need?

Germany.—The note of sacrifice is supreme in Germany at the present hour. All who can not bear arms are striving to assist the Fatherland in every way possible. The enormous war loan, far exceeding the existing needs, which was instantly raised, gives but a slight indication of the great personal sacrifices that are being made. The minutest economic regulations have been enacted to preserve the country from the possibility of a famine and to prevent the impoverishment of the people; but charity goes hand in hand with scientific forethought to meet the emergencies of the time. That much suffering will nevertheless be unavoidable is clear. The women of Germany have shown their heroism in the quiet and successful way in which they have taken hold of the work left in many cases almost exclusively for them to do, while at the same time they have joyfully offered the greatest sacrifices of which mothers and wives are capable. Religion is the great strength of the people. With the mobilization of armies on every hand a religious mobilization has likewise taken place. "Numerous parishioners," we read in an account from a very Catholic section of the country, "daily receive Holy Communion. In the evenings the churches are thronged for the recitation of the rosary. When darkness settles down crowds of people form about the crosses in the way, which are decked with flowers, while the candle-lights rival the stars in heaven." Catholic mothers in particular are exhorted during these strenuous days to keep a firm hand over the children, in the absence of the father and the elder sons, in order that religion and morality may not suffer. "After a time of moral and religious disturbance which threatened danger," writes the Allgemeine Rundschau, "the nation has again bethought itself of God. If ever, it is praying now!" Indicative likewise of the Government's attitude toward the Catholic Church is the order issued by the German Emperor, at the request of Cardinal von Hartman of Cologne, that Catholic priests who chance to become German prisoners are to be treated as officers, although in the French army they ranked only as common soldiers. This should be a lesson for official France.

Sacrifice and Religion

Great Britain.—With the publication of each new war gazette, the appalling loss of life among the British officers at the front becomes more apparent. Lord Kitchener, who at the outset of hostilities predicted a long war, and a conflict which would try England as never she had been tried before, is said to foresee the day when a substitute will stand in the place of every officer now on the field of battle. In the seven weeks following the arrival of the British forces on the Continent, the army lost 1,146, or about one-sixth, of its officers. Of this number, 267 have been killed, 329 are reported "missing," while 550 have received wounds which will permanently disable them. Among the Catholic officers who have recently fallen, are Captain Douglas Miers, whose younger brother lost his life as an officer in the South African War, Captain Victor Lontaigne, Lieutenants Ambrose and Victor

Mortality Among British Officers

Teeling, sons of Captain Bartle Teeling of the Papal Zouaves of 1870-71, and Lieutenant Victor Fox.

Ireland.—Mr. Redmond, addressing a large meeting at Wexford, said Home Rule was secure for every inch of Ireland, and the Party would see that the Amending Bill shall really amend, not mutilate. The threats of Law and Carson were negligible, but if there was question of force, two could play at that game. Now that their national autonomy within the empire is secured, it is their duty to protect and defend it, whether it is endangered in Ireland or in Europe. The story that he had entered into any arrangement to force the Volunteers or any Irishman into foreign service was false. They were perfectly free, a privilege that did not obtain in any other European country. Every Pole in Germany from 20 to 45 has to fight for his oppressors. Mr. Asquith had promised (1) that the Volunteers would remain after the war a permanent force for Ireland's defence, which was an addition to the privileges of the Home Rule Bill, and (2) that the Irish Brigade would be manned and officered solely by Irishmen, so that after the war they would have an efficient Irish army. Moreover, they were getting rifles and instructors for the home Volunteers, and loyal acceptance of their responsibility in the confederacy of the empire was the only way of securing these advantages. The Boer nation accepted it and they who, to their own disadvantage, supported the Boers when fighting against oppression, would not now hesitate to support the Belgians when in like condition. Mr. Dillon said in Mayo they had promised loyalty if their demands were granted. Their demands were granted. They must keep their word. Every man was absolutely free to go or stay, but Irishmen who fought with England in this war would be fighting for Ireland and forming the nucleus of an army of Ireland. The Irish members generally urge the same views, insisting that while they must not forget the past, the time has arrived to forgive. The vast majority of the Volunteers have rallied to Mr. Redmond according to the Independent and Freeman, which, however, are partisans in this matter.

Mr. Redmond's Position

Mexico.—Unholy strife still obtains throughout this unhappy land. Early in the week Villa's Yaqui Indians made a fierce attack on Naco, only to be repulsed with great loss of life. Nothing daunted they continued their onslaughts, and on October 17 made a supreme effort, but were again driven back. This time the greater part of two companies of Indians was annihilated by the explosion of well-laid mines. During the battle bullets rained down on the town of Naco, Arizona, which is separated from Naco, Sonora, by a street. Four United States soldiers were reported struck by Mexican bullets. There were battles, too, at Parral and Agua Prieta. Meantime the peace conference of Aguascalientes was in session. An armistice was proclaimed, but neither side paid any attention to it. General Hill issued a statement condemning Villa, once considered a god, as a rascal whose only aim was cheap glory. Then the cannons boomed again and the peace conference was continued. Later press dispatches from different places reported that Villa had begun preparations for his march on Mexico City. The war will rebegin with renewed fury. Villa is credited with 54,000 armed men, Carranza with 24,000. To add to the difficulty of the situation the governor of lower California, Anlez has issued a proclamation declaring that the State has seceded from the Mexican federation. Mexico City, too, is in a turmoil. There was a strike of car men and the Government immediately seized the tramway system. A statement was issued to the effect that the seizure was but a temporary expedient. The Washington Post, commenting upon this act, says editorially:

Riot and War

> The amount of looting done by Carranza's followers during the recent disturbances runs into the millions. Breweries, factories and mines have been taken over bodily, to be operated by the rebels for their own profit. Stores of merchandise have been stolen as a matter of course. Churches have been robbed of their valuables, and then burned. Private houses have been gutted. Automobiles are the first things pillaged by the bandits who hail the new birth of liberty under Carranza.

A few days since dispatches reported that Villareal, military governor of Nuevo Léon, was to succeed Carranza. The "succession" has not taken place. Nor is it desirable. Villareal is a socialist of the Ferrer school, a violent, hateful man, the same who burned the confessionals in Monterey, and issued the violent decree against the Church, printed some time ago in AMERICA. It were bootless and perhaps disedifying to publish his record further, at least at this juncture. Vera Cruz, too, is stirring with life. General Funston reports activity on the part of 4,000 Mexican troops nearby, who threaten to open fire on the Americans and "drive them out." As was expected and predicted, their manner has changed somewhat. This will become clear from the following part of a report sent by the Constitutionalist Captain Roque Sandobal to his colonel, for transmission to General Coss, on the occasion of the capture of Tepotzotlan:

> My Colonel, I herein give you an account of what happened yesterday. I arrived and took the small town of Tepotzoltan, according to the order given me by the American Major. The Federals had been there not long before. I captured four priests and took from them $403.14; and now do tell me what to do. Shall I send these priests to you? They do not wish to give me any more money; they claim they have no more. I myself looked through room after room, but I could not go through all, because there are many and time was short. [It was a college building.—Editor of AMERICA.] I could not find the safe, etc.

This is interesting at least. It would be interesting, too, to know where Villa obtains the huge sums expended for arms and ammunition. Since the embargo was raised, he has spent $400,000 on guns of various kinds and $600,000 on ammunition. A neat sum for a penniless bandit and an equally penniless horde of freebooters.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Catholic Attitude Toward Sociology

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recently a well-known college man said to me: "The trouble with all Roman Catholic works on social subjects is that they repudiate every principle that does not promote the Church's own wealth and power, the Malthusian doctrine, for instance." In view of this, perhaps an article on the Church's attitude toward sociology would be timely and instructive.

E. S. C.

It is a favorite argument against the Catholic Church that she opposes free investigation of scientific truths and brings the weight of her authority against the necessary deductions from observed phenomena. Recently especial attention has been called to this assumed attitude in the realm of sociological science. Needless to say to the instructed Catholic, far from opposing investigation, the Church welcomes it, knowing that all truth whether in the world of matter or of spirit is coordinated, and so far as it is possible for the finite mind to know the manifestations of the Infinite, the more a really scientific treatment of facts is developed, the more is the reasonableness of the Divine plan manifested.

There is nothing in Catholic philosophy contrary to reason, but reason itself when soundly exerted shows that for an adequate knowledge of the mystery of life, it must recognize its limitations and accept Revelation. Revelation, the direct communication of supernatural truth by God to man, the Infinite to the finite being, is the fundamental concept of Christianity.

It is because of a lack of appreciation of this basic truth that the profound study, the praiseworthy industry, and the good intentions of leaders of thought in the comparatively new development of scientific investigation, known as sociology, have come under the animadversion of Catholic critics. They have ignored the influence of the supernatural upon natural phenomena and have inevitably gone astray in many of their conclusions.

Science has been defined as systematic knowledge, "Knowledge which binds together into complete unity the objects with which it has to deal according to their homogeneity and in which the separate objects of knowledge are apprehended as parts of a whole. . . . Systematic knowledge of related facts is what constitutes science." (Gareis Int. to the Science of Law, p. 13.)

With this definition in view it will appear what a laborious task has been assumed by those who have constructed even a partial science of sociology. The grouping of deductions from the vast material afforded by history and observation of man in his social relations has occupied the lives of many careful students, and their studies have borne fruit in the establishment of knowledge of inestimable value.

The Church does not forbid such admirable work; she encourages it. As in the exact sciences her children have won deserved renown, so in the inexact science of sociology in any of its branches, she favors the utmost endeavor to perfect general conclusions from observed facts. Her only care is to warn the student that the lines of demarcation between the natural and the supernatural established by revelation must never be overlooked.

It is here that she comes athwart the path of the temporarily leading school of thought. In most of the modern institutions of learning, and especially in America, certain non-religious, if not anti-religious, professors, led astray by their predominating materialism, ignore the element of supernatural religion. They trace the facts upon which they base their conclusions to elementary principles which are absolutely naturalistic, and going beyond the limitations of their science, attempt to account for phenomena that belong to another branch of knowledge. They base their conclusions as to the end of moral conduct and the purpose of human existence on purely economic grounds. They trace the existence of religion to the accidents of environment. So they seek "to arrive at a metaphysics through the systematic observation and interpretation of present and past social facts and processes." As Dr. Kerby shows (Cath. Encyc. Art. Sociology): "In the Christian view of life . . . the social sciences are guided by a sanctioned metaphysics and philosophy. This philosophy is derived not from induction but from revelation."

Before the coming of Christ no philosopher ever attained to that complete and all satisfying truth which He teaches: not that He did not teach and reinforce many moral precepts that already obtained, but it required His teaching in all its fullness to fortify mankind against the errors of natural reason. Imperfectly as the world has actually put in practice the ideals which He revealed to them, the most superficial student can not ignore their effects upon human conduct.

Here it is that the angle of divergence between the prevailing school of modern sociology and the Church begins. If one should be present at a meeting of sociological teachers, men who hold commanding positions in the community and are entrusted with the solemn duty of impressing the first principles of knowledge in their respective departments upon the minds of youth in the leading American colleges, he would find in their learned papers and profound disquisitions an entire absence of any recognition of the supernatural. Filled with a feeling of hardly disguised contempt for the researches and conclusions of philosophers, who have built up a system based upon a recognition of God's Providence, these modern teachers, with an arrogance which would merit severer rebuke, were it not so absolutely unconscious, proceed to expound their conclusions with a dogmatism far removed from the scientific spirit by which they profess to be governed. Unfortunately they are neither few in number nor insignificant in influence. They have the ear of the public and the tacit approval of the trustees of the universities who appoint them, and as a result, the wildest conclusions are solemnly propounded as the true basis of human conduct. We have seen what an influence the false philosophy of the eighteenth century exercised on public affairs and private life long after its proponents had gone, and we may trace the cataclysmic condition now prevailing in Europe to the infidel teachings that have long held sway in seats of learning in modern nations.

Writing upon a subject intimately connected with sociology, referring to the ignorance of the Catholic teaching relating thereto, Foerster observes:

> Catholica non leguntur. Exaggerated and perverted accounts of Christian teaching are taken at third and fourth hand, and not the slightest effort is made to understand the real official teaching of the Church. . . . The fundamental Christian position was defined with such absolute clearness by Dante that any misunderstanding should have been impossible. "It is not Nature herself who is corrupt; false guidance it is which has darkened the face of the world." (Marriage and Sex Problem, p. 205.)

The charge of infidelity to Christian revelation will not be denied by modern sociologists. As one of their leaders has said: "He would be a bold man, who to-day after a thorough training in the best historical scholarship should venture to put forth a philosophy of history in terms of the divine ideas, or to trace the plans of an Almighty in the sequence of human events. On the other hand, those interpretations that are characterized as materialistic . . . are daily winning serious respect." (Quoted by Dr. Kerby, ut supra.)

Christian philosophy in all its relations recognizes the supernatural as a matter of course. The Church as the guardian of supernatural truth insists upon its recognition as a prerequisite in all attempts to generalize from particular events and phenomena.

> It classifies processes, institutions and relations as right or wrong, good or bad, and offers to men directive laws of human desire and distinctive standards of social valuations by which social conduct should be governed. (Kerby.)

Obviously then there is an unbridgeable chasm between the false science which omits the most important element in human existence, supernatural religion, and the true science sanctioned by the Christian Church. But it is untrue that the Church disapproves of the study of social facts or opposes the legitimate conclusions derived from them.

WALTER GEORGE SMITH.

The Young Man and Railroading*

What are the chances of success for boys in railroading? One might consider this an easy question to answer. To me it seems to be too comprehensive to admit of a proper answer in a limited article. Unlike commercial or industrial business, or the professions, the railroad business requires proficiency in some of the branches of all these three fields. There is no particular avenue to the higher executive positions. We find presidents and vice-presidents promoted from every department in the service. Other chief officers usually get their experience in the department of which they are in charge by promotion, step by step, from the lower ranks. In starting out therefore, the young man should have a definite idea as to the part of the service in which he desires to excel.

Railroad management is conducted by the following departments under the direction of boards of directors, presidents and vice-presidents: I. Operating: under general managers, assisted by general superintendents, superintendents of transportation, division superintendents, trainmasters, chief engineers (civil, mechanical and electrical), superintendents of motive power, master mechanics, engineers, supervisors of way, superintendents of telegraph, marine superintendents and purchasing agents. II. Traffic: under a general traffic manager, assisted by general freight agents and general passenger agents. III. Accounting: under a comptroller, assisted by general auditors, auditors of freight traffic and auditors of passenger traffic. Financial: under treasurers, assisted by cashiers. Legal: under a general counsel, assisted by various division counsels. All these offices have assistants and secretaries, and each department has supervision over branches of service that do not appear in this enumeration. As the organizations consist of from 5,000 to 50,000 persons, it will readily be seen that the details of the duties and responsibilities can not be given in our limited space.

As to the chances for boys in railroading: it is probably safe to say that they are as good as in any other field, and possibly better than in a good many. This country has constructed over 200,000 miles of railway in the fifty years just passed, and will probably construct as much more in the next twenty-five years. The population per mile of road is now about 750 in the Middle and Eastern States, 400 in the Southern and Middle Western States and 200 in the territory west of the Missouri River. These figures indicate the possibilities when it is understood that our Western Empire is being developed on better lines and with a rapidity heretofore unknown.

The chances for success in railroad work depend upon the qualifications of the worker, which are practically the same as those necessary in any other branch of business. The healthy, honest, industrious, sensible, patient, temperate boy with a high school education can not be held back after he once becomes known. His good work may be depended upon to attract the attention that leads to success. There is probably no occupation in which good work and manliness is better appreciated. The young man of good character, with tact and courage to meet jealousies, selfishness and narrow-mindedness, will succeed in any business; but probably with greater satisfaction in railroading than in any other, owing to the vast extent of the field and the thousands of manly men with whom he comes into competition. It is a business that calls for pluck, loyalty and zeal, and it usually discovers and rewards the possessor of these attributes.

*The eighteenth of a series of vocational articles.

FRANK S. GANNON.

President of the Montana, Wyoming & Southern Railway.

Some Critics of Pius X

When Pius X passed away a few weeks ago, the secular press was respectful and inclined, on the whole, to recognize in him a great man. Not so the Protestant religious press, especially that section of it represented in this country by the Living Church, and in England by the Church Times. The angry tone in which these periodicals reviewed the Pontiff's life, was, to say the least, surprising. What was Pius X to the Church Times, for instance, that it should lose its temper over the supposed blunders of Cardinal Merry del Val and the narrow theology of the late Pope and his counsellors? One would not have been astonished at an academic review of the late pontificate pointing out what Anglicans might call its defects, blandly and in a detached sort of way; but the ordinary man finds it hard to understand the fierce onslaught of the Church Times on the "peasant seminarist," as it styles Pius X; and its bitter accusations of ignorance, incapacity and tyranny. Evidently it has a grievance against Pius X even greater than it had against Leo XIII. If we do not mistake its writer, he said some very hard things about Leo some years ago. But then he had just returned humiliated from a journey to Rome begun in the anticipation of triumph and the expectation of showing Roman theologians how wretched an article was their "seminary theology" as compared with that of himself and his brother amateur, Mr. Puller. Now it is the turn of Pius X to be reviled; and so eager is that writer in the work, that he reclothes Leo XIII in the garments of wisdom, moderation and strength, of which he and his abettors had stripped him, in order that, comparing the two pontiffs, all may learn from the contrast how pitiable was Pius X.

What is the explanation? Why should the Church Times manifest a personal enemity toward one with whom, according to its own principles, it had about as little to do as with the Grand Lama. He never wounded it by inviting the English nation to renounce all such incompetent teachers, in order to be taught of God by means of the infallible apostolic voice that sounds from Peter's chair. It was not he who, at the desire of certain of its friends, took up the investigation of Anglican orders only to reject them definitely and utterly. Yet Leo XIII is forgiven to a certain degree, in order that Pius X may be chastised more thoroughly. An examination of those things in him that most stir the gall of the Church Times may help to the solution of the paradox.

Entering on his reign, Pius X declared he had but one purpose, "to restore all things in Christ." The Church Times assumes that this meant the abandonment of diplomacy in favor of evangelic directness, and finds in it a grievance. Were it so, what would it have to do with the Church Times? Had the Pope suppressed every nunciature, what difference would it have made so far as the Church of England was concerned? But one may read the noble encyclical containing that declaration from beginning to end without discovering even the hint of such a design. It does not contain a word concerning the Pope's relations with sovereign states, the matter of diplomacy; but occupies itself with the evils of human society at large and their remedies. Having made it clear that the source of all those evils is the effacing of God and the enthroning of man in his place, Pius X determined that the restoration of God to his rights was to be the guiding principle of his pontificate, and laid down the means to be used, the stirring up of faith and piety in clergy and people. He knew that attempts would be made to draw him to one party or another; and, to cut off all hopes in the matter, declared that he would be nothing to human society but the minister of God, with whose authority he was invested. He kept his pledge. He blessed impartially every social work founded on justice and informed with religion: none, however influential, could retain his favor, or even receive his toleration, in which the religious spirit had died out. Every human effort for social betterment must fail that does not rest on, not merely recognition, but also on the actualization of the relations between man and his Lord and Redeemer; while, on the other hand, this actualization is sufficient to bring about the highest social reform which no purely human effort can ever attain. This is the doctrine of the E Supremi Apostolatus in a nutshell. For its execution is supposed necessarily an infallible teaching authority, a supreme, absolute, spiritual jurisdiction. No wonder it was galling to such as, pretending to be Catholics, have not a shred of the one or the other.

But Pius X would have nothing to do with diplomacy, says the writer in the Church Times. To prove it the appointment of a blunderer to the office of Secretary of State is quite sufficient. Merry del Val, the blunderer, is one of the fables created by a press hostile to the Holy See. Time and again the public heard that the Pope was on the point of dismissing him for incompetency, until people got tired of the story. To prove the universal charge that "never before has there been such a blunderer as Cardinal Merry del Val," the writer in the Church Times brings three cases, which, we may presume, were the worst he could find. The first, the break with France, he attributes to the Cardinal's "glaring mismanagement" of the French President's visit to Rome. In this the Cardinal simply followed precedent. No head of a Catholic State visiting the King of Italy officially in Rome could be received at the Vatican, where such a visit was held to be an affront to the Holy See. This was well known. Catholic sovereigns had been restrained by it: the French President chose to flout the Pontiff. Had the writer in the Church Times said that the French Government, having resolved to break utterly with the Church, used deliberately this means to bring about the necessary crisis, he would have been much nearer the truth. The Cardinal stood for principles. Can it be that this moved the choler of the members of a denomination that juggles with them continually? The second case is the Borromean Encyclical. The charge is that the Cardinal allowed his master to blunder and then made an undignified withdrawal. With regard to the first part, the Pope took occasion from the tercentenary of St. Charles Borromeo's canonization, to propose his zeal against the errors of his day as an example of how the bishops in these times should combat Modernism. In speaking of the heretics of the sixteenth century he used the usual terminology, to which his critic can not object, if the Church Times still hold in honor the memory of its founder. The Pope's terms were not violent, and they were theologically exact: Dr. Littledale's language regarding the reformers was both violent and theologically very inexact. Some German agitators pretended that the encyclical was a direct attack on Luther and his fellows, on Germany and its Protestant princes, and set to work to stir up popular indignation. The Pope pointed out its true aim, that its language was general, that no people and no Prince had been mentioned, and that its misconstruction was for himself a just subject of complaint. With this explanation, which only prejudice can call undignified, the German Government declared itself quite satisfied. Afterwards of his own free will and in the interests of peace the Pope ordered the German bishops not to have the encyclical read in the churches nor printed in the diocesan bulletins. The newspapers pretended that this was a withdrawal of the document. One who had been held fit to go to Rome as an agent of members of the Church of England should have known better. The encyclical had been published formally to the world in the Acta Apostolicæ Sedis: its withdrawal would have required an act equally formal. This was never made. There was no withdrawal even as regards Germany. An encyclical duly promulgated does not need to be read publicly in the churches. It is addressed to the bishops, and binds them from the moment of its promulgation. And, in fact, within a few weeks after the agitation the Pope in an official letter duly published in the Acta Apostolicæ Sedis, reminds the Prussian bishops assembled at Fulda, how in that encyclical he had set before them St. Charles as their model. The third case of the Cardinal's blundering touches the relations with the Italian Government. The accuser takes amiss the Pope's failure to do what was expected of him and come to terms. Religious leaders who submit themselves and their followers to the State at the expense of their conscience, are naturally disconcerted at hearing one pontiff after another say with the first of their line: "we must obey God rather than man," and at seeing them ready like him to take the consequences. As for the proof of the Cardinal's blundering, if an English minister had managed during ten years to maintain himself against some German claim and, at the same time, to use it for his country's advantage, England would have hailed him as a heaven-sent diplomat. Yet such is what the critic rails at the Cardinal for doing. Whether the result is that "the position of the Pope is worsened in Rome" is something for which no one will take the bare assertion of the writer in the Church Times. As regards Signor Nathan, upon whose misconduct he dwells, recent events show that he has been "made short work of" without the aid of "Italy, respectful or reconciled," as the writer knows very well, though he chooses to ignore it.

But why waste space in striking Pius X through his servant? Why dally with malicious gossip about tyranny and espionage in Mantua and underhand intrigue in Venice, which the writer more than half rejects even while recording it? The great sin of Pius X in the eyes of this bitter assailant was not in these, but in his action against Modernism. In other matters of accusation the critic prevaricates: in this he goes further. "The strangely-assorted opinions which the theologians who did his thinking for him gathered under the rubric 'Modernism' called for serious criticism; some of them demanded severe condemnation, all required checks, and none could look for any but the most guarded approval. All were lumped together for unqualified rejection. They were rejected, in the face of the world, not because they were demonstrably false or perilously doubtful, but because they were modern." One glance over the Syllabus and the Encyclical Pascendi should have been enough to show him that they were condemned because they would destroy the Person of Christ, His Divine Nature, His mission, the Church He founded, His revelation, all that Christianity contains; in one word of Pius X, because they are the sum of all heresies. We can understand how troubled must be the conscience of those who, arrogating to themselves the championship of truth, surrendered miserably in the day of battle. Had men, high in honor in the Church of England, been told ten years ago what they should be standing for to-day, they would have prayed for death rather than such apostasy. We do not wonder at their fall. They had no mission in the office they usurped. It was not by them that God would save Israel. They have arrayed themselves on the side of Antichrist; and, therefore, of him who upholds Christ's cause and honor they say: "He is become the censurer of our thoughts. He is grievous unto us to behold: for his life is not like other men's, and his ways are very different. We are esteemed by him as triflers, and he abstaineth from our ways as filthiness, and he preferreth the latter end of the just, and glorieth that he hath God for his father." (Wisdom ii, 14-16.) This is the real reason of the hatred of Pius X shown by such periodicals as the Church Times and the Living Church, and by all their aiders and abettors who are engaged in the unholy work of calumniating a great servant of God, who did his work well.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Messengers of Truth

It would be a very poor general who would have his dispatch riders use a motorcycle on open fields and slow horses on fine level roads. It would also be a poor business man who would send a hulking, awkward salesman into a lady's parlor and a shy, timid girl into men's business offices. In war, in business or in important propaganda of any kind, your messenger has to fit his message to the people to whom it is addressed.

This would seem self-evident. The social message of the Catholic Church in this country must be carried by the proper couriers. If they are well chosen, the message will go where it is needed, and once there it will have effect. If they are poorly chosen we might as well surrender ourselves at once to the charge of having failed in one of the greatest opportunities ever offered us. We know the importance of this choice, and it may be for that very reason we find difficulty in deciding who should be our couriers. In some pulpits we hear the "lay apostolate" preached. In other quarters the hierarchy themselves are held up as the only fitting "bearers of the word." The issue would seem to be clear cut.

It is not so clear cut as it seems, however. There is very naturally, I admit, considerable misunderstanding of this subject. Many headstrong laymen are eager to forge blindly to the front with little or no preparation. Their spiritual directors are obliged to hold them back. They then become impatient. They think their efforts are being discouraged, when actually they are only being guided. The ecclesiastical superiors bear a share of the misunderstanding too. Some of them, fortunately not many, misinterpret the laymen's zeal. They may have a suspicion that the laymen are impatient of spiritual authority, when as a matter of fact they are only asking for a good opportunity to speak under guidance.

A little clear thinking is enough to show the folly of this misunderstanding and also of the idea that either laymen or clergy, but not both, must be the messengers of the Church. Let us go back to the business man. He has a certain line of goods he is anxious to sell. Let us say the goods have been given to him, or at least the patent for them. He is responsible for their being of a certain quality and kind. But that does not mean he has to distribute them himself. If he is trying to sell to a very prominent dealer it is quite possible he will talk to him himself; that is because he thinks the dealer will listen better to him than to a mere salesman. But for ordinary sales, he will choose some one else to act in his place. He will select women to solicit housewives; he will select clever young men to solicit small dealers. The quality of goods he is always responsible for; it remains the same. But different types of people must sell the goods to different customers if the entire sale is to reach the best proportions possible.

While anger, resentment, mutual distrust and dishonesty are ripping our economic fabric to shreds, the Church has a message to counteract these wrongs. The problem she faces is one of distribution. She must send her message to the greatest number of people in the shortest possible time. The quality of her message must always be the same; for that her clergy must be responsible. They are the guardians of her moral and religious truth. But clergy and laymen alike must be the couriers to bear the message. If the message is to be carried to Protestant clergy, then one of our own clergy is the fitting messenger. If it is to be carried to Protestant society women, it is Catholic society women who must be the bearers. If we are to reach free-thinking business men, it is our own Catholic business men who must be given the mission. So too, it is Catholic working men who must bring the teachings of the Church to their socialist companions.

Would a set of socialist miners listen long to a Catholic priest whose very office they blindly hate? A few words dropped here and there by a Catholic fellow laborer would have ten times more effect. Except in rare cases, would Protestant or agnostic men of affairs go to listen to a lecture or sermon by a Catholic priest? A few of the clergy have such an influence, but only a few. To get the ear of a Protestant business man, you must be a business man yourself, meet him at his clubs, talk with him of affairs that he knows and understands, be honest and square yourself and know better than to preach. Set the example, and your message is already delivered.

And do you think that the average Protestant society woman who scorns a large family, measures the values of life by yards of satin and bridge scores, or, in some cases, tries a mild form of philanthropy, do you think such a woman can be reached by any except her social equals? Does it do her any good to see Catholic women of humble birth with large families? She feels sorry for them and deplores their ignorance. But if some one in her own sphere sets the example, has a large wholesome family, is sweet and motherly and refined and manages to attend to her decent social duties at the same time, do you not think that the life of that woman will accomplish some good among her Protestant friends? And is she not the best one to carry the social message of the Church in her sphere of life?

The "lay apostolate" is no body of men and women blindly attempting to out-organize and out-play the clergy. They learn from the clergy, they try to understand the reasons for their faith, and then, by good example, intelligent discussion and above all by a decent humility in their efforts, they carry the lessons they have learned to those whom their clergy, by the very conditions of our country and times, can not possibly reach. Each and every Christian is to some extent his brother's keeper. The social gospel of the Catholic Church is not meant to be limited to Catholics alone. We can not hope to convert the entire world immediately to our faith; but we can hope to do our own part of the world some service. When we see them suffering from a disease they hardly understand, when we see them trying to cure social ills by a still worse poison, we can carry to them whatever part of our message they can be made to understand and accept. In the United States and at the present time, the laymen must do the lion's share in carrying the message of the Church. It is nothing more than a good business method; only that our business is one of sublime beauty.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

Efficiency in the Fight against Tuberculosis

There is a struggle going on throughout the civilized world for the saving of human life, as gigantic as the struggle which is now going on in Europe for the destruction of human life. It has for its object the reduction of the human death rate by a million a year for all future time. This struggle is the campaign against tuberculosis, commonly called the crusade against tuberculosis. In the United States alone $20,000,000 a year is expended on it.

This fight against tuberculosis concerns every one, on account of the universality of the disease, and the potentiality of evil in it for every one. All should, therefore, be crusaders, and it behooves every one to know how to be an efficient one.

Theoretically, at least, it is now possible for every adult human being, who has not yet been implanted with tuberculosis, to avoid implantation; for every head of a household whose children or protégés have not yet been implanted to protect them against implantation; and for every individual who has been implanted, and has not yet developed the disease to an advanced form, to recover. Moreover, the accomplishment of these ends is not difficult when the proper knowledge and understanding of the matter is had by those concerned.

Tuberculosis is the condition of a human being or animal in which a microscopic, living entity, called the tubercle bacillus, has found lodgment and has reproduced itself in his tissue. The mere entrance and exit, dead or alive, of the tubercle bacillus into one's organism does not constitute tuberculosis. This is an important fact to keep in mind, as we all have some inherent power of destroying tubercle bacilli in our organisms, each according to a measure of his own, and consequently of resisting implantations. For most of us, casual exposure to tuberculosis does not give implantations. Indeed, for most of us, only long continued exposure inside of an enclosure, during the germinal stage of the disease in some one with whom we must be in intimate relationship without precautions, could give an implantation.

Implantation of tuberculosis is essentially a house process, and for this reason the disease has been called a house disease. This also explains the classical belief that the disease is an hereditary one. Because it is a house disease it clings to the family tree. The home, once having been infected, the disease may be handed down generation after generation; or members of the family, having been once implanted, mild cases of the disease may live in the family from one generation to the next, and transmit the disease.

Another feature of the disease which has a bearing on this subject is its propagation through the lymphatic system. As a rule the tubercle bacillus gets into the organisms through the lymphatic system, and has to run the gauntlet of that system before it can get lodgment in other tissue. For those who do not know anatomy and physiology, it may be well to state that the lymphatic system is a network of fine vessels and glands distributed throughout the entire body, and ultimately connected with the vessels and organisms which convey and carry the blood of the body, concerned intimately with the nutrition of the body and its protection against disease germs. In most people it takes the tubercle bacillus years to get through the lymphatic system into the other tissues, and in some it never gets through. In consequence of this slow progress of the tubercle bacillus through the lymphatic system the development of the disease to a form which arrests attention comes many years after implantation, often so long after it that the relationship between the implantation and the development has been forgotten. In reality, implantation usually takes place in early childhood, when life is spent almost entirely within doors, and development of the disease into ulcerative tuberculosis of the lungs or other organs and tissues not until adult life. House implantation, slow development, and chronicity of the disease, satisfactorily explain all the phenomena which give the disease its hereditary characteristics.

Implantation of tuberculosis is difficult; therefore, prevention of it is easy. For every five persons who are intimately exposed to tuberculosis, under the most favorable conditions for its implantation, such as exist in the family and the workshop, only one gets the disease in a form which proves fatal. The evidence of this lies in the stationary mortality rate from the disease over a long period of years, when no precautionary measures were taken. Since the tubercle bacillus gets out of the body alive only through the urinary excretion or through broken-down tissue, both gross substances easily seen and handled, it is only through these substances that communication of the disease can take place from a person who has it to a person who has not got it. Proper disposal of these substances does away with contagion, and makes a new implantation impossible. The chance of one in five getting an implantation when no precautions are taken can then easily be done away with when proper precautions are taken.

What are the proper precautions? As for the urine, the ordinary disposal of it prevalent in civilized communities is sufficient. The real danger lies in broken-down tissue, which is called sputum or spit. Broken-down tissue which comes from an abscess or sore should be carefully collected on cotton or lint and burned. While collecting it care should be taken that neither the patient nor the attendant become contaminated in body or clothing through carelessness or uncleanliness. Ordinary care and cleanliness are sufficient. Broken-down tissue which is given off in the form of sputum should be deposited in a burnable receptacle. This receptacle should always and without exception be held close to the mouth during expectoration, so that none of the sputum can be sprayed or accidentally deposited on the clothing or on anything in the environment of the patient. Each and every time after expectoration the lips should be wiped with a paper napkin and then immediately this paper napkin should be carefully folded and deposited in a paper bag. When the paper receptacle is full of sputum it should be burned, and when the paper bag is full of paper napkins it should be burned. When the expectorating individual coughs he should hold a paper napkin before his mouth, and after having used the paper napkin for this purpose it should be folded up and put in the paper bag. Burnable receptacles, paper napkins and paper bags can now be had in most drug stores, and ought to be kept for sale by all drug stores. No other method of disposal of sputum than that here mentioned should be used under any circumstances, or at any time, for none other is safe.

In this connection it may be proper to mention that recovery of the afflicted individual depends upon conscientious observation of these practices. Reinfection of one's self is always a serious impediment to recovery in tuberculosis, and unless the afflicted individual prevents every tubercle bacillus which nature ejects from his body from getting back, he does not cooperate with nature for his recovery.

Recovery from tuberculosis in the early stage of the disease is relatively easy under scientific treatment. The treatment ought to be administered by a physician who is versed in the modern knowledge of tuberculosis. It is not enough to take milk and eggs and to change climate. Scientific treatment gives wonderful results, irrespective of climate, and can be successfully administered in the small streets of crowded cities. Random treatment with application of some of the scientific principles, such as change of climate, use of milk and eggs, and rest, sometimes gives splendid results, but often fails in the more difficult cases. Treatment under the direction of a man who can apply all the scientific principles alone can give the best results now available in all cases. This, also, is the most economical procedure, since it brings the results in the shortest time, and recovery from tuberculosis is a slow process under the best conditions and the best treatment. Moreover, there is always danger of relapse, and this danger can be greatly lessened by proper direction. Many lives are sacrificed to incompetent treatment, and lack of scientific supervision. It is well to bear in mind that response to good treatment is marvelous; and that administration of good treatment is difficult.

It is difficult to recognize early tuberculosis. Even physicians overlook it. It can always be recognized by men who have been trained to make careful physical examinations, and who know how to use all the resources which science has given us for this purpose. When there is doubt a trained expert should be consulted.

It may be laid down as a general principle that whenever an individual is below the weight which is considered normal to his height and age, and when the physiological actions of the important organs of the body have been interfered with for a considerable length of time, tuberculosis may be suspected. Under such conditions an investigation should always be made to determine the cause of the abnormality.

Lawrence F. Flick,
Sometime Director of Phipps Institute.

Cardinal Gasparri: A Personal Impression

As I came into the darkened room, not quite dark enough to hide the inevitable gold decoration of the Roman salon, a small man in a black cassock came forward. C'è un grand' onore, Eminenza, I murmured, and bowed to kiss his ring.

Pietro Cardinal Gasparri is a man of medium height, dark hair turning gray, rather prominent dark eyes that narrow in scrutiny or laughter, with the broad features, forehead, nose and mouth, of a distinct Italian type. He comes of the soil, not of the peasantry, but of a family of large landowners, and to the soil he returns whenever his work in Rome permits. Hardly a day passes that he does not drive outside the walls for his walk over the Campagna. His love of nature is intense. One day a week, it used to be a Thursday, I believe, he will call a halt to work, discard the intricacies of canon law, and fly to his brother's farm. There his horse waits for him, and a full day is given to galloping over the countryside, with enjoyment of the sting of the wind and the views of the plain.

And you can find his love of pastoral things in a negative way, as it were, even in his apartment in Rome, for on a table in the ante-chamber is a case containing a fine collection of butterflies.

A shy man, I should say, there is a distinct awkwardness in meeting strangers, a shrinking from publicity. But the former is soon discounted by the polished Italian mannerisms of speech and gesture. In fluent French, for my stuttering Italian failed to carry the conversation beyond a few introductory sentences, he was soon asking questions about America, about mutual friends, displaying a marvelous memory for small details.

An indefatigable worker, he will often spend eighteen hours a day at his desk in the little study hidden away at the back of the apartment, a desk always littered with papers and always in disorder! Yet nothing is ever misplaced, and the Cardinal can always put his hand without hesitation on the paper he is looking for. "I like," he once said to me, "your American 'rush.' It is something to praise rather than to blame." Yet like all busy men he never appears busy. There is an inexhaustible vitality about him that enables him to completely cast off the work which is engaging his attention and to devote himself heart and soul to some extraneous subject that interferes. You will never catch His Eminence at work. As you enter his apartment on the Corso d'Italia, overlooking the walls of Belisarius and near the new Carmelite church, you are shown straight through to the salon, and there inevitably stands the small figure in the black cassock with its red buttons by the door of the study.

Cardinal Gasparri is essentially democratic. He has none of that suave dignity and aloofness that characterized his predecessor at the Vatican. He is full of merry quips and jests, enjoys listening to a good story, and what is even better, telling one. I can see him now leaning forward in his chair, his biretta a little on one side, his cassock pulled up, his elbows on his knees, a characteristic attitude, relating with manifest enjoyment some pranks of his at school.

He is fifty-two years old, born at Visso, in the diocese of Norcia, May 5, 1852. He is probably the greatest living authority on canon law, and was intrusted by the late Pope with the colossal undertaking of codifying the law. For eleven years he taught Canon Law in the University of Paris. For some years he was His Holiness' companion in the department of the Secretary of State, when Cardinal Rampolla was Papal Secretary, so that he enters office a trained diplomat. He is titular Bishop of Cesarea, in Palestine, and was created Cardinal on December 16, 1907.

I shall end on the personal note and bear witness to his extreme kindness and goodness of heart. Never shall I forget his kindness to me when he confirmed me in Rome in the little chapel attached to his apartment. After Mass I came forward to thank him, but he brusquely swept my thanks aside. "It is for me to thank you," he said, "for the great pleasure you have given me. Accept my thanks and, if you will, the blessing of a—er—shall we say, a moderately old man!" LOUIS H. WETMORE.

Another View of Ireland in War Time

Ireland as a whole may be said to consider the action of the British Government in declaring war on Germany as justified, and indeed that such a course was inevitable. It has always been understood that the United Kingdom was under an obligation to defend the neutrality of Belgium. No one who has lived in Belgium, and who has spoken with Belgians on the point could doubt that the same conviction existed there. This fact made it difficult for many in Ireland to understand the action of Lord Morley and Mr. John Burns in resigning from the cabinet at the beginning of the war. But it is also true that neither in Ireland nor in England was there any wish for war on the part of the people. As things are, the average Englishman says that since war was bound to come sooner or later it is well that the British Empire should not have to meet Germany single-handed. It may be said that no British war is popular in Ireland, and hence the care taken by leading statesmen to point out that the present war is in every sense an Irish war.

The leaders of all the political parties in Parliament were unanimous in supporting the ministry in their action, and the Irish leaders among the rest. In Ireland the attitude of the people is not so easy to describe as that in England. This difficulty arises out of considerations connected with the growth of the National Volunteers, and from circumstances connected with the passage of the Home Rule Bill. At the outbreak of the war Mr. Redmond declared in the House of Commons that, owing to the change brought about in public opinion in Ireland on account of the approaching passing of the Home Rule Bill, the Government could count on the support of the 150,000 National Volunteers to defend the shores of Ireland side by side with the Protestants of Ulster. Mr. Redmond made it clear that this statement was only possible because for the first time in recent history Ireland would be able to feel that her sons had a responsible and self-respecting place in the British Empire.

It is not unlikely that if Mr. Redmond's offer had been met with sympathy by the Government there would have been a prompt response to the appeal for recruits for the new army. But instead of a frank acceptance of the proffered services of the Volunteers and a movement on the part of the Government to equip and drill them, nothing was done. In spite of the passing enthusiasm aroused by Mr. Redmond's declaration, and in spite of Sir Edward Grey's memorable statement that "Ireland is the one bright spot" the Government held back. Instead of a graceful and frank trust in the Irish leader's offer there began a period of delays and postponements of the Home Rule Bill, which continued during the first six weeks of the war. Many in Ireland began to fear that the old story was about to be told once more, and that Ireland was again to be sacrificed to the violence of the opposition. Even Mr. Redmond, always calm and statesmanlike in his methods, had to appeal at last to the Prime Minister to put an end to the suspicions and irritation of the Irish people. The act of justice when finally accomplished, not without an unknown amending bill appended to it, and with its application postponed for an indefinite period, had lost its grace and England once more had lost a golden opportunity of conciliating Ireland!

As soon as the Home Rule Bill was placed on the statute book a feeling of relief spread throughout the country. In spite of a certain want of confidence in the intentions of the Government, which is a natural enough consequence of the past history of Ireland under English rule, the general view is that the bill will be put into operation at the conclusion of the war. The overwhelming majority of the people will support Mr. Redmond, and the people recognize that the only sane policy is to follow confidently the party who brought the bill through in spite of so unusual and violent an opposition.

That Mr. Redmond has the confidence of the country in his policy of backing the Government in the war is proved by the enthusiastic reception accorded to himself and Mr. Asquith when the latter came to Dublin, to make a personal appeal to Ireland to send additional men to the front. The writer made it a point to be present in order to be able to compare the feeling manifested with that exhibited when the Premier made his first visit. There seemed to be no falling off in the enthusiasm of those present, most of whom were far past the age for enlisting; but the impression left was that this enthusiasm was rather on account of the passing of the Home Rule Bill than on account of the popularity of the cause for which the meeting was convoked. At that meeting the Irish leaders, Messrs. Redmond, Dillon and Devlin, spoke strongly in support of the justice of England's action in the war with Germany and insisted on the fact that this is an Irish war, in that its issue must have the gravest consequences for Ireland. What the final result of that appeal will be can only be conjectured.

Attempts to undermine the confidence of the Volunteers in the leadership of Mr. Redmond will meet with no response throughout the country, and at most are only likely to influence a small group of extremists, especially in the capital. Various arguments have been used to encourage enlisting, such as gratitude to the democracy in England, sympathy with the Belgians, the defence of the Empire and the rest. These arguments will no doubt play their part in determining the action of individuals, but they do not constitute the really important motive which will influence Irishmen. Apart from the causes which influence the vast majority of all who join the British army, such as want of employment and the many accidental circumstances which make a career as that of a private soldier desirable, the great argument which will count with the vast majority is the defence of Ireland. There can be no doubt that, if it were evident to the young men of Ireland that there was a real danger of the invasion of Ireland by the Germans, and of the war being transferred from the already desolated plains of France and Belgium to their own country, they would volunteer at once for foreign service. But the average Irishman does not feel that there is a reasonable fear of such an invasion. If the appeal were for men to join the navy the matter would be different. The change in the political outlook in Ireland has not yet had time to remove a deep-seated mistrust of English rule and the average Irishman does still feel it difficult to realize that his interests are identical with the interests of the British Empire.

All these points are discussed with intelligence in every town in Ireland, and serve to remind us that the outlook in Ireland is of a more complicated nature than in England. One of the mistakes made so often by the English is to suppose that the present generation of Irishmen is easily influenced by sentimental considerations. The Irish countryman is as hard-headed and as far-seeing in many things as any to be found, and his attitude will finally be determined by considerations of policy. A strong argument with the volunteer class will be that by joining the army and seeing the realities of war they will be later on of real value to their country. The emulation which some endeavor to stir up between the Ulster Volunteers and the rest will not influence them much, though the importance of a disciplined force of many thousand volunteers when the war is over is a consideration which can not be overlooked. What, then, will be the probable course of events? It seems likely that Ireland will contribute her full share to the new army if the essential condition that it should exist as a separate army corps is guaranteed, but this army will not be the outcome of any sudden rush of recruits. In the meantime the activity of the home Volunteers will probably increase, especially on account of certain internal difficulties, which, however, are not of a serious nature.

In considering the number of recruits from Ireland it is necessary to bear in mind the fact that the number of men between the ages of twenty and forty is far less, in proportion to the total number of men, in Ireland than in the remainder of the United Kingdom. The relative percentages are about twenty-five and thirty-eight. At the beginning of the war the Irish in the British army formed about one-sixth of the whole, their proper proportion being about one-tenth. There is no doubt that when the final statistics are published the usual proportion of Irishmen in the fighting line will be sustained.

The above attempt to describe Ireland's attitude toward the present war is based on observation, and on conversations with those of many ways of thinking. The writer has not dwelt on the causes of some of the elements which tend to complicate the question as far as Ireland is concerned, such as the smallness of her population in comparison with what it should be under normal circumstances, the influence public opinion among the Irish in the United States has in Ireland, and the effect of the view taken in the United States generally of her attitude toward the war. This last element may very well be of more importance than appears from this short article, for Ireland knows that much of her future depends on the friendship of the great American Republic.

Dublin. PATRICK KEATING.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

The International Almoner

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Sauer's warning in AMERICA of September 26, about the chance of Catholic contributions to international charities finding their way into channels of proselytism is very timely. I might suggest that there is risk of a large turning of such funds into gaping pockets along the way, and it must not be overlooked that there are healthy wages to be paid to the heroes who distribute the funds. It costs a nice penny to get even a crumb to Lazarus, particularly if he be abroad, and I believe that, as an aftermath, there is sometimes a fine fuss over what became of the crumb. Catholics, it seems to me, have a sure way to place their gifts where the spot will be reached. Is not the Holy Father a father in very deed? And into whose hands may we more certainly entrust our offerings than his? He has oversight of the world. Are there floods in China, his children perish; are there earthquakes in Calabria, his flesh and bone is crushed; are there wars in Mexico, in Belgium, or in the uttermost parts of the earth, his life's blood is poured out. Through whom, then, may we with stronger faith give our dole for the miserable? He is the International Almoner.

It is a simple matter for any one wishing to be of help in any case to send a post-office money order or a check to the Apostolic Delegate at Washington, who would, no doubt, gladly transmit the proceeds to the Holy Father, and he, in turn, would know how to dispense it to those for whom it is intended, with the added blessing of having passed through his hands. In this way leakage may be stopped, unworthy uses may be blocked, those who really need help may be reached, and a particular grace will attach to our offerings. Vultures are one of the loathsome incidents to suffering. They prey on the stark bodies left on the battlefield, and their leering human counterparts batten on the souls of the unfortunate. We have it in our hands to give the human vultures scant picking. Let us do so.

Flagstaff, Arizona. M. J. RIORDAN.

The "Jewish Encyclopedia"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

While glancing over some articles in the "Jewish Encyclopedia" (Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York), I was grieved to find some nasty insinuations in two of the articles. (1) "Mortara Case" (Vol. IX, p. 35): "The priest to whom she confessed reported the matter to Rome . . ." (2) "Popes, The" (Vol. X, p. 126, col. 2, last par.): "Alexander VI (Borgia), known in history as the most profligate of all the popes . . ." The expressions "confessed" and "most profligate" are to be noticed. By a misuse of terms, a priest is charged with having broken the seal of confession, and it is insinuated that all the popes (or many of them) were profligates! That kind of work seems to me dishonorable. Is there any more of it in the Jewish Encyclopedia?

San Francisco, Cal. SACERDOS.

The Editor in War Times

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial, "The Editor in War Times," presents a problem of considerable interest to the psychologist. Your indignant correspondents have no doubt whatever that the responsibility of bringing on the present war must be fixed respectively upon England, France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Servia, or on certain combinations of these countries. On the other hand, it is quite certain that the slender and often conflicting evidence at our disposal gives us nothing upon which a positive judgment in this complicated matter may be based. Now, most of these letter-writers are, doubtless, persons of some intellectual ability. If they were not, they would not be interested in a publication like AMERICA. Yet they have taken upon themselves to decide definitely, finally, with an assurance admitting no appeal, a question which possibly may be answered a century hence, when angry wounds have healed, and the secret archives of the European Governments are thrown open to the inspection of competent historical scholars. In addition to this, your correspondents show that they have no intention of considering any evidence which does not strengthen the decision they have already formed. And finally, these men and women, who in ordinary life would be quite incapable of gross discourtesy, write letters which, even though they are addressed to a mere editor, are not only discourteous, but, to judge from the quotations given, are decidedly insulting. "Look at us," they say. "Not only are we omniscient, but we are models of fairness and courtesy, and not like that bigoted, unfair AMERICA." And so these intelligent people bid farewell to open-mindedness, a proper sense of their own limitations, and to the most elemental courtesy.

Now this is the psychological problem offered: the malign influence of prejudice, rooted in nationalism, upon the intellect and will. In debated questions, say of law, of medicine, or in a dubious business proposition which it concerns us to settle, very few men take a decided stand before the evidence is all in. We want to hear all that is to be said on either side. This is only common sense. We do not impute sinister motives to those who offer enlightenment. This is the merest courtesy. Thus do men act when they wish to get at the truth. But let our nationalistic prejudices be ruffled ever so lightly, and as in a dissolving picture, the kindly Dr. Jekyll gives place to the furious demon Hyde.

Of course, I can understand that even intelligent people may be annoyed at times by some of AMERICA's war news, looking upon it as trivial or not well founded. But if an intelligent man is stirred to wrath when the other side of an argument in a matter of general interest is courteously presented, I should say that he stands in need of an alienist. If the man of strange medicines and manipulations pronounces him mentally sound, I hazard the further supposition that the wrathy one's intelligence is not so much a reality as a seeming.

Jersey City. THOMAS W. BUCKNER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am also one of AMERICA's first subscribers and have received every number ever issued, and I wish to say that it is precisely the dispassionate and logical treatment of all important matters in your editorial columns that places your excellent weekly on such a proud eminence even in peace times. And this same characteristic makes your review simply indispensable in time of such a war as this to those who, aside from preoccupations, wish to take a calm view of the immense battlefields. Of course, it is natural that a review whose readers are of all nations should partake, even in crucial times, of the breadth of view and exercise some of that admirable poise and self-control that characterize beloved Mother Church. The only complaint I could offer as to AMERICA is that it has too much and too varied solid matter in it every week, and it would be well, I think, to have occasionally a map, a diagram of a battle line, a cartoon, a caricature now and then, to make our ascent to AMERICA's level a slope less vertical. Meanwhile your Chronicle and other departments are the best by far that I have been able to find.

New Orleans. H. O. B.

Catholic Men and Women of Munich

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is hard to imagine a spirit of greater piety than exists here at Munich. The churches are crowded at every Mass, and all day long, with soldiers, for we still have 60,000 of them in the city, besides hundreds of officers. Before the troops leave for the front, they assemble in the church, often at eleven o'clock at night, and presenting arms to the uplifted monstrance, swear on their arms to die bravely for their country and not to touch a woman or a child of the enemy. It is a moving sight, and the sincerity of the men and their perfect willingness to die for the Fatherland is an example in patriotism that the world seldom witnesses. Germany stands as one man. There is not a dissenting voice, the women rivaling the men in heroism. Even when the husband, father or son falls, there is no murmuring. The fact that he has given his life to save the Fatherland seems to give them fortitude to bear the loss bravely. Their resignation is sublime.

Munich. M. LINDSAY.

All Germans!

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with great interest your editorial on the Editor's troubles in war time in last week's issue, and this week's editorial, "Everybody satisfied"; they have recalled to my mind some words I heard addressed to a religious many years ago. They are as follows: "It is not difficult to leave the world and its vanities to follow the Divine Master; but to renounce one's self, is altogether different." The items written in AMERICA from French, German, and Irish view-points are scientifically and conscientiously done, but each of them has an unmistakable German color. Nor is this surprising, it is human and unavoidable. It will not cause me to drop your excellent magazine, which has not its equivalent in the country.

Escanaba, Mich. A FAITHFUL READER.

Another View of Ireland's Attitude

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may be interesting for your readers to know some details that throw light on the present position of Ireland with regard to the war. There is to be a big meeting here in Mansion House this evening. Asquith is speaking in favor of recruiting, also J. Redmond. The country, as far as I can see, is apathetic and the Sinn Feiners positively hostile to it. Admission will be by ticket with name of holder to be got at Mansion House. This is to prevent any hostile display. Mr. Redmond's picture was hissed a few days ago in one of the theatres here, and the same was done at a concert when a song (adapted) expressed a hope for the destruction of Germany.

Dublin. J. O'M.

"Deadwood of Catholicism"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your Brooklyn correspondent, Mr. Shields, bids me come out of my "rose-scented easy-chair" and have a fight. How loath I am! He may be a siege-gun, and I so small. However, one may try. He opens fire on me with these words: "Mr. Chester does not submit a single fact that can be interpreted as disproving my statement." Now, Mr. Chester still maintains that he has disproved, or at least can disprove, Mr. Shields' statement that Catholic laymen are without leaders, and that the Jesuit Fathers have done nothing by way of instructing the laity as to their social obligations and cheap reading. Perhaps Mr. Shields does not call A Primer of Social Science cheap at eighty cents. If so, he must have that out with the publishers, who are not Jesuits.

But now, your correspondent makes more statements which he insists challenge my ability to answer to his satisfaction. Let us consider them. First, he says in effect that he has never made a layman's retreat with the Jesuits, although he "hopes to do so some time." Neither has he ever heard of retreats for workingmen and women as a class in this country. We regret these facts for Mr. Shields' sake; but far be it from us to dispute his truthfulness. Now, if he resided in Philadelphia, instead of Brooklyn, he might have heard of several retreats for working women and girls provided by convents of that city. With true Christian hospitality, the hours and seasons sought to accommodate the retreatants, not those who provided the privilege. Again, were he a careful reader, Mr. Shields would be familiar with the thousands of cheminots—railway men—in France who make such retreats annually, and with the equally numerous Belgian workingmen who have done the same for many years. Who can doubt that these lowly retreatants constitute the purest loyalty and courage of the French and Belgian armies to-day, following now, as in peace, their sacerdotal leaders? It is true, I did not confine my allusions geographically to the United States, as Mr. Shields evidently thinks I should have done, for that is not the Catholic way of speaking in general terms. To please him, however, I will now confine myself to New York and Philadelphia.

Unlike New York, Philadelphia has not, as yet, a House of Retreats. The movement is very recent here, and but two annual retreats for laymen have been given at Overbrook Seminary, the retreatants being the guests of the Reverend instructors. My information is obtained from a member of my own family, who has thus made two of the retreats. No Jesuit ever "ran after" him, because of his "wealth and worldly prominence," because he has neither. He received his invitation like any other Catholic layman, rich or poor, through the diocesan newspaper. That he chanced to be a scientist working twelve to fourteen hours a day, who established one of the first Pasteur laboratories in the United States for the treatment of hydrophobia, did not, of course, exclude him. I mention the fact here solely to keep him out of Mr. Shields' category of the "deadwood of Catholicism." Although confessedly of the upper middle-class, he is not dead in any sense. On the contrary, any layman, rich or poor, who voluntarily makes these retreats might more properly be called the life of the Church. He, like the general public of laymen, was told by an explicit clause of the invitation that it was himself and not his wealth of "worldly prominence" that the Jesuit Fathers wanted to see; if unable to cover the nominal cost of three days' board, he need only privately inform the Director, and he would be warmly welcomed without it. Now this very thing should be the test of a man's sincerity. There is only one pass-key necessary to these retreats, and that is poverty of spirit. Too often does the poor man who is rich in spirit reply to such gracious invitations: "Not if I know myself! If I can't pay what those rich fellows pay, I'll be hanged if I go on charity!" Now, it is otherwise with the rich man who is poor in spirit, for he reasons thus: "No money can ever even begin to pay for such hospitality and instruction. Their only price of admission is poverty of spirit; can I afford to give it?" Upon examining his conscience the rich and high-placed retreatant resolves that he will pay it, if it breaks the bank of his pride, and he enters by the low door of humility. Of course his stock goes up immediately after, but he did not know at the moment that it would be so. His sacrifice was genuine. He had doubts beforehand. There are no dinner coats or low vests at a Laymen's Retreat. The decent Sunday suit of the workingman is more de rigueur there. Pride alone can exclude either the rich or the poor.

As to the statement that this work "does not reach down and influence the great mass of Catholic men, every-day toilers who are the real support of the Church," I have this to say, "a poor thing, but mine own": Two hundred and ten Philadelphians made the two Overbrook retreats this year, double the number of last year. They returned to Philadelphia a living, working leaven that will spread through the entire inert mass of the city. Why? Not only because some were so-called workingmen, but because many were medical men, who are daily preventing race-suicide and other social immoralities. Some were jurists measuring out justice to the poor and the rich with a vision cleared by the spiritual retreat. These men fight divorce litigation, and therefore protect the home and the family. Publishers of books were there, men who hold countless minds and souls in trust. One, a convert, was a naval officer, whose influence and example are of the highest importance to our national security. My retreatant has associates and workingmen who must find in him their only source of Catholic light and truth, being all non-Catholics. Above all, these men are teachable. They seek wisdom from above. The workingman who sullenly refuses to be instructed is not to be commended, any more than the rich or learned man who will not be taught. It is a grand thing to see such men as I have cited sitting humbly at the feet of the Jesuit Fathers in order to learn how they may be of the greatest efficient service to their fellow-men, both at home and abroad. "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

Finally, for my rose-scented easy-chair looks good to me at this point, I must admit my own ignorance. I never heard before of a Jesuit Father having the chance to preach three times a day for a whole week to a thousand workingmen, without giving them any instruction on their social duties. True, there may be Jesuits who do not name justice and charity by the exact term, "social duties"; but justice and charity are what every Jesuit teaches. It is true that their methods of preaching justice and charity may not be those of the "Jew-Socialist" orator of the street corner, but they are safer. If I have "instructed" Mr. Shields to observe a layman's retreat from the inside for the first time, I shall be richly compensated for having forfeited his respect and friendship.

Chester Springs, Pa. E. S. Chester.

The Catholic Press

To the Editor of America:

The Catholic Press, this month's League Intention, has been a subject of meditation with me time and again: how to get people to read worth-while Catholic publications. Those who write upon this matter are not by any means agreed. A dozen or more Catholic papers and magazines come regularly to my house; each has an interest of its own, but few have time or inclination to read so many; this one is taken because it suits the children, this because mother likes it, this because the pastor recommends it, this other or rather these others because they represent certain devotions or works like the League, Extension, The Missionary. Is it time to have "The Catholic Literary Digest"? I have tried to get people to take America, the Ave Maria, and others, but with very little success. I am glad that the Catholic Press is prayed for by the League this month; it should be prayed for by Catholics every day, for it has a work to do without the Church as well as within it, and those who pray for it will support it and thus help it in all its work.

Cumberland, Md. W. E. Walsh.

Catholic Dailies in Belgium

To the Editor of America:

There is an evident mistake in your issue of October 3, p. 615: "Belgium, with its splendid Catholic spirit, has four Catholic dailies." On a moment's reflection I can recall at least fourteen Catholic dailies: five in Brussels, three in Antwerp, three in Ghent, one in Bruges, one in Liége, one in Namur. And I think there are more. This bears out all the more strongly your contention that "the indifference displayed by American Catholics to the project, revived periodically, of an American Catholic daily, . . . presents a sad contrast to the activity displayed by Catholics in Belgium and Germany."

Moline, Ill. C.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Calumniating Women

Who is responsible for the anti-Catholic war news that is making its way to the front pages of our newspapers? Some weeks ago, Catholics were shocked to learn that in an official communication from the Kaiser to the President of the United States, complaint had been made that Belgian Catholic priests had been guilty of "outrages against wounded soldiers and defenceless doctors and nurses." Anti-Catholic agitators in this country immediately seized upon the occasion, and it need not be said that the story lost nothing in the retelling. German investigation has proved the utter falsehood of the accusation, and it has been officially withdrawn. The secular press, which widely circulated this falsehood can hardly be counted upon to give its withdrawal equal publicity. Up to the present, the New York Evening Post alone has been brave enough to notice the charge and its withdrawal, editorially. And now we are asked to believe that the Sisters attached to the German Hospital Corps, have been gouging out the eyes of disabled soldiers, and of murdering by means of anesthetics, the wounded left on the field of battle.

That this is an untruth prompted not even by the excesses of pseudo-patriotism, but by diabolical hatred, is obvious enough. A line or two of weak refutation will soon find its way to the darkened inner pages of the daily press. But who is going to read a refutation? Written, weeks later perhaps, it either escapes notice, or in the minds of non-Catholic readers with an anti-Catholic bias, it creates the impression that, since the Catholic Church is continually on the defensive against all manner of vile charges, there must be something in the view that she is an enemy of the human race. This is precisely the effect intended, and usually secured, by the rascals back of the anti-Catholic campaign. Lie, lie bravely, and directly a refutation makes its appearance, lie again about something else.

War is horrible enough in its mildest aspects. Shall we, here in peaceful America, allow ourselves to do anything which may make it worse? At this very moment, there are ministering angels on the bloody fields of France and Belgium, religious women of whom our crime-sodden world is not worthy, the tenderly nurtured daughters of loving homes, who for God's love and the solacing of their suffering brothers and sisters, have renounced home and comfort and human affection, with all that, from a worldly point of view, might make a woman happy. The story of the heroic deeds of the Sisters, done in the face of flaming cannon and the rack of bursting shell, on the bloodiest battlefields of Europe and America, makes the veriest pagan thank whatever Power there be, that for all our vileness, human nature in the best of us can rise to a height of self-forgetting love that is above sublimity. The man who can deliberately calumniate any woman deserves contempt too deep for description. The skulking civilian who, safe at his desk, far from the noise of cannon, calumniates gentle, self-effacing Sisters who not only hold up white hands in prayer for the world's salvation, but at peril of their lives, leave their quiet homes for the battlefield that war may be a little less like sheer brutality, writes himself down as an abnormal creature who in some mysterious way has slipped into the world without a mother. The newspaper, which for the sake of a few coins cajoled from the pockets of sensation-lovers, gives wide and colored utterance to these vile calumnies, is equally despicable.

Meanwhile, we ask our Catholic organizations to seek the answer to two questions: First, who is responsible for the original forging of these wretched calumnies of our heroic hospital Sisters? Second, what power induces our daily papers to print and circulate them? The answers found, let Catholics act. Refutation does little or nothing to efface the stain produced by these outrageous stories. Let our Catholics see to it, that these outpourings of European and American anti-Catholic bigots, find no place in the pages of a paper which appeals to American readers for support.

Monkeys and Mortals

A monkey, so a New York newspaper states, recently departed this life. It is a fate common not only to monkeys but to mortal men also. This particular monkey, however, was connected, not by nature but by happy circumstances, with a family of exceptional social standing, and so he went down to the grave honored, and the daily press carried the news to an admiring populace. The advantage is to the monkey; for had he been a man the chances are that his demise would never have got as far even as the doorstep of a newspaper office. The body of the dead pet was placed in a casket, and lovingly borne in an automobile to New Jersey, where it now rests in a grave over which there are carnations, roses and other flowers; while a tombstone, as yet uninscribed, marks the spot, and the sad winds of autumn moan a requiem through the branches of the sombre pine trees. It may even be that his little spirit has joined Nick, the dog from Kentucky, and the rose-scented arm-chair from Boston, in that spirit world, where, so we are told, this piece of furniture was last located.

There is, of course, no comparison between a monkey and a mortal man; unless it be that many a monkey fares sumptuously every day while many a mortal starves. But the obvious lesson is that as the number of pet monkeys, pet pigs, pet cats, pet dogs and other beasts that perish, increases among any people of intelligence, so also the number of little human babies with immortal souls markedly decreases. And homes, wherein might be heard the patter of tiny feet and the merry piping of childish voices, echo with the bark, or the purr, or the grunt of some creature or other possessing neither reason nor will.

Meanwhile, we take leave of the hill in New Jersey, where the pine trees lament in the soughing breeze, and the sweet fragrance of carnations, roses and other flowers scents the air, and give, perhaps, a passing thought to those fields in far-off Europe where the steam of blood pollutes the air like a noxious cloud, and where the sum of ten cents will purchase an anesthetic for a mortal man, writhing in the agony of battle wounds, when the bearers lay him upon the military operating table.

Bandages or Bon-bons?

Famine is closing in on desolate Belgium. England appeals to the world for help, that her orphaned children may not be forced from their asylums into the street. The peasantry of France, inured to toil and privation, await with anxiety the coming of a bitter winter. Fathers and husbands, sons and brothers, the bread-winners, lie in the trenches. And in the homes they have left behind, there is dread, and the sound of weeping, wan little faces, and the plaintive voices of children who ask in vain for bread. The world is drenched in a rain of blood and tears. Rachel who will not be comforted, lives again in the mothers of Europe.

Frenchmen or Englishmen, Belgians or Germans, they are all our brothers, children of God, redeemed in the blood of His Son. What can you do, what can all of us do, we whom God has mercifully spared? We can pray for those who will not, can not, pray for themselves. We can ask our Father in heaven to wrap in the mantle of His infinite love, the almost countless souls which, in these dark Autumn days of the world, are rudely torn from life by war's unsparing blast. In our own hearts, we can foster a deeper love of God, that from its depths may spring a peace-giving love of all men, a love that is constant, a love that is catholic. Last of all, as proof that our love is real, we can give of our means, in measure pressed down and overflowing, in His Name, to the innocent victims from whom famine may soon withhold the broken crusts of the poor.

But let us give with a generosity guided by wisdom. We have been asked to send a "Santa Claus" ship to the children of Europe. "No real Christmas without toys, oranges, candies and nuts," we are told. "What will Christmas be for the war kiddies whose fathers are fighting far away from home?" For the gentle, mother-like spirit, awakened to sympathy by the grief of a child, who in his broken toy sees all his world in ruins, we have nothing but the truest respect. But in the present circumstances, we can not praise its wisdom. To-day, there are little children in the Protectories of England, France and Belgium, who in default of speedy aid, will shortly lack a roof over their heads. The hospital Sisters and the Red Cross Associates, report a shortage in medicines, in surgical appliances, even in suitable bandages. Plague now knocks at the gates of Austria. By the time these lines are read, famine and disease may be leading the masque of death across the broad stage of Europe.

It is to our credit that our wishes are more generous than our resources. But when children ask for food, it is not kindness to give them a diverting toy. When their fathers and brothers lie with wounds unstanched on the rude cots of a military hospital, let us buy bandages, not bon-bons. The empty Christmas stockings of the little ones of Europe, lend an added pathos to the story of the grim toll of war. Would that we might fill them, and for every desolate home in Europe, dress a Christmas tree, and bring father and brother home to light the candles, and make merry, as they did one short year ago, in the laughter of happy children. But we can not. Our slender funds must buy necessities. To employ them in the purchase of toys and bon-bons for the children would be folly; a lovable sort of folly, it is true, but none the less unwise.

Bombs and Churches

Peaceful, God-fearing citizens of New York have been shocked beyond measure by the explosion of a bomb in one of the metropolitan churches. As usual, the incident has called forth expressions of opinion from many sides. The I. W. W. has spoken with unusual vigor and frankness. The placing of the bombs is endorsed; regrets are expressed over the failure to do serious damage; more deadly instruments of destruction are promised on future occasions; temples of superstition must come down, and so on.

This last expression suggests both the reason of the crime and a solution of the problem out of which the offence grew. The reason is godlessness, utter, absolute godlessness, with all the swaggering, unholy disrespect for authority that it usually implies. Those bombs were set not simply to destroy churches. That was an accident in the plan. Their purpose was a stroke at God, who, in anarchy's eye, is an incubus, in that He imposes upon society bonds which hold the commonwealth together, in the form and with the purpose of a corporate body working unto good. This church and that church are not the objects of hatred. God, law, order, these are anathema. The protest is against God and all that He ordains. The destruction contemplated is to reach beyond fabrics and lives of individuals to society itself, and further, if possible.

In view of this the means discussed for solving the problem are childish to say the least. Police and statutes are powerless before it. Leprosy is not cured by a lotion. This plague is leprosy, the leprosy of unfaith with its attendant rebellion of soul against all restraint, however slight and reasonable. The cure is godliness, faith in God and obedience to Him. That this will come soon is not evident. Millions of Americans are far from such a state of soul. They do not want it for themselves nor for their children. Even did they want it, many of them would be afraid to say so. They would lack the courage to profess belief in God and to demand that their children be trained in His ways. Yet until this is done bombs and death and wreckage may be expected.

When shall it be done? Perhaps when a just man dies once again for the people, a violent death at the hand of the rabble.

A Masonic Program

The part played by Masonry in the persecution of the Church in Mexico, as previously in Portugal and France, is a fact well established. That all these actions were apparently but the execution of a complete program formally drawn up for all the Latin-American countries may not be so well known. The expulsion of religious Orders, the attacks upon the confessional and the Sacraments, the enforced secularization of the schools and similar measures intended to prepare for the final and complete destruction of the Catholic Church are all definite Masonic ordinations enjoined upon the brotherhood. Political agitation is to be carried on everywhere for this purpose. Those not willing to conform to this spirit of anti-Christianity, which is the ultimate expression of Masonic principles, shall be "liable to the most severe penalties of the Masonic law." Such are the regulations drawn up in the resolutions of the first General Congress of Latin-American Masonry, held at Buenos Aires in 1906. From the publication of the Central Verein, "Freemasonry and Christianity," we quote the following extracts originally taken from the tenth number of the Masonic journal of Caracas:

RESOLUTIONS.

5. Latin-American Masonry shall combat by every means in its power the clerical propaganda and the establishment and development of religious congregations, combining efforts to secure their expulsion from these countries. To effect this: (a) Freemasons shall not have their children educated in colleges managed by religious bodies. (b) Freemasons shall use their influence to dissuade their wives and prohibit their children from going to confession to a priest. (c) Freemasons shall not contribute in any way to the support of the religious bodies and their chapels.

6. Freemasons shall strive to enlist members of political parties who may defend their ideals and undertake to vote for the separation of Church and State, the expulsion of the religious congregations, civil inquiry, civil marriage and divorce, purely secular education, lay nurses in the hospitals, the suppression of the military chaplains, and other clerical laws.

7. Every Mason shall be bound to act in the profane world in accordance with the principles of Freemasonry; those who violate this code of honor being liable to the most severe penalties of the Masonic law.

10. Freemasonry shall strive to secure the withdrawal from the Vatican of the representatives of Governments, these not acknowledging the Papacy as an international power.

Throughout all the Latin-American countries this work has been systematically carried out. Beginning with the attempt to withdraw the wives and children of the brotherhood from the Church, Masonry ultimately contemplates depriving the Church of influence in schools, in the army, in hospitals and in institutions of every kind, finally wrecking its very altars when the time shall be ripe for universal proscription. This plan has been carried far forward in France, where even now the Catholic clergy, though called to the firing line of the army, are not officially acknowledged in their priestly capacity. The program was executed in Portugal, and now the last stages of its fulfilment are witnessed in Mexico amid scenes of horrid, unspeakable carnage, lust, ribaldry and blasphemy. Honorable fair-minded Americans should give these facts thought and judge of the beneficence of an organization whose principles lead to such excesses.

A Voracious Monster

Newspaper head-lines and the price-tags in bargain sales, being largely prompted by the pressing need of the immediate disposal of surplus goods, are not generally considered to be oversensitive in using words in their exact meaning. In the lexicon of advertising you do not find the word, "falsehood." You find "quick returns, efficiency, thoroughness, unblemished superlativeness," and the like. Advertising is the fabulous dragon of the day demanding its continual tribute of victims. Such trifles as grammar and truth have long since gone down its capacious maw, and its rapacity is whetted for daintier food.

Many of our distinguished modern writers can now be hired at so much a word to write up anything from a baby's sock to an old man's shroud. You pick up an attractively bound book, entitled the Passing of Time, and written by the well-known editor of the Pharisee. Having been acquainted with the author's previous works, you settle back for an enjoyable hour. You do not at first detect the deception, but before the end you find you have been decoyed into reading an advertisement for a Dollar Watch. Your favorite artist, too, the creator of the Fishson Young Man, has now a permanent occupation sketching all kinds and conditions of people in Alltheimer's Clothes. No office or position or eminence is secure from the power of advertising. If you are an actor you are using Somebody's toilet articles; if an actress, you are wearing Somebody's hats; if you are a baseball player, you are getting a constant supply of tobacco because you always use the Worst Weed Brand. College professors draw a handsome salary and give lucrative positions to the rest of their families, all engaged in the publicity department of great railroads.

If literature, art, professorial honor, truth, honesty, decency have been swept away by advertising, who will be the next victim? The man seated beside you at table may seem to you perfectly innocent when he praises the hostess' relish, but be careful or you will find that he has a catalog of the other fifty-eight varieties in his inside pocket. Why should friendship and hospitality be more sacred than conscience and self-respect?

Had Advertising been in existence in Homer's time, he never would have begged his bread in seven cities. The Smyrna Fig Co. would have acquired exclusive control of his verse to "limn in mellifluous lines the succulent fig-tree of Smyrna."

We should have had later on such startling announcements as these: "This statue for the Tiber River Food Co., displaying muscular development due to its cereals, comes from the studio of Michelangelo Buonarotti." "This canvas, picturing the 1516 model of an ox-cart, was done by the special artist of the Florence Car Co., Antonio Allegri di Correggio." "The Leeds Incubator Mfr. has the pleasure of announcing that the famous historian, essayist and writer of the Lays of Ancient Rome, T. Babington Macaulay, has consented to write entirely for this company's products. Mr. Macaulay will contribute a lay for every incubator."

The unregenerate individual, Advertising, must have the gospel preached to him. He must be converted. Advertising religion is a recent rallying cry. It is well. Make advertising the ally, not the master of religion. Let the lion lie down beside the lamb. If writers, artists, professors, preachers cry out that they must yield to the imperious demands of advertising, because they say, "We must live," religion should assert with a divine imperiousness that such extraordinary demands are not to be acceded to, because religion will reply: "That it is appointed for all men to die; that the necessities of life are not superior to the necessity of God's law; that if Christ advised friendship with the mammon of iniquity, we, too, ought and can make 'advertising our servants, not our tyrants.'"

In this way an instrument which, like all creatures, was intended to promote virtue, can be turned from ways that are often evil, to do honor to Christ who is Lord, not of man alone, but of all their thoughts and acts, even of "Advertising."

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry*

II.

ALICE MEYNELL.

A poet, obviously, is a poet, albeit he has been called worse names and better according to the sweet or sour temper of his critics! None the less, and other things being equal, we, in our faithful egotism, believe he will be a better poet when inspired by Catholic ideals. And this for a very simple reason: because his ideals become then larger than himself—older, clearer, more divine and more human, too, than the experience of one lifetime could possibly formulate. It is a priceless privilege for any one to share in the communion of saints: but to the artist, the poet, it brings a quite peculiar grace, a sort of sweet, "uncovenanted mercy" bearing fragrance for this world as well as the next. That is what we mean by the Catholic note, the Catholic consciousness, in poetry: a mystical thing, yet definite enough to be easily recognized and as easily missed.

A few weeks back we were considering, very briefly, the presence of this Catholic note in some non-Catholic choristers of to-day, the voices from without, as we called them. There could scarcely have been a more subtle compliment to the voices within! All ideals are infectious; and the Catholic note does not permeate the life or the literature about us save when it sweeps through its own sanctuaries with quite authentic and compelling harmonies.

That there has been a real renaissance of English Catholic literature, beginning with the Oxford Movement, is a fact scarcely open to controversy. It has given us some superb prose and some supreme poetry. From the first, indeed, its laureates were notable: the Oratorian poets, Newman and Faber; the Jesuit Father Hopkins, most intricate, most abstinent and most highly original of minor poets; Aubrey de Vere; and the mystical philosopher, Coventry Patmore. Then came the curious, somewhat exotic "renaissance of the 90's," with Francis Thompson, Lionel Johnson, "Michael Field," the frail, fine Dowson and, on our own side of the waters, John Banister Tabb, as conspicuous standard-bearers. All of these have gone from us now: an enormous loss to any singing body, a loss that might well prove crippling for half a century. And yet, the Catholic note is still potent enough to vibrate even without the Gates!

Nine out of ten critics, if asked to name offhand the three foremost women poets of to-day, would agree upon Alice Meynell, Katharine Tynan Hinkson and Louise Imogen Guiney, one English, one Irish and one American, but all, significantly enough, Catholic! What fact could be more hopeful for the best of feminism, what more indicative of the eternal fitness of things? For poetry is perhaps the one public field from which woman has never, since the days of the Hebrew Miriam and the Greek Sappho, been excluded. Another really delightful point about the present trio is their dissimilarity. Any study of them must become a study in sympathetic contrasts; for, in her certain and separate ideals, each of the three would seem to show forth not merely the "infinite variety" of woman (a thing to which the world has, presumably, gotten used!) but the greater and richer variety of Catholic faith.

From the first, from the early days when Ruskin pronounced some of her youthful lines the "finest things he had seen or felt" in modern verse, Alice Meynell has been a poet's poet. Only last year we discovered that the public, the people who read poetry, had come to her. That was, of course, when her name was so forcefully urged by English men of letters, and by literary journals without any distinction of creed, for the post of Poet Laureate. The time was not yet ripe, it seems. But none of us will soon forget that when T. P.'s Weekly whimsically undertook to find out by ballot whom English readers really wanted for the minstrel poet, Kipling came first in the list, Dr. Robert Bridges eighth, and lo! Alice Meynell second, with some five thousand, five hundred and ninety-eight votes.

---

*The second of a series of literary papers by the author of "The Poet's Chantry."

This was all the more astounding when one remembered the exceeding reticence of Mrs. Meynell's muse. She has written very little as quantity goes: the collected poems, published last year, covered scarcely a hundred and twenty pages. All along she has been occupied with a delicate and complex psychology, all along she has used a music intentionally quiet and subtle in its suggested emotion. Indeed, by her refusal to see the obvious, by her scorn of rhetoric, sentimentality and popular fireworks of any kind, Alice Meynell has once for all contradicted the banal charges ordinarily (and not without some ancient justice) brought against women poets!

She has contradicted other things as well. Alice Thompson, born in England, but educated largely on the Continent, came to the Church as an early convert. Early, too, she came to marriage with Wilfrid Meynell; and one remembers among other achievements of her life those three sons and four daughters bearing the melodious names of Everard, Sebastian, Francis, Monica, Viola, Sylvia and Olivia. Her friendships, too, have been an achievement: the Uranian intimacy of Patmore, of George Meredith and, as all the world knows to its gain, the heartwhole homage and devotion of Francis Thompson. Should one not expect from so "liberal" a life (the word is Mrs. Meynell's own) songs of fulness and consummation? Yet her richest theme has been, from the first, renunciation.

Perhaps the first conspicuous instance of this leit-motif was in "San Lorenzo's Mother," one of Mrs. Meynell's early poems and one of the last to be fogotten. There it was the renouncement of the mother: in other lines we find voiced the voluntary abdications of the poet, and the unending holocausts of the priest. Nearly all of her love poetry is a poetry of denial: best remembered, perhaps, will be those two tremendous fragments, "After a Parting" and "Renouncement" —poems both of the very white heat of passion, that white heat which, as de Vere once observed, "to colder natures appears but snow." Renouncement could be carried but one step higher; and this, too, Alice Meynell has done in that late and mystical lyric of God's sacred nay, "Why Wilt Thou Chide."

It can not be said that any large body of Mrs. Meynell's verse is strictly devotional in character. Yet she has touched no subject without the illuminative insight of high spirituality. And no subject has she touched more nobly (nor more reticently) than womanhood. If it be woman in public life, she thinks instinctively of the "sacred, young, provincial nun," Catherine of Siena. If it be the merely personal ideal, she sings with a penetrating and inspiring music of that high-souled, free-footed "Shepherdess" "who keeps her soul" so well in dark and light, in valley and on hilltop. So, too, with the poems of her Nature brooding—things observed at once delicately and definitely, as an artist in color might observe. "Spring on the Alban Hills" is well worth quoting; so is the "Daisy" sonnet, with its perfect ending:

> O daisy mine, what will it be to look
> From God's side even on such a simple thing?

But since we are considering Mrs. Meynell's poems chiefly, this time, for their Catholic note, we must practise her own "renouncement," pressing on to such sacramental pieces as "The Unknown God" or "General Communion"; or to that wonderful quatrain which has contrived to crystallize whole tomes of devotion, "Via, et Veritas, et Vita":

> "You never attained to Him?" "If to attain
> Be to abide, then that may be,"
> "Endless the way, followed with how much pain!"
> "The way was He."

"Christ in the Universe" is one of the most daring, one of the most Catholic, even one of the most theological poems attempted by any recent writer. It deals with no less a problem than the salvation of worlds other than our own. Yet who can doubt the poignant success of it, both devotionally and artistically? The "terrible, shamefast, frightened, whispered, sweet, heart-shattering secret" of the Incarnation is first dwelt upon, and that one forsaken Palestinian grave which remains chief treasure of our "ambiguous earth." Then, the stupendous question of God's possible dealings with the other planets, the Christ-pilgrimage throughout the universe! The theme, of course, is purely hypothetical, but big in suggestion: and its conclusion bears no disappointment:

> O, be prepared, my soul!
> To read the inconceivable, to scan
> The million forms of God those stars unroll
> When, in our turn, we show to them a Man.

Truly, one breathes rare ether when one walks with Alice Meynell. The largeness and yet the clearness of her thought are memorable, the rightness and finality of her judgment, when judgment is given! and always, the unique viewpoint. Consider, as a final instance, the amazing yet unstrained freshness of this Christmas poem:

"UNTO US A SON IS GIVEN."

> Given, not lent,
> And not withdrawn—once sent,
> This Infant of mankind, this One,
> Is still the little welcome Son.
>
> New every year,
> New born and newly dear,
> He comes with tidings and a song,
> The ages long, the ages long;
>
> Even as the cold,
> Keen winter grows not old,
> As childhood is so fresh, foreseen,
> And spring in the familiar green.
>
> Sudden as sweet
> Come the expected feet.
> All joy is young, and new all art,
> And He, too, Whom we have by heart.

Even such is the Catholic note in Alice Meynell's poetry.

KATHERINE BRÉGY.

REVIEWS

Reunion All Round; or, Jael's Hammer laid aſide, and the Milk of Human Kindneſs beaten up into Butter and ſerv'd in a lordly Diſh. By the AUTHOR of "Abſolute and Abitofhell." London: The Society of SS. Peter & Paul. New York: 37 E. 28th St. $0.18.

It is an open secret that the writer of this brilliant skit is the Rev. R. A. Knox, son of the Protestant Bishop of Manchester. Mr. Knox had already acquired a literary reputation as the author of "Some Loose Stones," which was presented as a counterblast to "Foundations," a book that figured largely in the Kikuyu affair on account of its extreme modernistic teachings.

Written in the style of Swift, without his coarseness, and with a running flavor of Rabelais, "Reunion All Round" is a satirical knock at the comprehensiveness of the Church of England. The pith and marrow of it will afford endless delectation to certain High Anglicans and such Catholics as were formerly Anglicans, or are familiar with that phenomenon known as "the mind of the Church of England." What could be more exquisite than the following proposal to admit Mahometans to the communion of the Church of England without at the same time giving offence to the Atheists:

> Would it not be well to introduce the Muezzin into our Church-towers, and at the fame Time to fee to it that his Announcement was both leſs provocative (to Atheists), and more appropriate; that he ſhould either ſhout out, The early Bird catches the Worm, or, if he were muſical, even intone to ſome ſimple Anglican Chant the words:
>
> Early to bed, and early to riſe,
> Makes a Man healthy, wealthy, and wiſe?

A place is to be found for "the Idolaters, eſpecially Papiſts", and even the Pope himself would be allowed to take rank as a retired Missionary Bishop! Finally, the writer declares that:

> It ſhall go hard but within a century at moſt we ſhall make the Church of England true to her Catholic Vocation, which is, plainly, to include within her Borders every poſſible Shade of Belief, Quod umquam, quod uſquam, quod ab ullis.

Nothing short of heroic virtue or invincible ignorance can constrain Mr. Knox, and those who think with him, to risk their eternal welfare by clinging to a religious system which he thus flays so unmercifully. Incidentally, the brochure is a typographical gem.

H. C. W.

Daniel Webster. By FREDERICK A. OGG. Philadelphia: George W. Jacobs & Co. $1.25.

The latest contribution to the "American Crisis Biography" series is a book that is well worth while. Nothing of importance has been omitted in these pages that portray the real Webster. It is a well-balanced account of a life that will always be of telling interest to the student of American history. The personal characteristics of the man start out at you from almost every chapter, and still there is no useless disquisition on the qualities that may or may not have been the character-elements of the great statesman. The activities that filled a very busy lifetime during a most important and critical period of our country's history, tell louder than words of the character of the Massachusetts Senator. Then, too, Webster's views on the questions of his day, his attitude toward political policies, his judgment of the great men of that very interesting period, whether friends or antagonists, are put before the reader in the words of Webster himself, as found in his letters and speeches. As one of our greatest public men Webster will always appeal to Americans. And it is especially as a public man that Professor Ogg has treated the subject of his biography. Yet he is by no means timorous about giving an estimate of Webster's character. Whether we agree with him or not in that estimate, at least it wins our confidence in the writer to meet with straightforward opinions. For instance, toward the end of the book, when the author comes to balance the faults and virtues of Webster in the scale of his individual judgment, he says:

> Daniel Webster was not a paragon of virtues. He had faults, some of which were not only serious, but inexcusable. . . . By his failure to keep under restraint the ambition which burned within him to attain the presidency, he permitted his later years to be made feverish and unhappy, and his usefulness to his generation to be impaired.

With Henry Cabot Lodge the author holds that the orator's moral vigor was not equal to his intellectual force. To Webster's intellectual power his biographer pays worthy tribute, placing him above Clay and Calhoun in his own generation, and owning him second to none among the great figures in our history.

G. C. T.

Lichens from the Temple. By ROBERT RESTALRIG LOGAN. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Songs toward the Sunlight. By HANFORD CHASE JUDSON. New York: Stewart & Co. $1.50.

Lyric poetry is the unbosoming and the unbaring of the poet's soul, when every curve and corner and crevice lie revealed before us. Therefore is it always an interesting and profitable employment, no matter how little or much the poetry be worth artistically, to take advantage of the door thus opened and peer into the inner sanctuary of a human heart, to learn what gods are there adored, what the prayers are that rise therefrom.

The temple of poesy from which Mr. Logan has brought us these lichens reveals itself a temple of doubt and near pessimism. To live for him, he tells us, is an effort; to die is a chance.

> Toward the supernatural world in vain we cry,
> In vain our hands extend;
> From that blue ribbon we call the sky,
> Dead leaves alone descend.

Thus ends the very first poem of his book which begins then its round of sorrowful mysteries; in his "Good Dog Guy" threnody he would have us think a dog's demise to be well nigh as worthy of tears as is a man's passing, for even dogs "share the elemental fire"; and men are not worth much as a rule.

These lichens have some "cosmic dust" clinging to them, and the twilight gray of agnosticism is shadowed through them, yet they are fair in form and fresh to the eye. The author's striking phraseology and quotable verses deserve to carry a better message.

Mr. Judson's soul is sunlit and cheery, and his poems are real and human. From factory window or in Broadway's glare some spot of brightness and joy is shining for him. He discerns the beauty in the face of man or in the many-faced fields of earth and sky. He glows with American optimism, with the love of action and the jostle of street crowds, and he thrills to the touch of the heroic in any mould it may chance to be cast. The story of Père Jogues the author tells with sympathy that falls off slightly, however, from complete understanding, and ends his ballad with a description of Auriesville:

> And there I stood one autumn day,
> Watching the pilgrims kneel to pray.
> Though many were of lighter mind,
> Yet some devoutly seemed to find
> Before the shrine increase of power.
> I watched. I did not bend the knee;
> Yet something in the place and hour
> Loaned man a greater dignity.

The poems are smooth and simple and bring us into contact with a thoughtful and pleasing soul. The volume's price is rather high.

J. P. M.

Researches into Chinese Superstitions. By HENRY DORÉ, S.J. Translated from the French with notes, historical and explanatory, by M. KENNELLY, S.J. Shanghai: Tusewei Printing Press. London: Kegan, Paul & Co. $2.50.

The scholarly work of Father Doré is the first volume of the well-known series "Varietés Sinologiques" or Miscellanies on China, published by the Jesuit Fathers of the Shanghai Mission. Four other volumes have been completed and are being done into English.

The author's labors and travels as a missionary for over twenty years in the provinces of Kiangsu and Nganhwei, have given him unusual opportunities of closely studying the multiform and rather picturesque superstitions of the Chinese. In the quaint old inland towns and secluded villages, and in the unfrequented monasteries and temples not yet blighted by foreign sophistication, he has learned to know the superstitions of the people in all their native vigor. He has given us a very faithful reproduction with vividness of color and detail that makes this volume not only instructive, but very entertaining reading. To his own painstaking personal researches Father Doré has added the result of careful study of, and comparison with such standard Sinologists as Doolittle, Beal, Hackman and de Groot.

The valuable albums of the Jesuit Library in Sicawei have yielded their rich store of pictures of gods and goddesses, genii and mythical heroes to complete and embellish the text.

The work is, without doubt, a valuable addition to the study of "Comparative Religions." Although scientifically critical throughout, the book is written in a style that makes it intelligible for the general reading public. Father Kennelly, one of AMERICA'S frequent contributors, has done his colleague's work into very readable English. P. G. R.

A Far Journey. By ABRAHAM MITRIE RIHBANY. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.75.

"A Far Journey" indeed and a sad one, too, though the author does not see its pathos. For as a boy in Syria he was a devout member of the "Holy Apostolic Greek Orthodox Church," so many of its tenets are those of Catholicism, but now he is the pastor of the "Church of the Disciples," which was founded in Boston seventy-two years ago by James Freeman Clark, a Unitarian of the Unitarians. Mr. Rihbany tells us how he lost one after another the Catholic truths preached to his Antiochean ancestors, perhaps by St. Peter himself. With some of these tenets the author found it hard to part. His Church's beautiful ritual appealed to him strongly, he still recalls with "grateful appreciation" the solemn Masses at which he assisted and confesses:

> I felt especially predisposed to set my face against Protestantism when it taught me to give up adoring (sic) the Virgin Mary, the "Mother of God."

But the Presbyterian mission schools ensnared the poor little Syrian boy and gave him the "open Bible" and "religious freedom" in return for the faith of his forefathers. At the age of twenty Mr. Rihbany landed in New York with nine cents in his pocket, and after many hardships made a course at the Ohio Wesleyan University, and became the pastor of a Congregational church at Morenci, Mich. Charged with departing from "sound doctrine" he resigned his pulpit and then drifted further and further away from Christianity till finally he was considered "advanced" enough to preach to the Boston "Disciples." The author regards his "Far Journey" as a triumphal march from darkness and bondage to freedom and light. Therein lies the pathos of the book to the Catholic reader. W. D.

The College Course and the Preparation for Life. By ALBERT PARKER FITCH. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $1.25.

This book comprises a series of informal talks delivered to the undergraduates of Williams College by the President of the Faculty of Andover Theological Seminary. In itself, the book is utterly without importance. Its philosophy is crudely idealistic, its theology, a collection of modernistic tags. But a melancholy interest attaches itself to these talks, when one reflects that they mirror the weak and beggarly elements, which are presented to non-Catholic colleges as Christianity. One no longer wonders why Christianity is dead in many of these institutions.

Mr. Fitch's valiant defense of the intellectual claims of Christianity fizzles out in a weak appeal, that since no one can prove anything under any circumstances, why not make believe that Christianity may be just as true as atheism?

> We believe in the validity of human knowledge, pleads this modern Athanasius, but the belief is a pure assumption. We can not prove it. We just trust that things are as they appear to be. . . . Now the same thing is true in the realm of religion. . . . The only thing that Christianity asks of you is this: since you have got to live by faith anyway, it asks you to have faith in its view of the world. We can not prove that view, neither can our opponents prove theirs. Belief in the Christian God is a leap in the dark.

The Athanasian, the Nicean and the Apostles' Creed, "do appear to us to be extraordinarily able . . . yet, of course, they are mistaken; and, of course, they are deficient in part; for they come from somewhere about the third century, and we are the children of the twentieth century." The twentieth century is happy in possessing a scholar who can sweep away three venerable creeds, with two lightly uttered "of courses." But what ineffable silliness can be found between the covers of books, even when written by Heads of Theological Faculties, is illustrated when Mr. Fitch sets down "the only tenable theory" of scriptural inspiration.

> I know the Bible is inspired, not because God dictated it, not because miracles or predictions are found in it, not because it is or has ever been inerrant; but because it inspires me. Being an inspiring book, of course, it is inspired.

Religion, according to the learned President, is the development of an instinct "which, together with the desire for food and clothes, and the sex-hunger, is one of the three fundamental motor-impulses of the race." If in the course of these dull and shallow pages, there is even an attempt to explain, still less to defend, the truth of Christ's divinity or of Christ's definite teaching, diligent search fails to reveal it. The President of the Faculty of the Andover Theological Seminary has given us, not a defense, but a caricature of Christianity. The book is a striking proof of the decay of Christianity in many Protestant theological centres, and of the irreligious influences to which Catholic students in non-Catholic colleges are exposed. P. L. B.

Historical Records and Studies. Edited by CHARLES GEORGE HERBERMANN, LL.D. Vol. VII, June, 1914. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.

This is the sixteenth volume of "Records and Studies" that the Catholic Historical Society has published since January, 1899. Each one has been a substantial and scholarly addition to the general collection of the Catholic historical data of the United States, and the whole set is an accomplishment not surpassed by the work of any of the secular historical societies so much wealthier in resources and stronger in membership. This result is due, in large measure, to the zeal and unselfish sacrifice of the president of the society, Dr. Charles G. Herbermann, who has devoted his valuable time to the gathering together and editing of the many papers that fill the attractive volumes of the series. In the present one he contributes the opening chapters on "The Sulpicians in the United States," a history, drawn from new and authoritative sources, that promises a very important survey of the work of the Congregation which had so much to do with the early organization of the Church in the United States. Another article from his pen deals with the question "Was Columbus a Spaniard and a Jew?" Readers of AMERICA will be specially interested in two contributions, "Le Moyne D'Iberville," by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J., and "A Catholic University and Its Founders," by Rev. M. J. O'Connor, S.J. In the first Father Campbell tells the story of one of the most famous of the Canadian pioneers and explorers, and in the other Father O'Connor details Catholic progress in one of the Middle Western States and the founding, at Omaha, Neb., through the generosity of John and Edward Creighton, of the splendid free Catholic university that now bears their name. Other historical papers included in the volume are: "St. Mary's College, Wilmington, Delaware," Rt. Rev. Henry A. Brann, D.D.; "Pierre D'Ailly and the Discovery of America," Canon Louis Salembier; "Holy Trinity Parish, Boston," Paul H. Linehan; "The San Blas Indians," Rev. Henry C. Pouget; "Fra Junipero Serra and the California Missions," Ann Judge; "A Village Churchyard," Thomas F. Meehan, and "Results of My Cartographical Investigations," Rev. Joseph Fischer, S.J. There are a number of illustrations adding to the interest and value of the text. I. F. M.

Indian Days of the Long Ago. By EDWARD S. CURTIS. Yonkers, N. Y.: World Book Co. Price, $1.00.

The North American Indian is well-nigh gone from among us. The fascination and pathos of his story will never go. Child of sky and earth and winds, wild with the wildness of the untrammeled forest, simple as those ever are whose life lessons are conned from nature's text-book, drawing from uninterrupted communion with nature strange myths and stranger creeds, the Indian has a charm for us that does not die with his dying race. "Indian Days of the Long Ago" repictures for us the redman in his native haunts and rugged ways. The picture is frankly ideal. Under the author's touch we forget much that we would fain forget of the darker side of Indian life, and the redman stands before us in softer light. The story is of Kukusim, Indian boy and chief-to-be of the Salish, a Rocky Mountain tribe. His story is told from early boyish pranks and pastimes, from rabbit hunt and forest foray to the dread mountain fast which ushers in the dawn of manhood. Classic war-hoop and bloody massacre are conspicuously absent. For this we are grateful. But the book is rich in its fulness of the simple, homely, more helpful, if less bloodthirsty adventures of Indian domestic life, of the exciting deer and buffalo hunt, of stories told in the glow of evening camp-fire. The whole is imaginatively set before us with a literary charm and simplicity, which, while not without its appeal to maturer minds, will especially furnish profitable and entertaining reading to the young. I. W. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The current number of the Catholic Mind contains a luminous study of "New England Thought," by the Rev. Michael J. Mahoney, S.J., an admirable paper on "Calvinism and Our Literature," by Father James J. Daly, who is such a favorite of AMERICA'S readers, and a short article on "Pragmatism." Thoughtful Catholics, who wish to trace back to its sources contemporary American thought, will find in this pamphlet abundant food for reflection.

The belated number of the October Month is more or less of a war number. The many so-called revelations regarding this war receive attention at the hands of Father Thurston in "War Prognostics and Prophecies"; some of them are dealt with in a summary manner. English Protestant mendicancy, which has tried to make an appeal to the pockets of the unwary on the strength of the war, gets an excellent set-back from the mordant pen of Mr. James Britten. The strongest paper is "Militarismus," an article dealing with the present war and von Bernhardi in particular. This article is not, nor does it pretend to be, strictly neutral; at the same time it questions the most vital elements of Bernhardi's book in a manner that is fair and entirely illuminating. The "Mary's Meadow Papers" form a grateful change from the warlike atmosphere.

The "Wall of Partition," by Florence L. Barclay (G. P. Putnam's Sons, $1.35) is a healthy and interesting story that approaches at times the level of greatness. The hero is a self-centred person who feeds himself and his publishers on a tragic past, till an accidental peep into the Bible and a graveyard, and a penchant for kindness to birds and widows and other long-suffering mortals, with the reappearance of the very charming heroine of his tragedy, induce a proper humility and, therewith, faith and happiness. The lights and shadows are over strong for the judicious, but as that which they emphasize is good there is no harm done. "Billy," the best of the male characters, is unfairly cheated of happiness, but in order, we suspect, to save him for another novel. He is worth it.

The Benedictine Fathers of Mt. Angel, Ore., have issued their "St. Joseph's Kalender" for 1915. Besides the usual illustrations, stories and matters of general interest, it contains the naturalization laws of the United States and the questions which are likely to be asked in the examination for citizenship, together with the required responses. Questions and answers are given both in English and German. The "Regensburger Marienkalender" has likewise arrived. It is the fiftieth anniversary of its first appearance and the Kalendermann offers his greetings to his readers. He may well recount with satisfaction the blessings which this messenger of Mary has brought to countless homes through the course of half a century. A calendar is likely to be read and reread by the entire family and its devotional pictures and articles offer many an inspiration and suggest many a lifting of the heart to God. Each of the above calendars is sold at retail for twenty-five cents. The "Marienkalender" is published by Fr. Pustet.

During the conclave of the Cardinals at Rome the Catholics of Germany took the opportunity to present to the members of the Sacred College their "Memorandum Catholicorum Germanicorum Patribus Purpuratis Eminentissimis. S. R. E. Cardinalibus Anno 1914 humillime oblatum." It is issued in a purple cover and contains the signatures of the leading Catholics of the Empire. The object of the memorandum was to present "the truth regarding the causes and origin of the war." As the reason for this step is mentioned the fact that at that time Germany was practically cut off from communication with the rest of the world. "All telegraphic agencies are in the hands of the enemy," says the document, "and are active almost every hour in spreading a great number of false reports concerning the German people and the German Empire." The volume is documented and contains a Latin version of various diplomatic telegrams intended to show how England could have prevented the war between Germany and France if it had desired to do so. The Latin versions of the German White Book and of two speeches, one by the Emperor, the other by the Imperial Chancellor, then follow.

The late Charles Augustus Ward an English "scholar-hermit," who burned to be considered a "literary man," had once induced Carlyle to listen for three hours and a half to the reading of a manuscript and subsequently received from the shrewd Scot some letters of frank criticism which were in part recently published. Carlyle gave this sage advice:

> If you resolve to devote yourself to literature, and the questionable enterprise of unfolding whatever gifts may be in you in the shape of more spoken or written words—which, for a young man in earnest with his life, and possessed of real capabilities and opportunities for work in this world, I consider a very questionable enterprise indeed—it is clearly necessary, in the first place, that you instruct yourself, acquire knowledge far and wide, amass experiences, and digest the same into definite results—in short, that you should have attained to some conquest of what at least seems to yourself Wisdom and beautiful Insight, before you attempt uttering yourself with the whole world for audience. You are otherwise (I mean to say, every man is otherwise, for what the special "you" may be in this case is not known to me) in the condition of a man "speaking" without having anything to say. . . . By all means, employ your spare time in seeking knowledge; redeem, if you can, a few hours of every day; read Books, and try to make sure that they are wise Books; consort with wise men, avoid the company of fools; think, reflect, enquire; study earnestly to find some true and noble thing in this world to which you can swear fealty: the day may come when you are really called to speak to your fellow creatures;—but I can tell you, it will be happier for you if it never come; if whatever nobleness and wisdom are in you can come out in the way of silent work and successful conduct,—appealing to the Eternal Powers (who are good judges and can reward), not the Ephemeral Reviewers, who have no power except in the circulating libraries, and no judgment that is infallible for the guidance of man!

Carlyle then earnestly counselled the practice of "the Silences," of which he writes elsewhere:

> Looking round on the noisy inanity of the world, words with little meaning, actions with little worth, one loves to reflect on the great empire of silence. The noble silent men, scattered here and there each in his department; silently thinking, silently working; whom no morning newspaper makes mention of!

Whether or not the three volumes Mr. Ward eventually published were grave violations of the Silences does not appear. But if many of to-day's authors would only lay to heart Carlyle's advice, their books would be fewer in number and higher in quality.

"I can not write the book I want to write," complained a highly successful novelist. "The public wouldn't have it if I wrote it. I have become committed by success to a certain type of story, and even if the public would have it, the publisher wouldn't." Commenting upon his grievance the Boston Evening Transcript observes:

> The case is not unusual. The comedian always wants to play Hamlet. The painter who has established a reputation for his sheep or cows or ducks is compelled by those who buy his pictures to paint sheep or cows or ducks forever, and any departure from his rule of life means loss of time and money. So also with authors, except the great ones, who can do as they please. Once a man has written a sensational story that has a big "run" he is doomed to the writing of sensational stories until the end. Once he has turned out a popular detective story—well, he must chonicle the doings of "sleuths" and "crooks" till he wearies with exhaustion. It is the fly in his amber that the better thoughts within him, the products of his artistic growth, and his ideals, can not find expression. He is a slave in a galley—a galley of his own making—condemned by insistent forces to do as he has done, and not as he would wish.

But in many such cases, the public, it must be owned, is more deserving of compassion than the author. The unhappy reader whose soul is on the rack until he has devoured the twenty-ninth and latest detective story or medieval romance of his "favorite author" is just as worthy of pity as the helpless writer himself.

The tide is still going out against the higher critics of literature. Gaston Paris is quoted triumphantly by Professor Gilbert Murray in his "Rise of the Great Epic." "The great savant" is cited to uphold the professor's theory of the multiplicity of authorship in Homer. "The Song of Roland," says Gaston Paris, "is not a work composed in one effort at a given moment. The name of the author is Legion." Professor Murray appeals to this great savant and to the divisionists of the Pentateuch in confirmation of his views about Homer. But alas for the "great savant"! A greater savant in the person of Professor Bédier has now come and upset the conclusions of Gaston Paris. Professor Comfort, summarizing M. Bédier's investigation in the Dublin Review for July says:

> The significance of this theory can not be mistaken. It is in line with other criticism of our day, which is doing away with the communal origins of poetry and establishing the predominance of the individual in authorship. . . . M. Bédier contends for the artistic unity and the individual authorship of our Roland as an expression of ideals in 1100.

According to M. Bédier, "There is not a single epic form or even a single episode which is localized anywhere in Italy apart from a pilgrim high-road." This statement offers a strange parallel to the "Iliad" which, according to Leaf, was a struggle for a trade route, and in its Trojan Catalogue followed the trade routes. "The Æneid" also is said to "follow a chain of temples where travelers used to stop to adore Aphrodite" and Bérard has endeavored to show that the "Odyssey" is reminiscent of Phœnician traveling. The spade of the excavator has destroyed Wolf's test of early civilization. The contradictory conclusions, arising from the various intrinsic tests, have robbed them of all validity, and now M. Bédier does permanent injury to Wolf's other extrinsic test of primitive epic, moulded by the people out of ballads. The artistic faith of poets and literary critics in general is justified. Homer is one and inseparable.

Here are three little devotional works Benziger Brothers publish: "Meditations on the Rosary" ($0.35) consists of "the mysteries of the Rosary set down in verse, to bring before the mind the main facts in the life of Our Lord and of His Mother." The verses, in number corresponding to the number of Paters, Aves and Glorias repeated in the full chaplet, will be of help to one looking for simple and pious thoughts as the beads slip through the fingers. The work was evidently a labor of love to the "Brother of the Little Oratory." "The Meaning of Life" ($0.35) is a collection of short essays on spiritual subjects by Father A. Goodier, S.J. All of them are interesting and instructive. In "The Fact of God," for example, which at first blush seems designed for those of no faith, the author gives the hackneyed difficulties alleged by those who do not wish to believe and in no hackneyed style answers them. Careful reading here, beyond the points of instruction, will reveal even to the faithful many home truths and suggest fruitful meditation. In his essay on "Worldliness" the author finds a rather restricted meaning for the word "character" with which his fellow-religious, Father Hull, would hardly agree. The French author of "The Crucifix" ($0.35) brings us back nineteen centuries and tenderly unfolds before our eyes the drama of the Redemption. The thoughts are arranged under eight headings, and will appeal to lovers of the crucifix.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Bros., New York:
The Holy Bible, Translated from the Latin Vulgate and Diligently Compared with other Editions in Divers Languages. (Douay, A. D. 1609; Reims, A. D. 1582.) Published as Revised and Annotated by Authority. $1.00; The Prophet's Widow. By Anna C. Browne. $1.25; A Broken Rosary. By Mary Agnes Finn; The Worst Boy in the School. By C. M. Home; Lord Clandonnell. By S. M. Christina; Roma. By Rev. Albert Kuhn, O.S.B. Part VI. $0.35.

Burns & Oates, London:
The Shadow of Peter. By Herbert E. Hall. Second Edition Revised and Enlarged. 2s. 0d.

Century Co., New York:
Little Eve Edgarton. By Eleanor Hallowell Abbott. $1.00.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Germany and England. By J. A. Cramb. $1.00.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Joyful Heart. By Robert Haven Schauffler. $1.25; Handicapped. By Homer Greene. $1.25.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Ten Sex Talks to Girls. By Dr. Irving David Steinhardt. $1.00; Ten Sex Talks to Boys. By Dr. Steinhardt. $1.00.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
Little Women Letters from the House of Alcott. By Bonstelle de Forest. $1.25.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Edited with Notes by Herbert Bates. $0.25.

McBride, Nast & Co., New York:
The Subterranean Brotherhood. By Julian Hawthorne. $1.50.

J. H. Praetz, New York:
A Digest of Savings Bank Laws. By Joseph H. Praetz, LL.B. $1.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Hinduism in Europe and America. By Elizabeth A. Reed. $1.25; Fremont and '49. By Frederick S. Dellenbaugh. $4.50; The Book of the Bayeaux Tapestry. By Hilaire Belloc. With 72 Illustrations in Color. $3.50.

York Publishing Co., New York:
Spiritual Interpretations. By Francis C. Lucas. $0.50.

EDUCATION

A School for Reverence

"The most fearful problem with which we have to deal," said the Chief Magistrate of the New York Municipal Courts, in a recent public address, "is the horde of young men from sixteen to twenty-four years old who daily appear before us. Their number is continually increasing. Their characteristic mark is an utter lack of reverence for man, for law, for conscience, and for God." To assign the causes of this frightful disorder, to indicate the means of checking it, did not lie within the scope of the learned magistrate's discourse. But that his words expressed the literal truth, no student of American life will for a moment doubt.

Reverence, twin sister of humility, the peculiar property of great souls, seems fast becoming a lost virtue. Well may we ask what has become of that old-time chivalry for the mothers and sisters of other men, which once, we could truthfully say, was characteristic of Americans. The answer may be read in our congested divorce courts. On your way down town to-morrow morning, glance at the theatrical billboards. The advertisements in the car that bears you to your office, that stare at you from the pages of your morning paper, you can hardly escape. Shameless is the present-day exploitation of women, shameless and shocking to a degree surpassed only by the infamous slave-marts of ancient Oriental paganism. For a penny, men disgrace the mothers who bore them. But what has become of woman's reverence for herself, when her chosen garb makes her an ever-recurrent subject of ribald jest? when mothers clothe their children in a fashion against which Martial and Ovid, vile as they were, protested as destructive of public decency? Where is the reverence for childhood in the community which, on the plea of economic necessity, authorizes the childless home? If the hand that is the comforter of childhood, or should be, is raised against the fabric of the race's honor, the future can hold nothing but ruin. If this be thought an exaggeration, an argument may be found in the almost vanished Puritan stock in New England, in the horror that has cost France more subjects than a century of war.

Upon what food has public opinion fed that it has grown so vile? The sources of this corruption are many, but among the most harmful is the school which has closed its doors against God. This is an old answer, an answer upon which Catholic apologists have rung the changes since the days of Julian the Apostate, the true father of secular education. But it is new in the confirmation given it by each new generation. We are reminded by a non-Catholic social worker, Mr. R. Fulton Cutting, that more than eighteen million children in the public schools of this country are receiving no direct moral instruction whatever. For five hours daily, five days of the week, they are in touch with their teachers, and under the teacher's influence, in a school which bars religion. Once a week, less than one per cent. of these children go to Sunday schools which attempt to make up for the lack of moral education in the public schools. In this fact, Dr. Williams, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Michigan, finds the cause of many defections from the ranks of his communion. The Methodist Bishop, Dr. Candler, whose noble fight against the atheizing influences of the Carnegie millions deserves all praise, tells us that we may as well understand first as last, that the policy of religionless education and unmoral culture can end in nothing but disrespect for all authority, and ruin for both Church and State.

Is Dr. Candler's prophecy coming true? For more than three-quarters of a century we have been looking at the little schoolhouse, set on the mountain-top whence cometh our salvation. And we have more murderers than all Europe combined. We have a divorce court that is a scandal to pagan Japan. Let us examine the criminal record of a single American city, one which numbers nearly a million children in its public schools. In two boroughs of the city of New York, during the last year, nearly one hundred and forty thousand persons, or about one to every fifteen of population, were arrested for crimes or misdemeanors, so patent as to fall under the observation of a police force not particularly trained in cunning or astuteness. About forty thousand were boys and young men between the ages of sixteen and twenty-four. To pass upon these cases, the city is obliged to maintain eleven courts, of which several are in session both day and night, Sundays and holidays included. It is now proposed to extend this municipal court by the establishment of several additional tribunals. In the same period, nearly fifteen thousand children came before the Juvenile Court. Many of these, it is true, were neglected, not delinquent children, but a neglected child almost invariably connotes a delinquent parent. For this riot of disorder in a single city, which is administered, if not more efficiently, at least as well, as the typical American municipality, the school must bear its share of responsibility. The public school has been given a full and free chance to prove what it could do in the improvement of the standards of living. It is backed by the State. It has enjoyed the favor of those who saw in it a needed protest against "sectarianism." Financial resources, almost without limit, have been at its command. The city of New York alone, during the year closing July 31, 1913, expended on the public schools the sum of $40,058,862.32. In the last fifteen years, according to figures compiled from what appear to be incomplete reports, $373,811,781.22 were appropriated by the city for the maintenance of the public schools.

Has the return been adequate? With the best of intentions, money may be foolishly invested. To those who believe that the school should be a potent factor in the formation of Christian character—and, be it remembered, ours is a Christian civilization—the results of the system which has absorbed these millions, are depressing. As its very foundation, that system writes the expulsion of the Christian religion from the school. Experience only confirms what a critical a priori examination led us to believe. As far back as 1852, the historian, Allison, no friend of Catholic projects, could write:

> Experience has now abundantly verified the melancholy truth so often enforced in Scripture, so constantly forgotten by mankind, that intellectual culture has no effect in arresting the sources of evil in the human heart; that it alters the direction of crime but does not alter its amount. This melancholy truth is supported by a most widespread and varying mass of proof. The utmost efforts have for a quarter of a century been made in various countries to extend the blessings of education to the laboring classes; but not only has no diminution in consequence been perceptible in the amount of crime and the turbulence of mankind, but the effect has been the reverse. They have both signally and alarmingly increased.

Turn to the Catholic school. What it stands for, the whole world knows. Reverence for God; reverence for man, His image; reverence for lawful authority representing Him in Church and state; reverence for one's own body, the temple of His Holy Spirit, is its very atmosphere. Over the heads of the children hangs the Crucifix, recalling the Saviour who in submission to His Father's will gave up His life for our salvation, and was heard for His reverence. With the saving sign, they begin their work in the name of the ever-adorable Trinity. Together the little lips move in prayer, incense wreathing the throne of God. They are repeating the words which fell from those adorable lips when, in far off Galilee, the Master said to his disciples: "Thus shall ye pray: Our Father Who art in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name." A pause, and once more from the hearts of children, arises the salutation of the Angel, in words not human but divine, since they were conceived before eternity in the mind of God, taking counsel within Himself concerning man's redemption. A swift, short, touching invocation and the little ones put themselves in the Heart of Jesus; and again the saving sign, in the name of the Triune God. Their angels who ever look upon His Face, hover over them. Mary, God's Mother and theirs, the most perfect, most lovable example of all that is supremely sweet and pure, smiles at her children, as, long ago, she smiled on her little Son in the fields of Nazareth. Into the hearts of many, Jesus Himself has come that very morning.

True the schoolhouse may be old and poor, the scorn of dilettante sociologists, much like the lowly home of Nazareth—but why trace further the difference between the school built for the glory of God, and the palace that is raised for the glorification of man? They that run may read.

P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

The Divine Test

A special characteristic by which Our Lord wished His disciples to be distinguished from the pagan world about them was to be their love for one another, which would of necessity express itself in outward acts of mutual service. Greatness of power was to bring with it only increase of service. In consonance with this spirit the Head of the well-nigh three hundred million faithful throughout the world, the Vicegerent of Christ, still rejoices in the title which he officially bears, "Servant of the servants of God." Such service does not diminish authority, since authority is derived from God, but its purpose is to join high and low, rich and poor, in one Christian unity of love for the promotion of the common good. This principle of mutual service, which is the pivot of Christian social life and government, the Gentile world had never been able to understand:

> You know that they who seem to rule over the Gentiles, lord it over them: and their princes have power over them.
> But it is not so among you: but whosoever will be greater shall be your minister.
> And whosoever will be the first among you, shall be the servant of all.

Service is the duty of every Christian and every citizen. It was because Liberalism forgot this truth that Socialism became possible. In proportion as Christianity lost its sway over the hearts of men the masses were once more regarded as destined only to provide for the wealth, luxury or power of the rich and the great. No wonder that the multitudes, thus divested of their dignity as Christians, in turn lost the true concept of service, and that oppression on the one hand and revolution on the other replaced the law of mutual Christian love and service. So was inverted the divine order of society in which love was to be the quickening soul and service the visible, ministering body of Christian social life.

In all the plans of God there is a certain harmony and subordination of parts. So too in the works of charity the spiritual must take precedence of the merely corporal and temporal. True, in the order of time it not seldom happens that the body is first to be cared for before the soul can be given or will accept assistance. But the spiritual aim must ever be kept in view as the final purpose of all we do. "This zeal in coming to the rescue of our fellow men," writes Pope Leo XIII, "should, of course, be solicitous first for the imperishable goods of the soul, but it must not neglect what is necessary and helpful for the body." He then cites the example of Christ who "invoked, as the proof of His mission to men, His exercise of charity." Asked by the disciples of the Baptist: "Art Thou He that art to come or look we for another?" He contented Himself with pointing to His works as foretold in the prophecy of Isaias and now realized in Him: "The blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead rise again, the poor have the Gospel preached to them." What especially excites our surprise, adds the great Pontiff, is that in speaking of the Last Judgment Our Lord omits all reference to the works of mercy which comfort the soul and refers only to the external works in the service of our neighbor, which He regards as done to Himself:

> For I was hungry and you gave Me to eat; I was thirsty and you gave Me to drink; I was a stranger and you took Me in; naked and you covered Me; sick and you visited Me; I was in prison and you came to Me.

Love is the fulfilment of the law; and this love is most strikingly displayed before the world in such external works. There is a peculiar appropriateness in calling special attention to them in this place because there is question here of the General Judgment. This is to be public, in the sight of all men, and this is the reason, it has been suggested, why the illustration chosen by Christ is taken exclusively from our social life. Thus one class alone of works, out of many elsewhere insisted upon, is made to serve as an example. Whatever may have been the motive of Our Divine Lord, the choice itself is significant.

We are not for this reason to extol the service done for the temporal welfare of men over that of the soul. "Fear ye not them that kill the body and are not able to kill the soul," Our Divine Lord admonishes us. His longing is for the souls of men. He Himself has likewise given us the highest example of the purely spiritual ministry even to laying down His life for our salvation. Prayer, penance, indulgences and Sacraments are some of the great means of the spiritual service by which we can and should come most mightily to the aid of our fellow man; but these must not cause us to forget the need of that other service which it has become customary to describe in our day under the vague and general name of social action. As conceived from a Christian point of view it embraces the mutual duties toward each other, of rich and poor, of employer and employed, of master and servant, of individual and society. To each man falls his own appropriate duty of prayer and works in the service of his fellow man, of the community and of all mankind. All these, indeed, his charity embraces in every Our Father from his lips. But the prayer of the heart will as far as possible, according to each man's vocation, be made actual by the works of the mind or of the hands, by instruction, sacrifice and labor. The love of our neighbor, St. Teresa says, is the surest test by which to gage our love of God; and St. John in the ardor of his charity exclaims:

> If any man say, I love God, and hateth his brother; he is a liar. For he that loveth not his brother, whom he seeth, how can he love God, whom he seeth not?
> And this commandment we have from God, that he who loveth God, love also his brother.—I John iv, 20, 21.

The true order of charity or service regards therefore first the souls of men, and in the second place likewise the body for the sake of the soul. Finally it must be animated by the one purpose of seeking only the service of God in our service of the neighbor. It is necessary above all things to remind Catholics, in these days of flaunting philanthropy and self-advertised movements of "social uplift," that the Lord is not in the whirlwind, that the supernatural worth of their actions in the sight of God consists in this, that they are performed by them as disciples of Christ, in His name, for His sake and for the glory of God. "And whosoever shall give to drink to one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, amen I say to you, he shall not lose his reward." In this therefore lies the essence of Christian service.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Last week an Eastern university celebrated the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. Many were the addresses on the occasion. One of these was an appeal to Alma Mater to return to the religious ideals of her founders, by giving larger recognition to religious teaching in her curriculum, and to religious teachers in her Faculty. Will Alma Mater see the error of her ways? Or has she too long eaten of the lotus planted by the moneyed unchristian agencies in the field of education?

The New York Sun cites from the Paris La Liberté a story of two French chaplains in the present war, a Catholic priest and a Jewish Rabbi, who became very good friends, and on one occasion lay down together in their uniforms on a farmhouse trucklebed. "It is too bad," said the priest, "there is no photographer to take a picture of the Old and New Testament as bed companions." The American Civil War had a parallel story. Rev. Joseph Twitchell, the well-known Presbyterian minister, related recently that when he and Father Joseph O'Hagan, S.J., were chaplains in the Excelsior Brigade of the Army of the Potomac, they became bosom friends, and having one cold night but two thin blankets between them, they wrapped themselves up in them in one bundle. The blankets soon heaved with Chaplain Twitchell's laughter, and Father O'Hagan asked the cause of his emotion. "I was thinking," he said, "how my Puritan ancestors would feel if they saw me and a Jesuit bundled up together." Charity, like politics, has strange bedfellows.

The Very Rev. Robert Hugh Benson died in Salford, England, October 19. Our generation has seen no more devoted champion of the Faith than this convert-son of a former Anglican Archbishop of Canterbury. Born in 1871, Mgr. Benson was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and after taking orders, held curacies in East London and at Kemsing. In 1898 he joined the Fathers of the Resurrection, a community of Anglican clergymen, and five years later was received into the Church by the Rev. Reginald Buckler, O.P. He was ordained priest at Rome in 1904, and in 1911 was made Privy Chamberlain to Pius X. A man of amazing industry, the whole purpose of his life was to know and spread the truth. The extent of his influence may be measured by the fact, that his work as a preacher, novelist, controversialist, and essayist, during the eleven years of his life in the Church, has made his name known and loved throughout the Catholic world. Mgr. Benson preached the Lent of 1913 at the Church of Our Lady of Lourdes, New York, and lectured in Boston and other American centres. Almost childlike in the frankness and simplicity of his character, few could resist the charm of his singularly lovable personality. "He's just like his own 'Richard Reynal,'" said one who knew him at Rome. Readers of AMERICA will not forget this valiant champion of the Church in their prayers.

Complaint has been made from time to time, that in universities supported wholly or in part by public funds, Catholic students have been forced to take part in non-Catholic religious exercises. AMERICA believes that exceptional circumstances, indeed, are required to justify the presence of Catholics at these institutions. Nevertheless, no circumstances whatever can justify the authorities of public schools in prescribing religious exercises even for those who wish them, much less in imposing them upon students who object to them, as a condition of good standing. It is reported that, quite without warrant, such obligatory services have been inaugurated at the University of Pennsylvania. Provision has been made, it is true, that a student may be excused should these exercises conflict with his conscience, but it is known that the authorities are loath to grant exemptions, and that they have argued that Catholics should assist at these meetings. Catholics have been told often, and with a condescending and superior air, that religious exercises in the public schools, as tending toward a union of Church and State, would ultimately envelop our glorious constitution in ruin. Is the University of Pennsylvania excepted from this gloomy prophecy?

A Dr. Slattery, of Boston, is one of the most learned persons in the world. Week by week, he gives of his vast store of knowledge to the good folk of Boston. He knows the true cause of the present European war, why Catholics always unite in politics, the secret history of the Vatican Council, and the intrigues which made Cardinal della Chiesa, Benedict XV. Doubless, too, he was personally acquainted with the Man in the Iron Mask, can solve the mystery of the Dauphin of Louis XVIII, and if pressed, will tell you the name which Achilles bore when sojourning among the women, and give you the words and music of the song the Sirens sang. By courtesy of the Boston Transcript he announces a > Patriotic Meeting, People's Temple, Columbus Avenue and Berkeley Street, 2.30. Speaker, Dr. Slattery; subject: "Reply to the address of Cardinal O'Connell to the students of the Jesuit College." With a prelude on the "walloping" that Lieut. Gov. Barry has threatened to give the American Protestants. Let us get ready for this American Donnybrook. Also suppressed war news of the atrocities committed by Germans on non-combatants and defenceless women.

The Transcript is one of the few papers of consequence which exploit persons of Dr. Slattery's mentality. Its weekly efforts to lend this great man a helping hand in his campaign against Romanism, indicate that in Dr. Slattery it has found a kindred soul.

War classes in the public schools would be all right, says an Eastern college professor, if they didn't break in so on the music, the beadwork, and the clay modelling. But room might fitly be found for them in the curriculum of the Ypsilanti State Normal School. Ypsilanti, by the way, is not one of the Balkan States, but a neat and flourishing little community in Michigan. According to a press despatch printed in a Michigan journal:

> A regular credit course in football is an innovation at the Ypsilanti Normal this year. (One wonders what the innovation was last year.) A large number of students are availing themselves of the opportunity to learn the fundamentals of the game. A course in soccer football has also been established by Coach Beyerman.

Whatever the influence of these new and popular elective courses on the rest of the curriculum, there can be little doubt that within a few years, the Ypsilanti State Normal School will be represented by a most excellent football team.

E. Alexander Powell, explorer, and author of a number of scientific treatises on the science of geography, writes in the London Mail:

> At the head of Belgium's roll of fame should be carved the names of these heroic men in long black gowns and shovel hats, the priests, who face death unarmed and unafraid. I have seen them burying the dead, shriving the dying, bandaging the wounded, helping the helpless, writing letters for the illiterate, comforting the bereaved and homeless, cheering the troops into action. I raise my hat to them in respect and admiration. They are showing themselves real soldiers of the Lord.

What is said of these heroic Belgian priests can doubtless be said with equal truth of every Catholic priest, chaplain or in the ranks, in Europe.

Some weeks ago the Lutheran Synod, in session at Detroit, recommended the establishment and maintenance of parochial schools. In a pamphlet "Why Lutheran Schools?" Dr. W. H. T. Dau, of Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, states the argument for parochial schools:

> Children with immortal souls must not be educated for this world only, but especially and principally for eternity. In view of this, they must daily and diligently be instructed in the saving truths of Christianity. This is the foremost aim of the Lutheran parish schools. Every education making any claim to completeness must include religious training. A mere moral training will not suffice. . . . Moral teaching, apart from religion, is like a tree separated from its roots. . . . Lutherans believe and know that if they succeed in making their children true citizens of the kingdom of Christ, they will at the same time have made them true citizens of their country.

Statements such as that made by Dr. Peyton, superintendent of the Jeffersonville Reformatory, that "ninety per cent. of prison inmates began their career of delinquency in the public schools," while doubtless exaggerated, only reflect a growing opinion that schools which bar religious training are a source of lawlessness. A correspondent in the Living Church for September 19, after stating that "children from Christian homes are turning the cold shoulder to the Church," ventures to suggest a remedy:

> What are we doing to stem the tide? Does not the parochial school solve the problem? We feebly admire the organization of the Roman Church, but we fail to recognize that the cornerstones of her foundations are her parochial schools, medieval and undeveloped though they be. If we would permanently aid our children we must guide them in their daily lives. . . . An occasional snatching from the very brink is a frightful and unsatisfactory business for all concerned. The public school and the Sunday school—the very name is a reproach—show symptoms of failure. The parochial school would seem to be full of promise.

As long as the world remembers Dante, and the medieval folk who built Reims and Chartres, Catholics may rest content that the term is applied to their schools. The Living Church correspondent must have his fling, even when he admires. Yet even he can see that the irreligious school is a menace to religion, and can dimly suspect that systems, as well as men, not for Christ are against Him.

Bishop Williams, of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Michigan, announces as a "startling fact that we have fewer children in our Sunday schools, and fewer teachers and fewer officers than we had twenty years ago." Dr. Williams is right in thinking that two causes are contributing greatly to the spread of practical irreligion in the United States to-day. The first is lack of religion in the home, and the second is lack of religious teaching in the schools.

> We all know that there is a common neglect of religious training and spiritual nurture in the modern home, even the homes of Christian and church folk. We all know that there is and can be at present little or no religious education in our system of public education. The whole burden rests upon the Sunday school.

Without intending to lessen in any way the value of regular catechetical training in the Sunday school, which was so much insisted on by the late Pontiff, Pius X, it may be truly said that the Sunday school is but one of the factors in religious education, and perhaps the weakest. The first factor is a Christian home. Next in importance is the Christian school. Their complement is the Sunday school. Hence unless the home and school training of the child be thoroughly religious, an hour once a week in Sunday school can do but little to train a child for God. The best that can be said of sixty minutes a week for religion, is that it is better than nothing at all. "A question is never settled until it is settled right," is one of the wisest of Lincoln's wise sayings. This question of religious education will never be settled "right," until religion is taught in the school. It must resume its rightful place in the school program if the next generation is to be Christian. The tendency of the present non-sectarian school must be to implant irreligion in the hearts of its pupils, for to ignore religion is itself irreligious. To teach a non-dogmatic religion is to contradict the teaching of Jesus Christ which was thoroughly dogmatic. "Unless ye believe and be baptized, ye can not be saved," is but one of many dogmas which Christ commands all men to receive under pain of eternal loss. Yet the school which vaunts its freedom from sectarianism, either ignores religion altogether, or teaches that belief is of secondary importance, and that dogma, which simply means the statement of a truth, is enslaving and unchristian. Perhaps in time, those who make a fetish of the "little red schoolhouse" which in many localities is neither little, nor red, nor a school, may realize how greatly secular education has contributed to banish real Christianity from men's hearts and homes. God grant that the awakening come not too late.

A curious correspondence has been appearing in the columns of the Guardian. It was opened by an Anglican clergyman, who bewailed the fact that many Anglicans never went to confession at all, while others availed themselves of the sacraments but rarely. Frequent and even daily confession, he held, was a Catholic practice, although Churchmen did not seem to be aware of this fact. He was promptly taken to task by a correspondent, who pointed out that the Anglican position on confession of sin was quite clear. Its spirit was against frequent confession. The Prayer-book indicated but two occasions on which confession might be fitly made. One of these was the general acknowledgement of sinfulness before receiving the sacrament. The other was at the approach of death, when the sick man, should he feel his conscience burdened with weighty matters, is "invited," though not obliged, to make a special and particular confession of sin. There is, then, he concludes, no place in the Church of England for "the modern confessional, with the priest in his confessional-box, armed with his confession-manual, a shallow and obvious bit of machinery" which, as this correspondent rightly observes, goes far beyond the teaching of the Prayer-book. But do Anglican father-confessors shrive their patients, thumbing the while the pages of a moral theology? Or is this accusation only a "Protestant fling"? A third contributor gives it as his opinion that Anglicans ought to confess occasionally but not "habitually." "My long experience has taught me," he writes, "that frequent confession has generally induced a dreary formality, and a result so unsatisfactory as the often giving it up altogether." He thinks that this overindulgence in confession is causing the faithful to think but poorly of the sacramentals, and he therefore suggests the Lord's Prayer as a substitute.

> The use of the Lord's Prayer, which Saint Chrysostom said was sacramental, seems endangered if we are to look to confession as the remedy for our daily sins. . . . After all, conversion is the primary need of the soul, and without it confession proves only a partial and disappointing benefit.

Real Catholics as distinguished from "English Catholics," will find it hard to believe that confession without conversion, that is, without a sincere turning away from sin and a firm purpose of amendment, can be even a "partial" benefit. They look upon a confession of this kind as a sacrilege. The climax is probably reached by the clerical correspondent who vigorously defends frequent confession as a "Catholic practice," but thinks that it may just as well be made to a "godly layman" as to a priest. The whole correspondence is an excellent proof of the confusion of ideas concerning the nature and use of the Sacrament of Penance current in the Church of England.

Longman's New Books

Christianity and Economic Science.

By the REV. W. CUNNINGHAM, F.B.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Archdeacon of Ely. *Crown 8vo. Pp.*viii+111. $0.90 net (Weight, 12 oz.)

The author endeavors to trace in current thought on economic questions the elements which are due to Christianity, even though they may have ceased to be consciously religious.

Ontology, or the Theory of Being.

An Introduction to General Metaphysics. By P. COFFEY, Ph.D. (Louvain), Professor of Logic and Metaphysics, Maynooth College, Ireland. *Medium 8vo. Pp.*xii+439. $3.00 net (Weight, 32 oz.)

Teacher and Teaching.

By the REV. RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J., Editor of "America." Crown 8vo. Pp. x+178. $1.00 net (Weight, 15 oz.)

"Full of wise thought and excellent suggestion, and should prove thoroughly stimulating."—Ave Maria.

"At this time of year the book comes as an inspiration to all in the teaching profession. The formation and development of character—that all-absorbing and never-to-be-exhausted theme—receives masterly treatment at the hands of one having authority and experience. The dignity and sublimity of the teaching profession is impressed upon us in words that burn into our very soul."—Tablet.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

Coward Extension Heel

Coward Arch Support Shoe

If your ankles "turn," this shoe will keep them straight; if your arch is weak, this shoe will strengthen it; if your arch has fallen, this shoe will restore its position.

A shoe highly recommended by orthopedists for the relief and remedy of all "flat-foot" conditions.

Coward Arch Support Shoe and Coward Extension Heel, have been made by James S. Coward, in his Custom Department, for over 34 years.

JAMES S. COWARD 264-274 Greenwich St (Near Warren St.) NEW YORK
Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

Bas-Relief "Ivorine" Plaquette
THE NEW POPE
A realistic cast, with life-like features of His Holiness Benedict XV in Papal robes. Beautiful old ivory finish, in mahogany or gold colored frame. This rare art portrait of the new Pope, sent postpaid for $1, cash or money order. $1

Art-Stone Mfg. Co., 459 W. 27th St., N. Y.
GOOD AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY PARISH.

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

FOR THE MAN WHO DOESN'T DRINK

WHY buy insurance where you have to pay the extra risk taken on the life of the drinker, when the

AMERICAN TEMPERANCE LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION
253 Broadway, New York City

can give temperance people the very safest kind of insurance at a cost far below that possible by companies where the membership is promiscuous? A postal card with your age will bring you an interesting proposition and a money saver.

S. WILSON, Secretary Home Office, 253 Broadway, New York

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The MULTIPLEX
HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

Important Multiplex Hammond Users

President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River New York, N. Y.

REPRESENTATIVES WANTED!

AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week WANTS

Bright, intelligent men or women in cities and towns to handle its constantly increasing circulation.

Agents do not have to go out of their home towns to do a good business.

WRITE FOR DETAILS—CIRCULATION BUREAU
THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 55 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

NOW READY

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says' to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)
HE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE MANY KINDS OF SODA
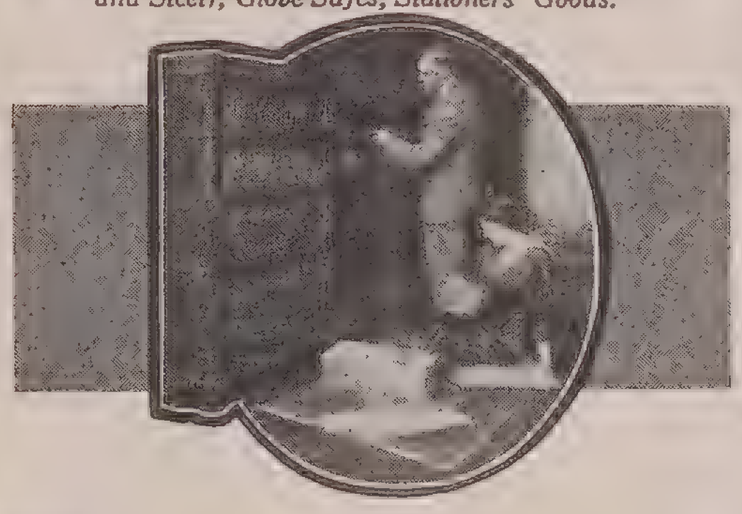
WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.



OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP
ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE,
SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
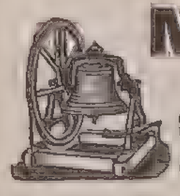
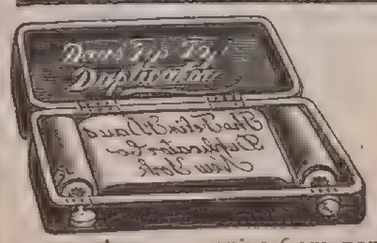
Get Your Money's Worth

Globe-Wernicke
Sectional Bookcase

THERE comes a time when every library outgrows its bookcase. Then, if you own a Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcase, you simply add a few more sections for the newcomers. They cost no more than the ordinary kind and are built to endure. On sale by 2000 agents. We pay freight to nearest railroad station. Send for "The World's Best Books" Mailed on request with Catalog RR-10-1.



The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati
Makers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Wood and Steel), Globe Safes, Stationers' Goods.



Wanted Position as Housekeeper
FOR PRIEST, WITH OR WITHOUT OTHER HELP. REFINED, MIDDLE-AGED WOMAN. EXCELLENT REFERENCE AND EXPERIENCE.
Address
Housekeeper, Care America
55-59 East 83d Street, New York

FOR SALE:
A LIBRARY of approximately
4,000 volumes
Carefully indexed, about one-half English, one-half German, Catholic authors in the majority, but many standard works, history, travel, etc., well represented. Willing to sell either the German or English portion, preferably both. Price VERY reasonable. Would make an excellent foundation for a parish or private library. Address LIBRARY, AMERICA, 55 E. 83d St., New York.

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

THERE ARE TWO REASONS

Why we send our Daus' Improved Tip Top Duplicator on ten days trial. FIRST---It proves OUR confidence in the machine. SECOND ---By personal use you can positively tell, before buying, whether it meets your requirements. Each machine contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Linen Back duplicating Surface which can be used over and over again. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type written original. Complete Duplicator, cap size, (prints 8 3-4x13 inches). Take advantage of our trial offer. Price . . $5.00
Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John St., New York

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box X, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Dramas and Dialogues
By S. M. A.

MARY MAGDALEN
Drama founded on Holy Scripture. Price, 30c.

MARY STUART AND HER FRIENDS
Historical Play for Girls. Price, 30c.

THE EMPRESS HELENA
Historical Play for Girls. Price, 30c.

OUR JAPANESE COUSIN
A Christmas Play for Girls. Price, 25c.

THE STEP-SISTERS
A School Play for Girls. Price, 25c.

THE ARCH OF SUCCESS
A Dialogue for Commencement Day. Price, 25c.
(The preceding six plays may be had bound in one volume entitled, "Mary Magdalen and Other Dramas," for $1.50.)

THE LAST OF THE VESTALS
A Drama of Rome in the time of Constantine. Price, 35c.

AT THE COURT OF ISABELLA
Historical Drama of the time of Columbus. Price, 40c.

THOSE SHAMROCKS FROM IRELAND
A School Play for St. Patrick's Day. Price, 30c.

A PATRIOT'S DAUGHTER
Drama of the American Revolution. Price, 30c.

HOW ST. NICHOLAS CAME TO THE ACADEMY
A Christmas Play for Little Girls. Price, 25c.

CHOOSING A MODEL
A Dialogue for Commencement Day. Price, 30c.

(The last six plays may be had in one volume entitled, "The Last of the Vestals and Other Dramas," for $1.80.)

All plays payable in advance. Express or P. O Money Order preferred. If the payment is by Bank Cheque, 15c. extra should be added to pay the exchange rates.

Address S. M. A.,
St. Mary's Academy, Winnipeg, Man.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, OCT., 22

NEW ENGLAND THOUGHT

BY MICHAEL J. MAHONEY, S.J.

The author makes a searching study of "New England's soul," the influence of which on the development of our national character has been so strong. In this number, too, is reprinted Father James J. Daly's excellent paper on "Calvinism and Our Literature," and there is added a short article on "Pragmatism." Those who wonder why Protestantism is disintegrating so rapidly in this country will find the reasons explained in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1903

10. Galileo Galilei Linceo.

1906

15. I. Object of Federation. Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D.
II. Divorce. Hon. Daniel J. Kenefick

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
11. Catholics and the Social Movement. Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
12. Making of a Saint.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
20. The Mass and the Reformation. J. Canon Moyes
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
16. The Pastor and Education.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

13, 14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal. E. Spillane, S.J.
16. The Catholic Press.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communion. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.
12. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. Rev. Chas. D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocylonometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
5. Capital Punishment. John J. Ford, S.J.
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
11. Early Man. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.
14. The Missions of China. A. Hilliard Atteridge
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
20. Lourdes and Its Miracles. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
17. The Blessed Sacrament and Catholic Unity. Rt. Rev. John Cuthbert Hedley, O.S.B., D.D.
18. The Index. Peter Finlay, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.

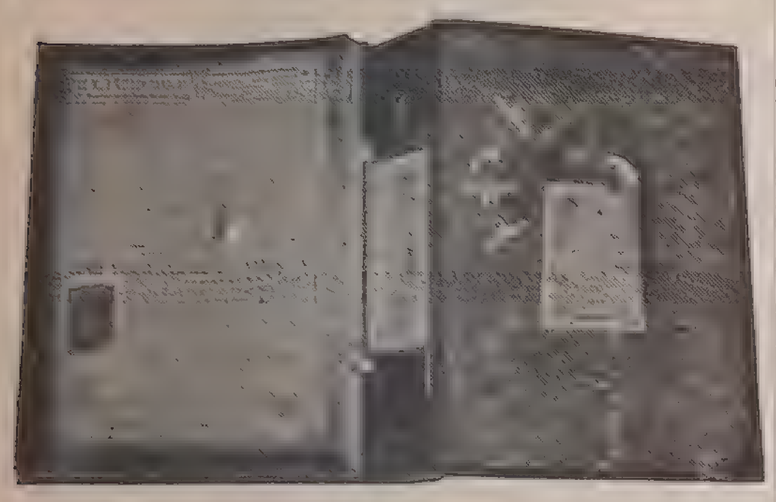
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.



Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen-knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

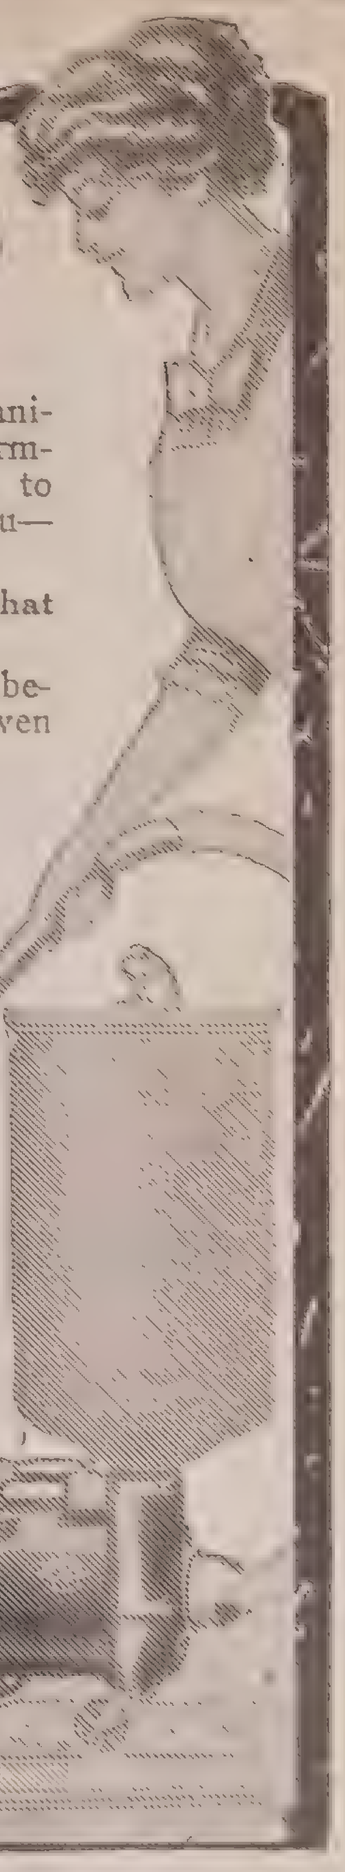
It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.



Name .....

Street .....

City .....

State .....

Own The Cleaner That Gives The Greatest Service

The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is the most sanitary because it gets everything, from microscopic, germ-laden dust that low-powered cleaners can not reach, to heavy refuse they can not lift. It runs lightly beside you—you don't have to drag it or push it on a stick.

"It's The Speed and Volume of Rushing Air That Count."

The Bissell has highest efficiency at the tool mouth, because it moves more air—at greater speed—than even built-in cleaners costing five and six times as much.

It is now giving complete satisfaction in many Churches, large Office Buildings, Hotels, Theatres, etc., as well as in private homes of all sizes.

No "extras" to buy for any sort of cleaning. We give FREE an Emery and a Buffing Wheel for sharpening knives, polishing silver, etc. Fittings for washing machines, bread mixers, light lathes, etc., furnished at low cost.

Let It Do Your Cleaning for a Month. We will pay the freight and let you test this wonderful Cleaner, and its handy 1/3 H. P. Motor, for one full month for a ridiculously small payment which you may apply on the machine. But there's no obligation.

Easy payments if you wish. Write to-day.

THE BISSELL MOTOR CO.

344 Huron Street

Toledo, Ohio

Note: The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is made and guaranteed by The F. Bissell Co., Toledo, Ohio, who have no connection with the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.

It is in fact a very stirring call for recruits to the highest life, written throughout in a style that will catch the boyish ear, and it might almost be termed a sermon with the Decree of July 15th, 1912, as its text. Father Cassilly makes the most of his case, and does not forget to bring in that eminent member of his Society, Father Ribadeneira, whose vocation took its rise in the very unpromising occasion of a fight with another boy. We wish his pamphlet a large circulation and much fruit, and should like to see a reprint for use in our own country. — The Month.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth 30 cents	Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70	12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50	100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Priests, Brothers and Sisters are much needed in all parts of the United States. Is it not to be feared that many boys and girls who ought to give themselves up to God and to work for souls miss their vocation because they are not properly instructed? Father Cassilly in this "Chat for Young People" explains vocation to religious life and to the priesthood in a simple, attractive way that ought to appeal to our youth.—The Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

SOLID PROGRESS—NO FADS

The man who learns is the man who earns. What of your son? Do not experiment on him.

ST. JOHN'S UNIVERSITY
COLLEGEVILLE, MINN.

a Catholic boarding school for young men and boys can help you shape his manhood. Turns out successful men. Recognized for its splendid location, moral standard, enlightened course of studies, healthy family spirit, the attachment of its alumni, its kindly parental interest in each young man.

Two lakes. 800 acres of timbered rolling woodland. Pure country air. Pure spring water. 291,253 sq. ft. of floor space. All modern improvements. Culinary Department supplied from the Institution's farms and gardens. Opportunity for every young man to enjoy every form of sport. Courses: Shorthand and Typewriting, Music, Drawing, Preparatory, Commercial, High School, College, Science, Philosophy, Theology.

Terms moderate. Petty extravagances discouraged. Limited number only accepted each year. A Personal visit heartily welcomed. For catalogue, address

Very Rev. S. Heid, O.S.B., Rector

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown UniversityHospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

FOUNDED IN 1847

The Alma Mater of numerous prominent ecclesiastics, professional and business men.

XAVIER HIGH SCHOOL
30 West 16th Street, N. Y. City
A SELECT SCHOOL FOR BOYS
Conducted by the Jesuits
Registered by the Regents of the University of the State of New York.
The most accessible school in Manhattan
Near Hudson Tunnels, Sixth Avenue L, Surface Lines and Subway.
Classical Course, Military Drill under the supervision of a U. S. Army Officer, Rifle Practice, Reading-room and Library, Dramatics, Indoor and Outdoor Games and Sports.

XAVIER GRAMMAR SCHOOL
Offers a four years' course preparatory to High School. Separate building and playgrounds.
Classes will be resumed on Sept. 14

For catalogues, address,
REV. THOMAS F. WHITE, S.J.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

IT is good to be in a school that is like a big country home—where 300 acres of field and wood call you out of doors, where the things of the mind are the daily talk, and where the associations train you in a thousand little things. 2 hours from Cincinnati. . . . . Write for our little Brown Booklet.

SCHOOL OF THE BROWN COUNTY URSULINES, St. Martin, Brown County, O.

ACADEMY OF MOUNT ST. URSULA
Bedford Park, New York City
An incorporated school for resident and day pupils. Full elementary course. Four-year academic course preparatory to College and Training School for Teachers. For particulars address
THE MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine Fordham.

School of Pharmacy Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest.

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Mt. St. Mary's College and Academy

PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. College, Academic and Preparatory Courses. Exceptional advantages in Music, Art and Domestic Science.

Address Sister Directress.

St. Viator College

KANKAKEE, ILLINOIS

Boarding College and High School for Young Men

Limited to 400 Students

Board and Tuition, $250 per annum

Catalogue sent free

Very Rev. J. P. O'Mahoney, C.S.V., President

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

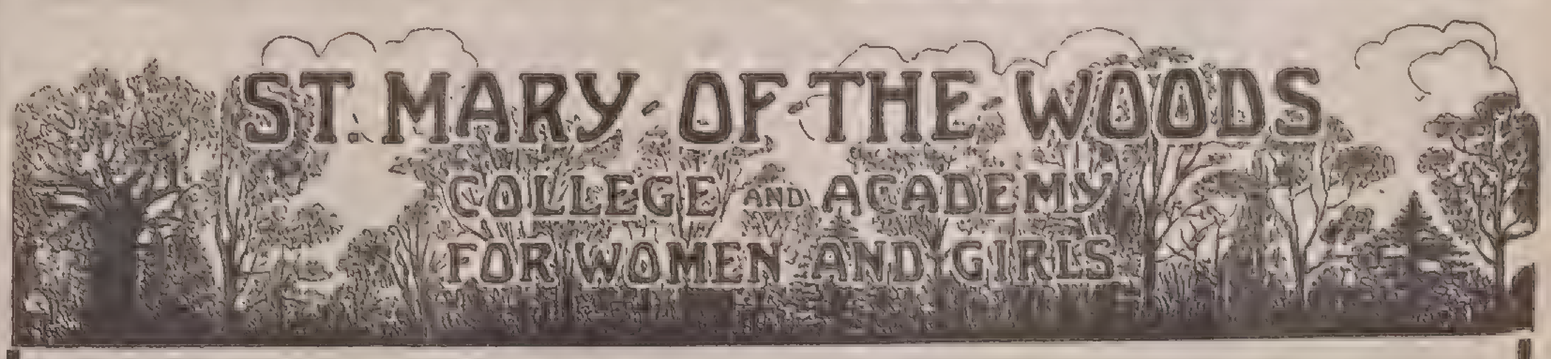
College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST



COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

HAS NO SUBSTITUTE

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

The only baking powder made from Royal Grape Cream of Tartar

NO ALUM, NO LIME PHOSPHATE

Quilted Mattress Pads

THREE SCORE and TEN is a long life, yet about one-third of it is spent in bed. Then why not make your own bed as comfortable as can be made.

Quilted Mattress Pads

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

will not only make it comfortable, but as they are spread over the mattress, they will protect it, and will keep your bed or baby's crib in a perfect sanitary condition.

Examine closely stitching on our pads and see that sizes correspond with size on tickets. Seconds, damaged, or "Just as good" pads are sold under other labels. Insist on

EXCELSIOR QUILTED MATTRESS PADS

See that our trade-mark is on each piece of goods you buy

EXCELSIOR QUILTING CO.

15 Laight Street, NEW YORK CITY

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

JUSTICE TO MEXICO

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS - 59 East 83d Street, New York

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 3
WHOLE No. 290

OCTOBER 31, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Oct. 20, p. m.-Oct. 27, a. m. —Belgium and Northeastern France—The Outcome — Western France — Russian Victories — Their Value—Austrian Successes—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: A True Shepherd. France: Confidence at Paris. Germany: War Credit Voted. Great Britain: Distress of Aliens in England. Ireland: Ireland's New Under-Secretary. Mexico: Persecutions and Protests..53-56

TOPICS OF INTEREST

All Saints—Christian Democracy and Politics—Bernhardi and the War—The Politics of Masonry—Catholic Landmarks of New York—Count Albert de Mun.....57-64

COMMUNICATIONS

Wealthy Catholics and the "Deadwood of Catholicism"—Retreats, Missions, Socialism—Our Divine Lord, Wine and Total Abstinence—Religious Conditions in Italy — A Protest — Was Pater a Catholic?—Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde—Memories of Louvain—Woman and Public Activity—Chaplains in the Field.....64-69

EDITORIALS

An Armistice on Christmas—Another Subsidy—Days of Anxious Questioning—Catholic Chaplains in England's Armies—I Want to Know. 70, 71

LITERATURE

The Postern Gate of Happiness.

REVIEWS: Prodigals and Sons—Demosthenes and the Last Days of Greek Freedom 394-322 B. C. —An Introduction to Medieval English Literature—Between the Old World and the New—The True Ulysses S. Grant—Songs of Sixpence —Fine Clay.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Some new Editions—The Universe and Mayonnaise—A Digest of Savings Bank Laws — The Joyful Heart — Jean Gilles, Schoolboy—The Street of Seven Stars—On the Warpath—Rosie World—Dr. Johnson's Prose—Eheu! Fugaces.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....71-77

EDUCATION

Studying the Child.....77, 78

SOCIOLOGY

Jim 78, 79

NOTE AND COMMENT

Rejecting the Menace—Thought Path of the Boston Metaphysical Club—Sympathy for the University of Louvain—The Standing of Catholic Parish Schools — Anglican "Stations" — Sparing the Rod—Pittsburgh's Public Manifestation of Faith—Death of Mother Janet Erskine Stuart, R.S.H.....79, 80

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—What has been termed, and not without truth, the greatest battle of the war has been going on constantly along a line stretching from the coast east of Nieuport through Dixmude, Roulers, Ypres to La Bassée. The Germans have been making every effort to break through the defences of the Allies, but have so far failed. The Belgians have held their ground along the Yser, except at one point where the Germans have finally crossed. The French have taken and lost and retaken and lost again the town of Roulers, and all through the country that lies between Lille and Le Bassée they have both resisted and made very violent attacks. The Germans have hurled force after force at innumerable points of the Allies' position, but nowhere have they obtained any very marked success. They are still maintaining a vigorous offensive, and have checked the Allies' progress toward the north, but their own advance has come to a standstill, and they are no nearer to Calais than they were a week ago. There are persistent rumors that the Kaiser has set his heart on the possession of this port, and that he is prepared to make every sacrifice to obtain it. Certainly the Germans have made repeated and costly attempts to continue their march along the coast, and give no signs of any intention to desist. Heavy reenforcements are said to have arrived in numbers that have been placed as high as 600,000 at the Franco-Belgian border, some of them from the Vistula. On the other hand the French, Belgian and English infantry is proving itself quite a match for the infantry of the invaders, and it is claimed that it is only their artillery that is keeping them in France. There is little probability that Germany will be able to make the speedy rush along the Channel that the fall of Antwerp seemed to promise, especially as the sea is open to the Allies, which gives them an unimpeded passage for the transportation of colonial troops. Another factor that has militated against their success has been the presence of British and French warships off Ostend and Nieuport. Being of light draught they have been able to approach the shore and shell the German positions. Their fire has been answered by the German batteries. It has been asserted that German submarines have crept along the shore and are now at Ostend. There has been no official substantiation of the report but it is not at all unlikely. If it is true, they will soon make their presence felt. At the same time engagements are frequently taking place between the hostile airships that are continually flying over the enemy, and have now become almost a necessity for the direction of the fire of the guns and the movements of the troops. Altogether this conflict, apart from its importance which is admitted by both sides to be very great, is quite remarkable owing to the singular fact that it is being carried on not merely on land and in the air but from the sea as well. What will be its outcome is hard to forecast, but present indications point to the likelihood of another deadlock similar to that which has existed so many weeks along the Meuse. The Allies have Bulletin, Oct. 20, p.m.—Oct. 27, a.m.

Belgium and Northeastern France learned the art of stubborn resistance, and seem to be strong enough to block any large movement. They have given way at times at certain points, but their line if taken as a whole has held firm throughout; even where they have been forced to retire, they have in many instances regained the following day all the ground that they had lost. A marked moderation characterizes the official dispatches of both sides; the very absence of anything like boasting or exaggeration makes their grim determination the more striking.

The Outcome

Throughout the rest of the great battle that stretches from the Belgian seacoast to Switzerland there has been constant action, but the line has scarcely shifted its position. Along the centre from Verdun above Reims to Noyon matters have not materially changed, since neither side has made anything like a determined effort to advance. On the east wing, however, both sides have advanced. The French have crossed over into Alsace and taken Altkirch, and the Germans have made progress in the direction of Verdun. The French admit that the Germans have moved forward under cover of very heavy fogs, but claim that they have not yet come close enough to shell the great fortress. The Germans on the other hand assert that the outer fortifications, at least in part, have already been destroyed, and that the reduction of the strongest part of the Verdun-Toul barrier will be accomplished within two weeks. It is impossible to say with certainty what is the exact state of affairs. But this much is true, that the Germans have begun another series of assaults on the extreme French right and right centre. As for the rest, as far as can be judged from the dispatches which have passed the censors, neither side has improved its position to any considerable degree.

Western France

In the east the Russians have succeeded in giving a serious check to the Austro-German invasion. The peril that threatened Warsaw, and the hope of spending the winter in the great fortress and along both banks of the Vistula are both things of the past, and the Czar's army has the situation well in hand. On October 7 the Germans were in a position almost to train their guns on Warsaw; they have now retired, falling back forty miles to the westward to Shierniewice; on the same date they were making immediate preparation for crossing the Vistula near Ivangorod, but their attack on this fortress likewise failed and they have been forced to retire to the forest of Radom. It is certain that the Russians have added another great victory to their successes, and the dispatches which Berlin has given out to the effect that the battle is still in progress without having as yet reached any definite result may well be interpreted as referring to the outcome of the general campaign rather than to the phase of it which has just passed. This undoubtedly has ended unfavorably to the Germans. They have been defeated and obliged to give ground, but their reverses, although very serious, have not been of an utterly disastrous character. Even Russia, while elated over the failure of the invasion, is not disposed to overestimate its importance. She realizes that the advance, which so far has been repulsed, may at any time begin again; and so she is hurrying reenforcements of all kinds to the Vistula. Her success has indeed made her turn her eyes once more toward the enemy's country, and there is talk of her again invading Germany; but the state of affairs in Poland and Galicia indicate that this is rather a distant hope than an immediate prospect. The Germans are well within Russian territory, and they will have to be driven back very many miles before their own borders are endangered. It is necessary to keep this in mind when estimating the results of the recent Russian victories. They have beaten the Kaiser again in a long series of engagements, extending over many days. They have forced the retirement of an army of 600,000 men from the Vistula, and have prevented it from taking up a position much coveted for winter quarters; they have captured a number of guns and some prisoners; but this is all that they have done. They are many miles further back from the enemy's border than they were some weeks ago, and the recovery of the lost ground will cost them bitter fighting. In the north, the Czar's troops have resumed the offensive. There has been another attempt to drive the Germans who are still in Poland west of Augustow, over into Prussia, but their endeavors have so far failed of success.

Russian Victories

Their Value

Galicia is at present the scene of the most determined struggle in the east. The Russians, who simultaneously with their withdrawal to the river Vistula also withdrew from the vicinity of Cracow, have taken up strong positions along the river San, and are trying to repeat the story of their retreat to the Niemen. A very desperate battle is going on all the way from Jaroslau past Przemysl, Chyrow, and Sambor to the river Styri. Details are wanting, and both sides persist in claiming successes; so that it is not easy to determine either the actual situation or the probable result. Austria asserts that it was on account of her vigorous attacks that Russia had to fall back, Russia on the other hand is equally positive in her statement that her evacuation of west Galicia was only a part of her general plan, and was necessitated by her deliberate retirement to Warsaw, and not by pressure from Austria. The truth probably lies somewhere between the two statements. It is clear that now, at any rate, the positions are reversed. A month ago the Czar's troops were advancing, capturing place after place, and confidently counting the days when they would take possession of Cracow, Breslau and Budapest. They are now content to say that they have repulsed all attacks to drive them from the river San. It is to be remarked that the San lies at least eighty miles east of the point that marked their furthest advance. This, together with the fact that they no longer are thinking of sending demands to the commander of the garrison of Przemsyl to surrender, but are merely assuring their people that the fortress has not yet been relieved, points rather clearly to the fact that in Galicia at least the tide of battle has turned in favor of the Austrians. Add to this that Czernowitz, the capital of Bukowina, is again in their hands, that there is serious talk of their retaking Lemberg, and that Hungary is once more quite clear of Cossacks, and it is impossible, in spite of the meagreness of detailed information that is at present available, to avoid the conclusion that Austria has to a very large extent retrieved her former losses. As far as Galicia is concerned, it would seem that Russia is in no better a position than she was at the beginning of September.

Austrian Successes

Other Items

In the Far East the Japanese are still bombarding Tsing-Tao, but seem to have no immediate prospect of reducing it; they have lost a cruiser in the Kiao-Chow bay, which was sunk by a German submarine. In the Black Sea the engagement between the Russian and the Turkish fleets which was expected did not take place, as the Turkish warships declined battle. Cattaro, the Austrian seaport, is being bombarded by the Anglo-French fleet, but is still holding out. The Servians are confident of being able soon to compel the capitulation of Sarajevo; already they are shelling the outer forts with the guns which have been sent to them by the French. In South Africa the revolutionists under Colonel Maritz have been defeated on the Orange River, and have offered to surrender, if granted fair conditions. Albania is reported to be mustering 10,000 men to send to the aid of the Servians. The German cruisers Karlsruhe and Emden continue to work havoc on British shipping. The former has been operating in the Atlantic and has sunk fifteen ships; the latter has inflicted still greater losses in the Far East, where she has already sunk twenty-six British ships.

Austria-Hungary.—When the Austro-Hungarian War Office had decided upon the evacuation of Eastern Galicia Archbishop Count Andreas Szeptyki, the Metropolitan of Lemberg, was urgently requested by the government officials to leave the city with them. It was feared, writes the Reichspost, that because of his high ideals of Ruthenian patriotism he would not be spared by the Russians. His only reply to all importunities was the heroic answer: "The shepherd must remain with his flock." The first step of the Russians, on entering Lemberg without resistance, was, we are informed, to seize the episcopal residence and the Ruthenian Church of St. George. They then, according to the same paper, sought to force the head of countless Ruthenian faithful to accept the Russian creed, and failing in this, carried him off to Russia where he is said to have been imprisoned.

A True Shepherd

By this outrage, adds the paper, the Russians have given the world a manifest example of their tyranny and have made for the Ruthenian population a confessor of the faith and a national martyr. Such is the protection offered by Russia to the smaller Slavic nationalities.

Archbishop Szeptyki belongs to a family famous among the Ruthenian nobility, and in his youth entered a monastery of the Order of St. Basil. He is the fourth of his name to occupy the Metropolitan See since the dismemberment of Poland. The heroic archbishop was greatly beloved and venerated by his people, and his fate has called forth universal sympathy. Austro-Hungarian Catholics in America are issuing a protest against this act.

France.—The conviction grows at Paris that the efforts of the enemy must soon spend their force, and yield to the persistent hammering of the Allies. If there were no newspapers telling of great battles waged within a hundred miles of Paris, and if there were a little more life in the Boulevards, writes a correspondent, the casual visitor would scarcely realize that France was in the throes of the greatest war in history. Paris has assumed the appearance of a city approaching the afternoon of a long Sunday. There is no excitement, and little anxiety discernible on the faces of the people, but the calm which has succeeded to their wonted vivacity tells plainly the strain to which all are subjected.

Confidence at Paris

It is said that General Joffre's forces are soon to be augmented by this year's class of recruits, who have been in training for the last ten weeks. The men are in good physical condition, enthusiastic, and eager to be sent to the front, where they will be joined by a section of reserves, making in all about half a million fresh troops. Men of all ranks and professions are now with the army, and with one battalion, it is reported, twenty-seven Americans are fighting. President Poincaré has decreed that Belgians enlisted in the French army are to receive the same goyernment allowances for the support of their families as is given the French troops.

Fresh Recruits

Germany.—A new war credit of a million and a half marks was recently voted by the Prussian Diet. It is to be employed in undoing, as far as possible, the effects of the Russian invasion in East Prussia and otherwise healing the wounds of war. While endorsing the bill Dr. Delbrück, Secretary for the Interior, said: "The war is making vast demands upon our people; but every one knows that we will not lay aside our arms until we have won a victory that can ensure us a lasting peace." The President of the House again expressed, what is stated to have been the sentiment of all the representatives, that Germany had honestly sought to preserve the peace, and now was "forced into a war in which we are not fighting for the expansion of our sphere of power, for the extension of our realm or for advantages in commerce, but in the defence of our homes and families."

War Credit Voted

Great Britain.—Despite the avowal made some weeks ago by the Home Secretary, that the activities of alien spies in England might be considered practically negligible, recent orders make it evident that the Government is not taking chances. The Government is pressing the order that all males of German or Austrian birth, between the ages of seventeen and forty-five, must be detained as prisoners of war. Quarters have been provided for thousands in the detention camps, to which aliens are continually being conveyed. Many of these have been engaged in various occupations in England for years, and are well known in their communities. As an unfortunate result of this action on the part of the Government, the wives and children of a majority of these prisoners are facing extreme want. Energetic measures are being taken for their relief both by the officials and by private societies, but according to E. G. Lowry, who is in charge of the detention camps, the situation is extremely grave. No doubt the Government is fully justified in securing itself in a time of crisis against the possibility of danger from aliens within the country, but as usual with the rude measures of war, punishment falls upon the innocent as well as the guilty.

Distress of Aliens in England

Ireland.—The vacancy left by the resignation of Sir James Dougherty as under-secretary for Ireland has been filled by the appointment of Sir Mathew Nathan, an English Jew and a near relative, said to be a nephew, of the notorious Ernesto Nathan, the Masonic ex-mayor of Rome. He had been a military engineer, governor of such places as Sierre Leone, Hong Kong, Natal, and secretary of the post-office. He is now the virtual governor of Ireland, for the under-secretary, who, unlike the chief secretary and the Lord Lieutenant, is a permanent official, is for all practical purposes the actual executive, controlling the congested districts, agriculture and local government boards, and the entire Castle. It was announced that he was appointed in view of the financial adjustments to be made under Home Rule, and Mr. Samuel, the minister who arranged the tight finances of the bill, is also a Jew. This, and the fact that a foreigner of unpleasant connections is given the chief administrative post in Ireland, after the enactment but before the establishment of Home Rule, has caused deep dissatisfaction and suspicion, recalling Cardinal Logue's recent comment, "I do not trust your English politicians very much." The appointment synchronized with Mr. Asquith's Dublin appeal for Irish recruits. The failure of the Government to provide a sufficiency of Catholic chaplains for Irish soldiers was unanimously condemned by the Bishops. This, with the doubts engendered by the Nathan appointment, has made recruiting speeches unpopular and special recruiting unsuccessful.

Ireland's New Under-Secretary

Mexico.—Those who maintain that the Revolutionists' opposition to the Church is "merely political" will doubtless read with interest that the new Constitutionalist Governor of Chiapas, Southern Mexico, has begun to "reform" the Catholics of his district by forbidding confessions, clerical dress, week-day Masses, and the existence of convents. On October 22 a committee from the American Federation of Catholic Societies filed with the State Department at Washington an appeal for the protection of the Catholics of Mexico. One document gave a list of the outrages committed by the Revolutionists and another sets forth the position of Mexican Catholics. The protest reads:

Persecutions and Protests

> We trust the American people will realize that they are in honor bound to defend us, to demand reparation for the flagrant violation of the recommendations which were made by them to Carranza and his followers. If this is not done then the declaration of the Carranzistas will be confirmed that whatever they do is done with the knowledge and approbation of the Washington Government.

Dr. Francis C. Kelley, the editor of Extension, in the November number of that widely-read periodical, holds the American people responsible for Mexican conditions. He is now in Mexico and writes from personal knowledge:

> To get rid of one ruler, who was tried and convicted at a court before which he never appeared, we have paid an awful price, but it has been paid, as usual, by the innocent; paid by bishops driven into exile, by priests treated with a cruelty which only human devils could invent, by girl-children violently snatched from mothers. . . . In Chicago there are fifteen Passionist Fathers who saw the murder of a confrère, and then his corpse placed for forty-eight hours in their midst. This was one of the mildest of the stories we have heard. The witnesses are in Chicago to-day. There are twenty-six Ladies of the Sacred Heart in one of the convents in Chicago, who, knowing what had happened to other nuns, fled from their convent and escaped to America in time. When these nuns were asked if they fled because they feared death, they answered: "We fled because we feared what was worse than death." Pity the others who did not flee in time. . . . Have the Mexican people no claim upon us? . . . Who has brought this state of things about? Ourselves! Who insisted upon the non-recognition of a government lawfully in charge according to the Constitution of Mexico? Ourselves! Who upheld the hands of Carranza and Villa? Ourselves! Who foisted this iniquity upon the decent people of Mexico? Ourselves! It is useless to blame any one in particular. Whoever did the work was a representative of the American people, of which we are a part. A bigoted representative of the United States Government is said to have expressed, on the streets of Vera Cruz, sentiments which could not well be interpreted as anything but encouragement for the exiling and murder of priests and nuns. He was talking for us. The opinions of the chargé d'affaires were evidently considered as worth nothing. He happened to be a Catholic.

It is not too late for our Government to redress many of the wrongs suffered by the Church in Mexico. Merely by insisting that the Catholics of that country shall enjoy the free exercise of their religion, and that all seized and plundered ecclesiastical property be restored to its owners, the American people can make some amends for the evil that has been done.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

All Saints

In October the soul feels celestial stirrings. Is it the memento mori of the falling leaf? The year has spent its exuberance of strength in a careless riot of energy, and now pauses in a sudden access of surprise on the chill edge of snowy silences. De me fabula murmurs the soul and shudders. But October also reminds us of other things than death. Its cold breezes may hint to the body of the icy mountain-passes of winter which must be traversed soon; but to the soul it carries faint importings of ultramontane felicities. Its transfiguring golden mists bathe the immaterial landscape and strike the distant hilltop into a dream-city of towers and pinnacles.

Celestis urbs Jerusalem,
Beata pacis visio,

The lips murmur half-consciously, showing whither the mind has flown. And is there no Sursum Corda! in the glory of autumnal color? Field and wood and wayside, hill and valley, are decked out as if a pageant were passing this way, and the very airs seem on tip-toe of hushed expectancy or wonder. Perhaps the Angels—for it is their month—are swinging down the broad aerial avenues, shining battalion on shining battalion, the Angels, the Archangels, the Virtues, the Powers, the Principalities, the Dominations, the Thrones, the Cherubim, and the Seraphim, glittering regiments of mighty Spirits from the fortresses of Heaven. Then when their silvery cavalcades have passed, and their dedicated month is over, and the vivid scarlets and rich purples of their triumph are fading, and the winter is closing in upon us, comes the Feast of All Saints.

Then wavering intimations become solid assurances. The vibrating and level accents of a divine Voice, coming to us in words and forms which the Spirit of Truth fits closely to their burden, announce that, somewhere in the domains of God, men and women, of the same clay as ours, having lived and died, live again, sharing in Christ's triumph over death and sin. And, as the north wind of November braces the shrinking nerves to meet the rigours of advancing winter, the message of All Saints stiffens the fibre of the soul to resistance against beleaguring fears of death.

We look forward with humility and trepidation, yet with confident hope, to reaching the very heart of happiness which consists in seeing God, not in fragmentary and dim reflections, but as He is. God's love for us is a mystery and a joy, balanced by the mystery and the sorrow of our coldness toward Him. The mere thought, that some day the icy shackles will drop away from our soul and allow it to leap into its Father's arms, ought to make the grayest life golden. Alas, of that dizzy vision we get only fleeting and illusive glimpses above the rolling fogs of our mortality. We can not construct its beauty, delicately intense, out of our crude experiences. Christ could not describe it to us: the incapacity was ours not His. Blind infants that we are, how could He show us the color of that glory? Our discontent is boundless: but we can trust Omnipotence to remove it.

My window opens on the autumn night,
In vain I watch for sleep to visit me;
How should sleep dull mine ears, and dim my sight,
Who saw the stars, and listened to the sea?

Ah, how the City of our God is fair!
If, without sea, and starless though it be,
For joy of the majestic beauty there,
Men shall not miss the stars, nor mourn the sea.

But there are flaming, fiery edges to that central joy, which the mind can reach to in a fashion, because it has earthly experiences whereon to climb. The Saints will be there, and we shall know them, and they will know us. To meet the white chivalry of God, with our Lord and our Blessed Lady at their head, to meet them without shyness or fearful reserve, to be the object of their ravishing courtesies, to love them and be beloved of them, the true nobles of our race: this is a joy within the grasp of human yearning. How touching the ancient prayer in the Canon of the Mass, Nobis quoque peccatoribus, translates our yearning into words:

On ourselves too who are sinners but yet Thy servants, and who put our trust in Thy tender mercies, vouchsafe to bestow some lot and fellowship with Thy holy Apostles and Martyrs: with John, Stephen, Matthias, Barnabas, Ignatius, Alexander, Marcellinus, Peter, Felicitas, Perpetua, Agatha, Lucy, Agnes, Cecilia, Anastasia, and all Thy Saints. Into their company do Thou, we beseech Thee, admit us, not weighing our merits, but freely pardoning us our sins. Through Christ Our Lord.

We remember the colloquy at Ostia in the twilight by the sea when Monica and Augustine conversed, mother and son, about the high intimacies of God: speech failed, the words flagged, and the converse tapered off into silence and ecstasy. So must have been the evenings in Nazareth when the day's work was done; a few sentences, a few words, and then the soaring heights beyond the stars! Cor ad cor loquitur, "Heart speaketh to heart," where saints foregather.

This hope is also laid up in our bosom, that we shall meet again those who are dear to us and are here no longer. Kind, beautiful eyes, that in a distant past kindled into a rare light at our approach and filled with tears at our going forth, closed now these many years and withdrawn behind the veil of death, will light again with the joy of meeting, nevermore to know the need of tears. How they loved and believed in us! To think that God will make us so worthy of their love that for eternity it will never find cause to weary, to falter, to doubt! Exclaims Coventry Patmore:

What a surprise it will be to meet! At least that is always my feeling after a long separation. Doubtless one of the purposes of death is to supply this exquisite feeling in the highest perfection, when those who have loved each other come together again.

And as every feeling will be always new and fresh in heaven, those who attain to it may hope to live forever with this acute delight of recognition in their hearts.

It is this hope which makes every friendship possible on endurable terms. Who could venture to set up his rest on a flower that will perish with the coming of night? St. Edmund in his last will wrote of St. Richard as one quem jam diu nobis invisceravimus, a phrase whose strength we fail utterly to reproduce when we translate it "whom our heart-strings have long since entwined about." Only those who are to be saints can afford to love so intensely and love wisely. What fools we are if the casual death can tear and blast the vital tendrils of the soul! Therefore the world knows pagan coldness, and pagan cynicism, and pagan despair.

In one of his charming letters the poet Cowper views as intolerable and not Christian the thought that we may not know our friends in heaven:

To think that, when we leave them, we lose them forever, that we must remain eternally ignorant whether they, that were flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bone, partake with us of celestial glory, or are disinherited of their heavenly portion, must shed a dismal gloom over all our present connections. For my own part, this life is such a momentary thing, and all its interests have so shrunk in my estimation, that, like a worm in the bud of all my friendships and affections, this very thought would eat out the heart of them all, had I a thousand; and, were their date to terminate with this life, I think I should have no inclination to cultivate and improve such a fugitive business.

The Church, which poor, soul-harassed Cowper needed so much, leaves no room for uneasy speculations. As Christ knows and is known by His Mother, so we shall know and be known by ours. "There a vast concourse of dear ones are awaiting us," says a lesson in the Divine Office for the Octave of All Saints; "there a large and numerous gathering of parents and brothers and sons, at ease about their own immortal life, solicitous still about ours, are looking forward to their meeting with us." And in the Mass for the Dead the Church provides special prayers for the parents of the priest, in which he begs God, through Christ our Lord, to grant that he "may see them in the brightness of eternal joy."

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Christian Democracy and Politics

"Christian Democracy" is a term employed in two important papal documents to designate the Catholic social movement. It is made to alternate with another current expression, "Christian Popular Action." The former title, adopted by Catholics in various countries, was attacked by "many excellent men" who considered it ambiguous and open to misconception. The chief danger apparently lay in confounding it with political agitation. In his encyclical now known under the name of "Christian Democracy," Pope Leo XIII sought to dispel these fears and allay the dissensions caused by the word. He himself did not hesitate to adopt it after giving its orthodox explanation. Later we find it recurring again in the famous encyclical of Pope Pius X on "Christian Popular Action."

One of the main questions necessarily touched upon in this connection is the relation of Christian Democracy, or Catholic social action, to the political movements of any country. The accusation that the Church is seeking for political power was never, perhaps, more seriously and persistently made than at the present hour. It will be well, therefore, to quote at some length the answers of Pope Leo XIII and his successor, Pope Pius X, upon this question. They afford us the final and authentic documentary evidence to show that Christian Democracy, or Catholic popular action, can in nowise be identified with politics and may never even be perverted to serve political ends.

It would be a crime, says Pope Leo XIII, to distort this name of Christian Democracy to politics, for although democracy, both in its philological and philosophical significations, implies popular government, yet in its present application it is so to be employed that, removing from it all political significance, it is to mean nothing else than a benevolent and Christian movement in behalf of the people. For the laws of nature and of the Gospel, which by right are superior to all human contingencies, are necessarily independent of all modifications of civil government, while at the same time they are in concord with everything that is not repugnant to morality and justice. They are, therefore, and they must remain absolutely free from all political parties, and have nothing to do with the various changes of administration which may occur in a nation; so that Catholics may and ought to be citizens according to the constitution of any State, guided as they are by those laws which command them to love God above all things, and their neighbor as themselves.—Encyclical on Catholic Democracy.

Such we are told has always been the discipline of the Church. To the same effect Pope Pius X wrote in his Motu Proprio on "Christian Popular Action," dealing with the same subject:

Christian Democracy ought never to mix in politics, and ought never to be made use of for party purposes, or political objects; that is not its province; but it should be a beneficent activity in favor of the people, founded on the natural law, and the precepts of the Gospel.

Since this, as we have seen, is a vital question and a point upon which we are constantly attacked at the present day, it will not be superfluous to quote another document which has the sanction and expresses the doctrine of the Holy See. We refer to the instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Ecclesiastical Affairs on "Christian Popular Action or Christian Democratic Action in Italy." It bears the signature of Cardinal Rampolla.

Christian democratic institutions, we read, whatever be their character, should be looked upon as manifestations of Christian popular action, based on the natural law and on the precepts of the Gospel. They must, therefore, not be regarded as means for the attainment of political ends, or for changing any form of government.

Catholics as citizens have a duty to partake in the political life of their city and their country; but Christian Democracy itself, the Catholic social movement of any country, must never be confused with politics. Much less may it ever be implicated in seditions and revolutions, or in "the preference and preparation," as Pope Leo wrote, "of one form of government rather than another," for "it is not lawful to give a political meaning to Christian Democracy."

These clear statements, which are directive for all Catholic popular action, should be sufficient to silence the enemies of the Church who accuse her of political aspirations or intrigues. They show how in the one work which brings the Church into close contact not only with the spiritual but likewise with the social life of the people, there is not even the taint of a suspicion to be cast upon the purity of her motives.

But Christian Democracy, it is urged, has turned aside from its positive work for the welfare of the masses in order to combat Socialism. This is true. It has done so persistently and in every country. Christian Democracy, as both Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius X strongly insist, is the very opposite of Social Democracy or Socialism. "Christian Democracy," wrote Pope Pius, "ought to be understood in the sense already determined by authority, which is far removed from that of 'Social Democracy,' and is based on the principles of the Catholic faith and morality, especially on that of never attacking in any way the inviolable right of private property." The reason for this opposition is not, therefore, political, as Socialists would make men believe, but purely moral and religious. The actual political Socialist movement is a menace to religion, to religious education, to justice and morality. It is on these grounds, and on no other, that the great body of Catholic workingmen is opposed to it, and that Christian Democracy can not avoid answering the challenge of Social Democracy. The one teaches that man's supreme good must be sought in the life to come, but for this very reason it would secure for even the poorest here below the enjoyment of the earthly rights and privileges which are implied in his sublime destiny. The other, on the contrary, would turn away his mind from the things of eternity to absorb them in the things of time, hazarding the loss of both.

To guard, however, against the final misconception that Catholics, as individuals, are hampered in the exercise of full political liberty, as long as this does not interfere with the laws of God or the precepts of the Church, it may be well to quote the directions given on this subject by Pope Pius X:

> It is certain, he says, that the present constitution of States offers to all without distinction the power of influencing public opinion, and Catholics, while recognizing the obligations imposed by the law of God and the precepts of the Church, may with safe conscience enjoy this liberty, and prove themselves capable, as much, and even more than others, of cooperating in the material and civil well-being of the people, thus acquiring that authority and respect which may make it even possible for them to defend and promote a higher good, namely, that of the soul. These civil rights are many and various, going as far as a direct share in the political life of the country by representing the people in the legislature.—Encyclical on Christian Social Action.

The Pope therefore desires that Catholics, like other citizens, should "prudently and seriously" prepare themselves for their electoral duties wherever such are incumbent upon them, in order that so they may contribute their own share to the common good and aid to lift up civic and national morality to the high plane of Gospel principles.

Joseph Husslein, s.j.

Bernhardi and the War

It has been, and still is, said with an utter disregard for consequences, that it does not matter what you believe so long as you act right: it is a doctrine which shares midway between Protestantism and scepticism, and partakes as much of the one as of the other. The aim of its existence is to destroy all controversy and to provoke general good will: its effect is the destruction of principle, followed by a summary mental and spiritual flabbiness. The man of faith, of principle, is not the tolerant man; at least not tolerant according to the canons of modern Protestant scepticism, and this is why, when the ages of faith were more robust, a heretic was a greater criminal than a murderer, and the flesh was given over to destruction that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord. The Crusades, for instance, were perfectly just wars. They were not waged for any petty end but for the enforcement of a moral and religious principle; it matters a great deal what you believe.

It is so with General von Bernhardi ("Germany and the Next War"). We may agree or not upon the question of military tactics which he raises. There can be no doubt, however, about his principle. It is perfectly lucid: and perfectly wrong. So assured is Bernhardi of the truth of his principle that he declares it to be the destiny of the German people to impose it upon other peoples:

> The proud conviction forces itself upon us with irresistible power that a high, if not the highest, importance for the entire development of the human race is ascribable to this German people. . . . No nation on the face of the globe is so able to grasp and appropriate all the elements of culture, to add to them from the stores of its own spiritual endowment, and to give back to mankind richer gifts than it received. . . . To no nation, except the German, has it been given to enjoy in its inner self "that which is given to mankind as a whole." . . . The dominion of German thought can only be extended under the ægis of political power, and unless we act in conformity to this idea, we shall be untrue to our great duties toward the human race.

Conviction of this has impelled Bernhardi to reproach the German people with their amiable and peace-loving qualities; to urge them to war as a thing good in itself. Conscientious Germans repudiate Bernhardi as their spokesman, and deny that such principles have induced them to enter the war, so that now Catholic and Protestant are fighting Catholic and Protestant; and the cries of widows and fatherless children fill the world, because, after all, it does matter a great deal what you believe.

Bernhardi is but the disciple of the prophet Trietschke. He it was who preached the religion of valor, the greatness of Prussia. In his lecture-room at the University of Berlin he roused the whole German people, telling how God or the world spirit had raised Germany under Prussia and the House of Hohenzollern to dominate the world; and the voice of Bernhardi is but the echo of the master. In the sound of the echo we learn what is the foundation of this culture and civilization which is to go forth and conquer: it is none other than the Protestant Reformation and the philosophy of Kant.

> The Reformation, which broke the intellectual yoke imposed by the Church, which checked all free progress; and the Critique of Pure Reason, which put a stop to the caprice of philosophic speculation by defining for the human mind the limitations of its capacity for knowledge, and at the same time pointed out in what way knowledge is really possible. On this substructure was developed the intellectual life of our time. . . .

There are two things that have brought spiritual woe and destruction in their train, striking a blow at the very heart of the Catholic religion: they are the Protestant Reformation and the philosophy of Kant.

The purpose of Bernhardi is not to leave his audience in doubt as to the mission of the German Empire, and the justification of this mission. He is frank, almost to the verge of brutality. He speaks, we must note, however, for that bureaucracy of warriors, professors, journalists, plutocrats and speculators, who are the leaders in German culture and civilization, and have control of literature and learning. The facts of the case leave little room for the thousands of patriotic German Catholics to identify themselves with a propaganda which makes a direct assault upon the innermost shrine of man's personality, or, in other words, a materialistic system of theology and philosophy. The culture of which Bernhardi boasts is that culture which has driven God from the German universities, which has corrupted the faith of the British universities, and has spread even to the seats of learning in America: it is the foe of God and of His Church, and is proclaimed as such by its sponsors:

> The new poetry and science decided the victory of Protestantism in German life. . . . Germany was raised to be the home of heresy. . . . A centre of Protestant power was established in the North, i.e., Prussia.

The insidious work begun by Luther was reinforced by Kant, who, in his "Critique of Pure Reason" laid down the principle that the human mind can have no true knowledge of anything but that which is experienced by the senses. Therefore God and the things of God, the supernatural truths of faith, not being apprehended by the senses, are incapable of being known to the human mind. True Kant attempted to ward off this consequence in his "Critique of Practical Reason," but in vain. The power of apprehending God and the supernatural truths of revelation were discredited.

The spark kindled by Kant was fanned into a mighty flame, which has burst through Europe and the whole civilized world, finding the climax of malignity in Nietzsche, whose avowed purpose was to drag Christ from His throne, and set up in His place a monstrous idol of hideous brute force which he named Superman. In Christian morality Nietzsche read only decadence, degeneration and death:

> What is good? Everything that increases the feeling of power, the will to power, power itself, in man. What is bad? All that proceeds from weakness. . . . Help thyself, then every one will help thee.

And this finds its echo in Bernhardi, when he declares that:

> The Christian duty of self-sacrifice for something higher does not exist for the State. . . . The acts of the State can not be judged by the standards of individual morality. . . .

With the realm of knowledge attacked, it is but a natural consequent that theology, the queen of sciences, should be undermined. Prussia fulfilled the boast of Trietschke as being the home of heresy, and destroyed belief in the miraculous at Tübingen. Ewald and the school of the critics followed; and the whole Protestant world sits in the sad twilight of spiritual loss which has followed on the decline of faith in the Bible and the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. From this welter of heresy arose Modernism, to be combated by the Catholic Church; which, because of its "Jesuitic tendencies and ultramontanism" must be ever in the eye of the German statesman, who must never forget that "the greatness of (the) nation is rooted exclusively on Protestantism." The desire for national expansion, the heaven-enkindled fire of patriotism, these are the prerogative of every free and enlightened people. Such prerogatives are in no wise incompatible with that spirit which goes forth to subdue the whole world unto Christ, to whom alone has been given all power in heaven and on earth. Christian morality is founded upon the individual relationship of man with God. It can find no place for a system which declares that:

> Recognized rights are often violated by political action. But these are never absolute rights; they are of human origin, and therefore imperfect and variable. There are conditions under which they do not correspond to the actual state of things; and the infringement of the right appears morally justified.

For recognized rights, treaties, contracts, call them what you will, enter into the heart of things, into the very personality and being of the man himself. The strong man armed may conquer the weaker, may subdue him and lead him captive, may deliver his sons to the sword, and his daughters into the hand of his enemy, but the crushed and broken remnant is still a man, is still himself. First comes the individual, then the family, and finally the nation; the whole and its material parts: to impose a culture and a civilization upon this whole body constitutes an ultimate assault upon the inner citadel of the personality of the individual unit, between whom and God springs the foundation of moral rights.

H. C. WATTS.

The Politics of Masonry

The Masonic initiate is told that political questions are tabooed in the lodge, and Masonry is wont to make public profession of its innocence of all political purpose. The October American Freemason denounced a Masonic lodge for allowing the distribution in its anteroom of two tracts, one entitled, "The Roman Catholic Church in Politics," the other containing a list of candidates for office in city, county and State, whom the "Guardians of Liberty" had "thoroughly investigated and found to be true American citizens." The editor protests that this is a violation of "the fundamental prohibition of the fraternity," and that "we are not fortunate in the allies that have pushed themselves upon us." Other Masonic journals are not so nice in the selection of political collaborators. The Masonic Home Journal of Louisville, gave an editorial puff to the convention of the "American Federation of Patriotic Voters," into which the Guardians of Liberty had collected "the many anti-clerical societies in the country," and claimed Masonic credit for the notorious Watson, Crowley, Barnet and Spurgeon, the chief orators and prophets of this political cabal. The Masonic Sentinel of Chicago has found a way of evading the inhibition against Lodge politics. It recommends its readers to "seek information through the Guardians of Liberty and other patriotic societies" so as to nullify Catholic influence in State and nation, and the Masonic Observer, of Minneapolis, has blessed this plan.

Hence Masonry can manage to take a hand in anti-Catholic campaigns despite the alleged exclusion of politics from the lodges. But is such inhibition operative or intended to be operative as against the Catholic Church? The New Age Magazine of Washington, D. C., official organ of the Scottish Rite Supreme Council of the 33rd Degree, records that it was commanded, by resolution of the Supreme Council at the October session of 1913, "to express and breathe the spirit of Scottish Rite Masonry upon the affairs of the people of the nation and the world relative to social, philosophical, political and altruistic problems of the day." It explains that "political" need not include partisan politics but may include "these questions which concern the foundations on which the Government is built," for instance, the religious liberty clause in the American Constitution which ensures equal rights to those "who owe supreme allegiance to a foreign Government." To the Scottish Rite Mason that Government is foreign which Christ established for all people and all time.

The next New Age article is one of a series which instructs Masons that the Monroe Doctrine, which has been for nearly a century a fundamental American policy, must be destroyed. This, if anything, is politics, and the motive of Masonry's supreme organ is instructive. The protection which the Monroe Doctrine enables us to extend to the South American nations resulted in the establishment of the Bureau of American Republics, and this gave the Catholic Church the opportunity of celebrating "a Pan-American Mass in Washington, on Thanksgiving Day, where the representatives of the Latin-American countries and the high officials of the United States Government, would mingle together in a spirit of fraternity and brotherly love." Because "the influence of the Roman Catholic hierarchy has been strong enough to effect a repetition of this travesty on religion and farcical display of a pretended patriotism to American institutions," and thus extends their "power in all transactions between the United States and the Latin-American countries, . . . increases the prominence of the Roman Catholic organization and strengthens their already formidable grasp of the balance of political power in this country," therefore, "let us destroy the Monroe Doctrine." There, we have at once the highest authoritative evidence that here as on the European continent Masonry has the most far-reaching political purposes, and that the destruction of Catholicity is as much the supreme design of the Supreme Council in Washington as of the Grand Orient of Paris or of Rome. Its activities in France were thus described January 6, 1905, by Le Temps, a rationalistic paper in no way friendly to the Church:

> Freemasonry is nothing more nor less than a political association. It not only occupies itself entirely with politics in its annual conventions, but it also organizes political demonstrations, supports candidatures, assists the Government, intervenes in matters of administration, makes itself a substitute for the President of the Republic, recommends for all the civil and military posts by a provision of its constitution, communicates officially with the President of the Council and the Ministers, sends addresses and receives replies. Such is the true part played by Freemasonry of the present day.

But this is Masonry in France, Italy, Portugal, Mexico; surely not in the United States? There was a time when Masonry exercised such political dominance in Government and nation that it required a national anti-Masonic party to effect its overthrow. It bowed to the storm, prudently withdrew from the public eye, and quietly and secretly dressed and strengthened its ranks, till in 1888 it had 600,000 members, and in 1913 more than double that number. In 1888 Adriano Lemmi, the Italian Hebrew who was then the "Illustrious and Most Puissant Sovereign Grand Commander of the 33d Degree," wrote from Rome to Albert Pike, who exercised similar authority in Washington, that he should secure from all the lodges of the United States an energetic protest: 1. "Against the Vatican which is every day found more in opposition to the progress of humanity." 2. Against "the clerical party which is busying itself everywhere in the world to undermine progress and restore Rome to the Papacy." Then Lemmi would organize "in the lodges of Europe an identical movement," and thus secure "new confirmation that the Freemasons are consolidated everywhere." The equally Puissant Commander Pike was in hearty sympathy, but alas! the times were not yet ripe in this free republic for an open war on Catholicity. One of the reasons given in Brother Pike's reply for his inability "to induce our Masonry to take united action against the Papacy" is interesting:

> It (the Roman Church) knows that neither of our political factions, the Democratic or the Republican, dares to refuse its demands or resist its encroachments, or to warn the people of its insidious influences, which are incessantly making rotten the foundations of our free government. Neither faction feels that it can afford to lose the Catholic vote, which continually grows larger by immigration; and neither will ever take any step that may be likely to transfer that vote to the other party.

But Brother Pike and his fellows were not inactive. About that time the A. P. A. party was formed to realize here the designs of Lemmi, and the recent virulent activities of the "Guardians of Liberty," Menace, and other such agents, in the same direction, followed the summons of Mr. Pike's successor, Grand Commander Richardson, who exhorted his "nearly one and a half million Blue Lodge and 200,000 Scottish Rite Masons to unite with every Protestant American as one band of brothers against the avowed purposes of the Church of Rome."

The American Freemason, the most moderate and self-restrained of all Masonic organs, not only gave full approval to the Richardson manifesto, but in every number lauds the most violent anti-Catholic activities of the Grand Orients of France, Italy and Portugal, sanctions every act and utterance of the notorious Nathan, and holds up the Grand Orient as a model to American Masons both in its atheistic constitution and its anti-religious and political persecutions, and informs them that the day is at hand when they must follow its methods and present "a common international front to a common international enemy." The inhibition against politics will not stand in the way. Has not Brother Pike informed the Master of the 3d Degree that "Masonry conceals its secrets from all except Adepts and Sages," and again told the 30th Degree Knight Kadosh that this Master Adept was merely in the portico where "he was intentionally misled by false interpretations" which "it was intended that he shall imagine he understands"? Those who really understand know that the Temps' dispassionate description of its double rôle is as true, if not as manifest, here as in France:

> Freemasonry aims to be a political association without declaring itself such. It knows the dangers of publicity, the advantages of obscurity. It works in the same fashion with regard to religious liberty and belief. It desires to remain secret and discreet, and by the character of its rites and formularies it evades all control of the uninitiated, and all legal restrictions.

We have seen that by proving its religious character, it has secured such exemption under American law. We are aware that so far the majority of American Masons are too American to be disposed to adopt the Grand Orient program against the civil and religious liberty which is the bedrock of our Constitution. But even among them the irreligion and irreverence that the higher and real Masonry fosters gradually trickles down, resulting in discontinuance of religious practice, vagueness of belief, and a moral laxity that opens the way for easy divorce laws, godless and unethical education, and the unnatural practices and destructive theories that go under the name of "eugenics." Another effect of Masonry, which is grievously prejudicial to the general citizenship, is as operative here and now as when it was pointed out by General v. Marwitz a hundred years ago:

> Even the most innocent among them (Masons) always exert a baneful influence inasmuch as they help each other along in life, recommend each other for advancement, and thereby crowd other honest men out of position and opportunity. It is truly startling how many vicious and useless fellows thus acquire position and income, and how indulgent otherwise upright superiors are to subordinates with whom they associate in their lodges.

This is known as "the Masonic pull," and that it secures place and advancement for Masons in business, political and semi-political positions, in preference to equally or better qualified non-Masons whether Protestant or Catholic, is too obvious to need proof. A contemporary from Kansas accuses us of raising a "bugaboo," as "five-tenths" of American Masons know little of Masonry. Not even nine-tenths know much, but the Scottish Rite is better posted, and they are six times as numerous as the entire Masonry of France. Suppose the Craft had manned the National Cabinet with Masons to the entire exclusion of Catholics, organized Masonry in every Government department, and duplicated the process in the State governments, in public bureaus, and the influential boards of trade and business, would our critic be still unruffled? He had better consider in how far these conditions are already realized.

M. KENNY, S.J.

Catholic Landmarks of New York

It would be interesting to know how many of those who observed last Monday, the tercentenary celebration of the founding of commercial New York, are aware what a prominent rôle Catholics have played in the history of our great metropolis.

On Saturday, August 26, 1682, Colonel Thomas Dongan, the newly appointed Catholic Governor of the Duke of York's Province of New York, after a journey from Nantasket, Mass., through Long Island, crossed the East River and took up his official residence on Manhattan Island. The next morning his chaplain, the Rev. Thomas Harvey, S.J., celebrated, inside the old fort at the water gate, the first Mass ever said in what is now one of the greatest Catholic communities of the world. The present Custom House, facing Bowling Green, stands on the site of the fort of Dongan's time, and on its walls the Knights of Columbus have affixed a bronze plaque commemorating Father Harvey's Mass.

But the numerous Catholic sight-seers who visit New York will not find in guide books any mention of the many places, especially in the old section of the city, that, like this Dongan memorial, are of particular interest to them. We are not recent arrivals here. Our Catholic title deeds to New York, from Sandy Hook to the Canada border, date from the advent of the earliest explorer. Verrazano and Gomez sailed up New York Bay nearly a century before Hudson arrived. The Protestant rector of Trinity Church, the late Rev. Morgan Dix, is an authority on the records of these pioneers, and he says of Verrazano:

Whether any one of the priestly order accompanied Verrazano on this voyage can not be positively affirmed; it is altogether likely; indeed it would be next to impossible that this should not have been the case. Religious services of some kind or other were undoubtedly held while his ship lay in the port which he has so accurately described; for he says elsewhere of the natives: "They are very easily persuaded and imitated us with earnestness and fervor in all they saw us do in our act of worship."

This was in 1524, and Gomez, the year following, put the Bay under the patronage of St. Christopher. The great river hat flows into it he confided to St. Anthony, and they are so lesignated on the earliest maps.

A number of historic Catholic sites cluster about the end)f Manhattan Island. Just across Bowling Green is the)resent Morris street. In 1643 it was a lane leading down to he river, and there stood the residence of the famous Cal-inist minister of Dutch New York, Dominie Johannes Mega-olensis. He was a renegade Catholic, but he hospitably ntertained in this house the Jesuit Martyr, Father Isaac ogues, who had escaped from the Mohawks. Later his rother Jesuits, Father Joseph Bressani and Father Simon Le loyne, also found shelter there.

Nearby is No. 30 Broadway, in the early days of the Re-ublic the home of Dominick Lynch, one of the four rep-esentative Catholics whose names are signed to the address f congratulation presented to Washington after his in-uguration as President. A little further up that highway rinity churchyard begins. It is part of the old King's Farm nd here, under the auspices of Governor Dongan, Fathers homas Harvey, Henry Harrison, and Charles Gage opened ew York's first Catholic classical school. Says an early ronicler:

> Papists began to settle in the colony under the smiles of the Governor. The collector of the revenues and several principal officers threw off the mask and openly avowed their attachment to the doctrines of Rome. A Latin school was set up and the teacher strongly suspected for a Jesuit; in a word the whole body of the people trembled for the Protestant cause.

There are a number of Catholics buried in Trinity church-rd, for they had no other place of sepulture in those early ys. And in St. Paul's churchyard, Fulton and Vesey streets, nds the memorial to Dr. William James MacNeven, who as one of the Irish patriot leaders of 1798 and a Catholic ientist and publicist of great ability. Turning down Vesey eet at No. 24 will be found the site of the school started in 16 by Virgil Horace Barber and for about a year the home his remarkable family. It was here that he and his wife termined to consecrate themselves to the religious life. e and his only son became Jesuit priests; his wife a Visita-n nun; two of the daughters Visitation nuns also, and the o others Ursulines.

ust behind this landmark is St. Peter's, the first Catholic rch erected in New York. It is on Barclay street, some-es called "Pater Noster Row," the centre of the Catholic olishing trade of the country. The original St. Peter's was cted in 1786 but was torn down in 1836, the present edifice ng opened in 1838. The oldest original Catholic church lding in New York, however, is St. James', James street, licated in the fall of 1836. The foundation of the parish Christ Church, Ann street, organized in 1827.

Near St. James', at No. 35 East Broadway, was the first vent of the New York branch of the Sisters of Charity, ned in 1846. In 1847 it was moved to what is now restaurant building at McGowan's Pass, in Central Park 05th street, and ten years later to the beautiful Mount St. ncent-on-Hudson just below Yonkers, which up to that e had been Font Hill, the home of Edwin Forrest the famous actor. Mother Seton, who founded the American Sisters of Charity, it will be remembered, was a native of New York, and most of her married life was passed at No. 8 State street facing Battery Park. When, as a widow, she returned from Italy she opened a school. It was located in Stuyvesant Lane, the short street that runs from old St. Mark's Church in the Bowery up to the junction where the Ninth street station of the Third avenue elevated railroad is now.

Old St. Patrick's Cathedral, Mott and Prince streets, which was begun in 1809, will celebrate the centenary of its dedication on May 4 of next year. Most of this edifice was destroyed by fire in 1865 but was rebuilt at once. In the yard about the church are the graves of 31,000 Catholics, many of them quite notable in their day. The new St. Patrick's Cathedral, Fifth avenue, is built on the ground purchased in 1812 by Father Antony Kohlmann, S.J., founder and pastor of the old St. Patrick's, for the New York Literary Institution, the city's first Catholic college. This site was then in the remote suburban village of Elgin. The new cathedral was begun in 1858 and dedicated May 25, 1879. Its cost was about four million dollars. The oft-repeated tale that the city made the church a present of its now immensely valuable site is a myth. Since its purchase in 1812 the property had been used for educational and ecclesiastical purposes. The deeds showing this are on record in the Register's office.

Another historically interesting spot is St. Nicholas', Second street, New York's oldest church for German Catholics, which was opened in 1835. In the same neighborhood, at Houston and Mulberry streets, is the former site of the first convent school of the Religious of the Sacred Heart and later of the Sisters of Mercy. Crossing to the west, near Canal street and South Fifth avenue, the earliest school of the Christian Brothers in the United States was located.

The foregoing list of landmarks indicates what a profitable tour a Catholic visitor can make through old New York if he is interested in "archæology." Unfortunately a Catholic guide book has not as yet been prepared, and few of the city's residents are familiar enough with New York's Catholic history to give the tourist exact information about the Church's beginnings in Manhattan. The purpose of this paper is merely to call to the attention of AMERICA's readers a few of the more notable Catholic antiquities of the city. What we need, however, is a series of little manuals for Catholic visitors to our large cities. "Catholic New York" could be followed by "Catholic San Francisco," "Catholic Baltimore" by "Catholic Chicago," etc. What say our publishers?

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

Count Albert de Mun

Among the tragic incidents of the great war, minor events, not bearing immediately on the tremendous struggle, might be supposed to pass unobserved; but not so the death that occurred only two days ago, of Count Albert de Mun. He breathed his last at Bordeaux, where he had accompanied the French Government, a few minutes after midnight, on October 6. For years past, he suffered from angina pectoris, but to the soldier that he was at heart inaction was impossible. He had been forbidden to speak in public under pain of hastening the end, but he continued to write, and to work and it may truly be said of him that he died fighting the battles of his country.

Count Albert de Mun was born in 1841 at his father's place, Lumigny, in Seine et Marne. The de Muns are an old family of southern France, and Count Albert's ancestors, on both sides, occupied distinguished posts in diplomacy and at Court. His mother, a saint and a beautiful and charming woman, was the Eugènie de la Ferronhays, whose delightful personality was made known rather more than forty years ago to the literary and religious world by the publication of "le Récit d'une Soeur," called in English, a "Sister's Story." The book, edited by Count Albert's aunt, Mrs. Craven, a la Ferronhays by birth, excited much enthusiasm at the time on both sides of the Atlantic. It was, in fact, a selection of the private diaries and letters of a highly gifted family, of which Eugénie, Count Albert's mother, was one of the most attractive members. She died when her two sons, Robert and Albert, were mere babies, but both inherited much of her charm and all her strong faith and spirituality. Count Albert chose the army as his profession and took part in the campaign of 1870 as a cavalry officer. He was decorated on the battlefield for his brilliant valor. After the war he was then captain in a regiment of cuirassiers. He founded Catholic clubs for workmen, and at first presided at the meetings in his officer's uniform. But eventually he had to choose between his military career and his social work. He chose the latter, left the army and resolutely devoted his time and his gifts as an orator to the evangelization of the working classes. In this work he may be considered as having played the part of a pioneer, being one of the first among the men of his age and standing to recognize the importance of a democratic movement that it is impossible to stem, but that it is necessary to Christianize and to control in order to prevent it from becoming anti-religious and revolutionary.

In 1876 he was elected deputy of Pontivy. His election was invalidated most unfairly, but in 1881 he was reelected with a splendid majority, and from that moment he became a prominent figure in the French Chambers. He chose as his standpoint the interests of the Catholic religion and he served the cause he loved with striking talent and heroic devotion. In 1894 he became deputy for Morlaix and was elected again in 1906, 1910 and 1914. At the last elections, that were in general unfavorable to Catholic candidates, he scored 9,665 votes, while his adversary only had 7,132. In 1897 he was chosen to replace Jules Simon at the French Academy and the speeches that he made there on several occasions will long be remembered. He was a wonderfully sympathetic orator. Being a perfect gentleman and also a fervent Christian, who practised all he professed, his speech had the finished grace and the authority that only perfect breeding and absolute sincerity can give, and without which even a great talent lacks depth, charm and durability.

Although from a political standpoint he differed from certain Catholics, on account of his having, at the bidding of Leo XIII, in 1892, adhered to the Republican Government, his absolute disinterestedness commanded the respect of his adversaries. It made him popular even among the advanced Republicans, whose educational laws he resolutely attacked. They knew that he was opposed to their methods and that they had no more resolute opponent than this ardent Catholic leader, but they fully acknowledged his courtesy, generosity and sincerity. They fought the political orator, but were forced to honor the man.

How far Count Albert de Mun realized that Leo XIII's scheme of Christianizing the French Republic had proved a failure, his loyalty to his spiritual chief forbade him to say. It certainly during some years diminished his "prestige" in the eyes of many Catholics, who (events proved that they were right) believed that the French politicians of the day were incapable of responding fitly to the Pope's confidence.

Another still greater sacrifice was demanded of Count de Mun, when, suffering from heart disease, he was forbidden by his medical advisers to speak in public. He continued to fill his place in Parliament, and on certain days when the battle raged fiercely, the silence he was obliged to keep was almost as eloquent as his spoken words, so visible then was his mental suffering. At the risk of his life he broke this silence on certain important occasions: in 1911, for instance, when he denounced the Franco-German treaty by which France relinquished a portion of Congo. That day his magnificent oratory won the applause of friend and foe; "it was," said an important French paper, "one of the grandest speeches that ever honored a Parliament." M. de Mun was a writer as well as a speaker, and since the war began his daily articles in the Echo de Paris added considerably to his influence over the French public.

As a military man he was qualified to give their right meaning to General Joffre's laconic "bulletins," and while interpreting them in a way that enlightened and satisfied the average reader, he never failed to sound a note of confidence in God and in the final victory of the allied forces.

His articles in the Echo were looked forward to with anxiety by thousands of readers throughout France. We remember the exclamation of a poor woman: "I know M. de Mun is ill, but surely God will leave him with us till the war is over!" God's ways are not ours and He has seen fit to call His faithful servant home. In all that Count Albert de Mun wrote there was an elevating feeling; his patriotic optimism was enlightened and without seeming to preach, he made his readers realize the solemn truths that give a meaning to life and death. His language was always eloquent; he was incapable, either in his spoken or written words, of anything base, mean or trivial.

On October 5 he took up his pen for the last time and wrote his daily article for the Echo. That night he had one of the violent heart seizures to which he was subject and which he knew must one day kill him. The usual remedies were applied, but this time they had no effect, and a few minutes after receiving Extreme Unction, Count Albert de Mun breathed his last without a struggle. It was a soldier's death, though not under fire. M. de Mun knew that every effort, mental or physical, might kill him as surely as a German bullet, but he believed that being unable to draw his sword for France he must fight her battles with his pen at whatever cost to himself.

This great patriot and fervent Christian was a courteous and refined gentleman, a generous adversary, whose loss is mourned by Frenchmen of every shade of thought. Count de Mun's noble presence, his frank and cordial manner and his military bearing added to the esteem and popularity that he enjoyed among his countrymen, and the French papers, whatever may be their politics, are unanimous in praising his moral character and mental gifts. Let us add that M. de Mun's three sons are all at the front.

B. DE C.

COMMUNICATIONS

Wealthy Catholics and the "Deadwood of Catholicism"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for October 10 I read a letter from Mr. James V. Shields which I think calls for an answer. I have no desire to break in upon the little class of instruction consisting of Mr. Chester and Mr. Shields. Both gentlemen seem well able to take care of themselves. I am concerned with a few statements made by Mr. Shields which I find it hard to think he would make did he fully realize their content. "The work (of houses of retreat)," says Mr. Shields, "does not reach down to and influence the great mass of our Catholic men, every-day toilers who are the real support of the Catholic Church. It seldom goes below the upper and middle classes, seeming in this to prove the charge often directed against the Jesuits, that they run after Catholics of wealth and worldly prominence, who in fact are the deadwood of Catholicism." This second sentence contains a very serious charge. Do the words about the "deadwood of Catholicism" belong to the accusation made against the Jesuits? Or are they Mr. Shields' own statement? In either case they contain matter which Mr. Shields, I think, would find it hard to prove in a court of justice. If the work of retreats among the upper and middle classes "seems" to prove that the Jesuits run after Catholics of wealth and worldly prominence, then the upper and middle classes must be one with Catholics of wealth and worldly prominence (otherwise there is no proof at all), but these latter are the "deadwood of Catholicism," therefore the upper and middle classes who make these retreats are the deadwood of Catholicism. Has Mr. Shields any knowledge of the fine bodies of men that have made retreats at Staten Island or at Keyser Island? Would he maintain that they are "the deadwood of Catholicism"? He hopes some day to make one of these retreats himself. If he belongs to the upper or middle classes will his going to the Staten Island House of Retreats prove or seem to prove that the Jesuits are running after Catholics of wealth and worldly prominence? Will he be willing to be classed with the "deadwood"? I think not. Yet by his own argument, if words mean anything, he can not avoid the conclusion. If Mr. Shields is himself responsible for the statement about the "deadwood of Catholicism," despite his being tolerably well informed about Catholic affairs, he must be sadly lacking in knowledge of what Catholic wealth has done in and about New York. In this great city many a church and many a priest can give grand testimony of great deeds done for God with the money of wealthy Catholics. Their deeds are not told from the house-tops, it is true, but the fruits remain. If, however, Mr. Shields means by "deadwood" not lack of exterior cooperation with the Church, but lack of interior grace, whence comes his knowledge? God alone is the judge of hearts.

Again, if he thinks the Jesuits run after Catholics of wealth and worldly prominence let him run over a little past and contemporaneous Jesuit history, beginning with St. Francis Xavier, dying poor and alone on a desert island. St. Peter Claver wore out his life among the negroes of Carthagena. Father Jogues and other French Jesuits were hacked to pieces by the Indians. Jesuits to-day are toiling in the hill-country of Jamaica; others are laboring among the prisoners and the insane on the New York islands. Still others are working among the negroes in the counties of Southern Maryland, while almost in every city where there is a Jesuit house the Fathers care for the hospitals and the prisoners. I may add that the New York firemen could testify that there was one Jesuit at least who labored faithfully with them, though he was fully capable of mingling with Catholics of wealth and prominence. If Mr. Shields has seen Jesuits working among the rich and prominent, I have seen them working and working hard among the poor in New York, Philadelphia and Boston. They do both; our Divine Saviour did both and people were never satisfied with Him. All honor, then, to the great mass of our Catholic men, every-day toilers. Certainly they give generously and nobly to the Church, and any one who knows the history of New York's early Catholic days is aware of what the every-day toiler has done. God bless him. The Church loves and respects him. But let us not draw wrong conclusions regarding our wealthy friends. If Mr. Shields knows rich Catholics who have been remiss, I have no quarrel with him, but to say or infer that Catholics of wealth and worldly prominence are the deadwood of Catholicity is a sweeping statement that wrongs many a generous Catholic man and woman. rich in this world's goods. We should not take as proven everything that "seems" to prove, otherwise the Catholic Church and the Jesuits would long ago have been condemned for fearful crimes.

A PHILADELPHIAN.

Retreats, Missions, Socialism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One wonders if the knowledge which Mr. Shields has of the failure of the Jesuit Fathers to spread the "printed word" at missions and in churches is based on the same amount of actual experience as is evidenced by his account of the retreat work. Had he ever, with good spirit and intention, made a retreat at Mt. Manresa, he would have come away with a feeling of admiration for the Order and its work which would have served as an effectual barrier to any subsequent criticism. True, retreats have not been advertised for the working "class," the principal reason being that the workers quite naturally resent being put into a distinctive group; we live in America, not in India. And a retreat requires, generally, that the retreatants withdraw for a short period from their ordinary avocations; and this, owing to working conditions beyond the power of the retreat director to change, most men are unable to do. But I am quite safe in stating that since the inception of the retreat movement in New York personal appeal has been made to every Catholic labor leader of any prominence in the city to attend personally and to assist in the formation of retreat bands; and to this was added an offer to make the hours and term of the retreats anything within reason consonant with the retreat idea and the convenience of the men who it was hoped would attend. And has Mr. Shields never heard of the retreat to working girls which are given after due public announcement, and with special regard to hours of employment, in St. Leo's Chapel in Twenty-eighth street? Or that the retreats at St. Regis Cenacle are attended by hundreds of working girls, and not merely by ladies of leisure? As for the "upper and middle classes," whoever they are in the United States, they may be the deadwood of Catholicism, but if so they are not making retreats on Staten Island. The House of Retreats is turning out too many "live-ones" to allow much deadwood to accumulate, and most of them are "every-day toilers."

The leaders of the mission bands probably feel that the best preventative of Socialism is practical Catholicity, and in laying stress on the latter may not have emphasized the study of the former enough to satisfy Mr. Shields. But in view of the fact that the campaign of anti-Socialistic instruction was begun and is being continued by the Jesuits, who, moreover, are singled out for attack by the soap-box man, I am unwilling to believe that they neglected the topic altogether. Perhaps Mr. Shields missed the sermon in which mention was made of it. The missionaries must necessarily give to the men attending credit for ordinary common sense and a willingness to follow instruction, and can scarcely be expected to stand at the church doors with an armful of pamphlets, forcing sample copies on unwilling victims. As for the violent Socialistic speakers, one is tempted many times to resort to physical attack, but reason counsels that the results would be rather the opposite to those wished for.

From Mr. Shields' letter one might infer that the decline of faith in the Latin countries, if it exists, is due to the inertia of the clergy, and that by analogy the same condition is manifesting itself in America; and as a second inference, that the people are not at all at fault, but are humbly awaiting "instruction" at the hand of their indifferent religious leaders. The most superficial observation would tend to show that both inferences are entirely false. A recent stay of a month on the island of Porto Rico, which is Latin by inheritance, tradition, and actual present-day conditions, has convinced me that the lack of religious feeling is not due to the inactivity of the clergy, who are most zealous, but to the unfaithfulness of a so-called Catholic people in living up to the practices of their religion. A similar condition exists in the United States, with one addition, namely, that many of the descendants of the Irish immigrants of fifty years ago are so busy telling how the Church should be managed that they have no time to follow her instructions. It is quite easy to express hazy opinions about what should be done, but evidently quite different to be a good soldier and obey orders. What is needed all over the world is a lessening of the number of volunteer ecclesiastical advisers, and an increase in the number of those who in a spirit of faith and service will work for the glory of God under the direction of the Church's leaders.

Brooklyn, N. Y. EDWARD A. MCALLISTER.

Our Divine Lord, Wine and Total Abstinence

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of October 3, the question is raised as to our Divine Lord's habits of life with regard to wine. This is an extremely delicate question. The habits of life of our Saviour and His Apostles are put in apparent opposition to the exhortations of many priests to-day, not only in the matter of temperance, but also of total abstinence from wines as well as intoxicating drinks. Why the change? Are we to improve on the counsels of the Gospel? Holy Scripture, the customs of men, even of saints, during many centuries have favored the use of wine. Every one will admit that these are gifts of God intended for the use of men. Why preach total abstinence? The answer to this question is found in the new conditions that have arisen during the last few generations.

There would be no more need of total abstinence now than formerly if the majority of men confined themselves to the moderate use of light wines. Total abstinence would be considered only one of the means of extraordinary self-denial. But on this continent wine has of late been keeping very bad company, and by the ingenuity, or rather the perversity of men, has come to be in many cases the occasion of alcoholism and drunkenness. It has been adulterated to an extreme degree, or at least is sold indiscriminately together with alcoholic drinks of the most harmful kind. In every bar-room and liquor store wines light and heavy are passed over the counter together with very intoxicating liquors, and the taking of the one has become the occasion for the use of the other. That is to say, the light drink that Holy Scripture says gladdens the heart of man has been mixed with poison. Hence it becomes necessary to counsel and preach total abstinence even from wines in order to safeguard the people from the appalling evils resulting from drink.

It would be an ideal thing if men would use moderately the drink recommended in Holy Writ. But since numerous temptations are now thrown in their way the practice of total abstinence can no longer be regarded as an extraordinary form of self-denial, but as a very ordinary, and in a multitude of cases a very necessary means of self-preservation.

Cantley, P. Q. G. W. O'TOOLE, P.P.

Religious Conditions in Italy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article "Religious Conditions in Italy" in last week's number will surely be a surprise to many of your readers Father Sorrentino says: "The Catholic spirit is keenly alive among the Italian people." If we are to judge of religious conditions across the water from the religious spirit of the Italians who come here, then certainly the writer's assertion is a hard saying. The Italians who come to this country are to a large extent uninstructed in the knowledge of the very elements of their Faith. Thousands upon thousands of boys and girls beyond the age of sixteen know nothing of their prayers, nothing of their catechism and have never even been instructed for or made their First Communion or Confession. The Italian, as a rule, will work on Sunday without scruple, will send his children by preference to the public schools, and outside of a display at baptisms, marriages and funerals, a large proportion of them have little attachment to the Church, its services or its sacraments. Father Sorrentino says that the bulk of the Italian people are good, practical Catholics. In proof of this he instances the thousands upon thousands who attend the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass on Sunday in Naples. If they do, then the sense of that obligation, when they start for this country, must be dropped root and branch into the Bay of Naples, for 99 per cent. of them stay away from Mass when they come to this country. The Italian, without any sense of obedience to the Church, enters readily into Freemasonry and other anti-Christian societies, and falls an easy victim to the Protestant proselytizer.

It may be said that they are ignorant of the language and unaccustomed to our conditions. The Italian is not too ignorant to cope with American cleverness in making money and in sending vast wealth back to his native land. The Italians as a body are rising rapidly from a material point of view and hence their religious deterioration can not be attributed to a lack of ability, talent or an ignorance of the language, but it must be attributed to the fact that they come to this country insufficiently instructed in their Faith, and not infrequently with a hatred of the Church and the priesthood in their hearts. No; the religious conditions in Italy can not be such as expounded by Father Sorrentino. He says that the Italian will attend missions, which he certainly will not do in this country, that he will manifest great devotion to the Madonna and is religious in the months of May and June. As Bishop Bonomelli once well pointed out, piety does not consist in processions or carrying lighted candles, in prostrations before a statue of the Madonna, in processions in honor of the patron saints of villages, but true piety consists in the daily fulfilment of the religious duties exacted of us by God Almighty and His Church and it consists in a love for that Church and her ministers. In these points, no matter how numerous be the Italian processions, no matter how heavy the candles, no matter how many lights they carry, the Italian immigrant seems very deficient. This is an unquestionable fact the causes of which it would be interesting to discuss, but are beyond the scope of this letter.

New York. HERBERT HADLEY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article on "Religious Conditions in Italy," which appears in AMERICA of October 17, is far from convincing. Could the assertion that "the bulk of the Italian people are good, practical Catholics" be proved by means of figures? I am confident that any one possessing even an elementary knowledge of the inhabitants of Italy will be astonished at the information that "what is true of Naples, is true almost without exception, of every town and hamlet dalle Alpi alla Sicilia. If we eliminate the Freemasons, the Socialists, the anarchists, the indifferent, the Modernists, I believe that we shall have left but a very small number of practical Catholics in the whole of the third Italy.

Baltimore. ENOTRIAE AMATOR.

A Protest

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At a meeting of the Directors of the Alumnae Association of the Sacred Heart a protest was drawn up and later sent to President Wilson against the treatment of the religious of the Sacred Heart in Mexico. Thirty of these nuns are now refugees in the two houses of the order in Chicago. They were turned out of their convent in Guadalajara on half an hour's notice, allowed to take nothing with them save the clothes they had on; for six weeks they, along with eighteen other nuns, slept on the bare boards of a little two-room cottage with neither mattresses nor covering. On shipboard they were thrust down into the hold with a lot of Chinese and subjected to mortification and insult. The letter closes thus:

> The United States has seen fit to take a hand in the affairs of Mexico. Can it afford to allow these cultured Christian women to be longer treated as murderers and bandits? The many thousands of American women, citizens of this country who have been educated by this order and hold it in deepest affection, can not believe it possible. The millions of other Catholics in this country await, Sir, with deep concern your answer.

Similar letters are to be sent by other Alumnae Associations of the order.

Chicago. M. O. G.

Was Pater a Catholic?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Among "Books and Authors" in AMERICA for October 17 you notice an assertion that Walter Pater was a convert and say that "many would like to learn the authority for that statement." I can not give you the authority, but I found the same assertion in G. K. Chesterton's "Victorian Age in Literature," and wrote him in regard to it. I suppose he took me for an autograph hunter, as I received no reply. Many a Catholic would wish to think that Pater found, at the last, the faith he seemed so near in the closing chapters of "Marius the Epicurean," and in the unfinished work, "Gaston de Latour." If Mr. Chesterton ever sees these words perhaps he may be kind enough to give us some verification of his statement.

Grand Rapids, Mich. A. K. GIBSON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reviewing my book, "Outside the Walls," you did well to question my remark that Walter Pater was a convert. I do not now recall my authority for that statement, and have since found the real facts, to wit: Pater's father was a Roman Catholic after a fashion, and there was some attempt to educate the lad in that religion; but he remained loyal to the Church of England, for a time even considering the taking of Holy Orders. In later years he drifted into indifferentism as to doctrine, but his esthetic sense continued to hold him nominally faithful to his Church, and as an Anglican he died.

Ardmore, Pa. BENJAMIN FRANCIS MUSSER.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am one of your original subscribers and have been a loyal friend of AMERICA from its start, urging my friends to sustain and uphold it. But what shall I say of a Catholic paper whose attitude in this awful war is enough to bring tears to the eyes of any lover of liberty. The position of AMERICA is simply intolerable, a disgrace to American Catholics, and many Catholics, both lay and clerical, have expressed this opinion to me. It will take many years for AMERICA to live down its deplorable position on this war, if it ever again resumes its old place in our hearts. Had you not better transfer the place of publication from New York to Berlin, and rename the paper "Germany"? That at least would relieve many of your oldest friends from having to blush for your shame.

Amherst, Mass. C. A. H.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been a constant reader of the AMERICA and numerous other Catholic papers for many years. Occasionally I also have read the Menace. I am going to ask you what is the difference between our so-called English Catholic papers and the Menace? I must confess, and this painfully, that I find little, very little difference between these papers. When I read our Catholic weeklies they seem to be sisters and brothers. What a world of misrepresentations, exaggerations, lies and calumnies our Catholic papers dish out to their readers week after week in their war news! Mind you, the war news concerns mainly the Catholics, because all these papers howl about Catholic Austria and about Germany, a country that is over one-third Catholic. These Catholic papers try very hard to make their readers believe that the Germans are cruel barbarians and they sing the praises of Catholic France. Catholic France and Protestant Germany! . . . Whenever I read in AMERICA about Catholic France I have to smile. Catholic France! and Catholic Belgium and Protestant Germany! No doubt there are more practical Catholics in Protestant Germany than in "Catholic France" and Belgium.

How these Menace Catholic papers are gloating with another Menace that pagan Japan, infidel France, Protestant England, schismatic Russia, sacrilegious Portugal are crushing the last Catholic world power! And how they condone the cruel murder of the excellent and Catholic prince of Austria! How they sympathize with Belgium, that violated its neutrality in 1906 and entered into a secret pact to crush Germany! How they also rehash unproved cruelties of the Germans but never, never, never mention the cruelties of the Allies! Has AMERICA ever spoken of the atrocities of the Russians or Belgians? Did the Rev. Editor of AMERICA not read the statement of Cardinal Bettinger of Munich, of Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee, of Bishop Koudelka of Superior? Did the Rev. Editor of AMERICA, whose sympathies are with Russia, Japan, France and England, not see the public statement of American journalists denying the statements of German cruelties fabricated in Paris and London?

Be sure many readers of AMERICA are tired of your unfair treatment and they will drop your paper because they are not willing to support papers of the Menace type. If you intend to continue in your bigotry please drop my name from your subscription list. As an Irishman you have reason to be English. Irishmen that died on the gallows for the last four centuries will certainly bestow upon English sympathizers a blessing! Catholic papers, the pity of it! and then preach against the unfairness of the Menace!

Hart, Mich. FRANCIS EMMERICH.

[The Editor regrets that AMERICA has reached the level of the Menace. He hopes for at least one moment of repentance before death.—Editor AMERICA.]

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The account of your bombardment by adverse critics who disapprove of your war policy, and the decimation of your army of subscribers roused a chorus of indignation from your many friends in this part of the world. You are accused of prejudice, of partisanship! Why, you are nothing if not neutral. People who say such things deserve to be annihilated by the French turpinite guns, or crushed by the Russian steam-roller!

Italy, Turkey, the United States and the rest of them might well sit at your feet and learn how to be neutral, though handicapped. But alas! Your neutrality has not been respected! It has been violated in the worst possible way by a frontal attack on your subscription list. "The Hun is at the Gate!" in the shape of angry subscribers who most unjustly accuse you of injustice. I wish I could bring up some reinforcements in the form of an army of new subscribers. At any rate, accept a serious, earnest and admiring tribute to the spirit of fair play with which the war news has been conducted in AMERICA. You have succeeded in showing both sides, or rather, the many sides of the question, and surely it is only ignorance, prejudice or blind hatred that refuses to visualize any point of view except its own. Now, would you kindly enlighten me on a certain point? Belgium, I know, was one of the richest countries in Europe before the war broke out. What has become of the Congo millions, the receipts of the rubber industry? Are they filling the pockets of the Belgian Government or those of the German military governor, von der Goltz? If the former, I do not see why Belgium need pose as a beggar before the whole world. But I speak as one less wise; perhaps you can instruct me on this matter. Meanwhile, I sincerely trust that this letter will give some slight consolation to the wounded editorial bosom. In any case, it affords me the pleasure of vindicating your many "other" subscribers who, like myself, are full of admiration for the attitude of AMERICA, not only on the war question, but on all topics of the day. May it long prosper!

A HALIFAX SUBSCRIBER.

Memories of Louvain

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I would like to give my recollections of the Flemish University town as I saw it on an August day of last year. Then peace brooded over the street and square, shrine and spire, while the modest marts wore the smile of easy prosperity, and peasant and burgher, lay-folk and religious thronged the sunlit streets or waited for their trains in the roomy station. Troja fuit and so was Louvain. Memories of Louvain as she burned and agonized have been given to me in a document written by one who saw and heard all that he has written down. These I will faithfully set down even as they are written, grieving that the many American priests who have pleasanter "Memories of Louvain" should have to weep over the ruin of the city they loved. May God grant us through the intercession of St. John Berchmans the happiness of seeing once again some of the charms whereof our "Memories of Louvain" are laden.

When the Germans occupied the city they ordered all the arms and ammunition to be delivered up. Day and night every house had to be left open and their lights to be left lit. The Jesuit College obeyed the orders. Through the night of August 25-26 the only noise heard was the crackle of burning materials, the only smell that of fire, the only lights in the sky the red glare of the conflagration. Here I will quote Mr. Schill's own words:

I was in my room putting it to rights when I heard our beadle shout down the corridor: "Everybody out of the house! The city must be left in an hour!" We took the road to Tervueren, and a pitiful sight we presented as we made our way along it. The town's inhabitants had packed up hastily in bundles whatever was precious and portable. Some carried the sick and weak, others the babies. At fixed intervals we met German sentries. We waved white handkerchiefs to save our lives. Although we got no bullet, insult and abuse was showered on us plentifully. Schweinepriester! Hallunken! "It's you who tell the people to fire on us." Das sind die Richtigen. So were we howled at by some in frenzied hate. Others more restrained said, Die Unschuldigen müssen mit den Schuldigen leiden.

At last we came to Tervueren after having been two hours on the road. Soon we should be in Brussels and then we should be safe. But the road in front of us was blocked by soldiers. They stopped us and made us empty every bundle and pocket of their contents. Again the insults and the habitual refrain Schweine! They were ordered by their officer not to come near us, but scarcely had he turned on his heel than they were abusing us again with foul names. The officer held them in check only by brandishing his revolver before their faces. The squad of soldiers which had been appointed to search us for concealed weapons pretended that they had found two priests with pistols. I had opened my cassock at the collar thinking that would be enough, but the soldier savagely tore it open down to the knees. Only two buttons were left on it. While he was searching me he had a cartridge in his hand which he was going to put into my pocket, but one of the Fathers noticed him and told the officer about it. Whether or not the soldier was punished I can not say. After the search was done we were led into a field by the roadside and had to sit down in the wet grass guarded by soldiers.

All the religious and priests were made to wait there. With the nuns they would be about one hundred. After an hour we were lined up in two rows along a fence which cut the field in two. We all thought we were going to be shot. We put our rosaries around our necks, took our crucifixes in hand and received absolution from the priests. An officer, however, assured us that no harm would be done to us. Then we were divided into bands of twenties. The one in which I was, was led behind the fence into the next field. German carts were there. We walked behind these, and then were lined up again in two rows. Our guard this time was a gentleman. He readily gave us leave to go aside for a few minutes, but had scarcely done so than the officer rushed upon him, revolver in hand, shouting out as he came, "Didn't I tell you that none were to move from this place? Is that the way you carry out orders? Do you want to be shot too?" The indignant soldier gazed unflinchingly into the eyes of the officer. The scene ended with that. A short while after two soldiers came leading Mr. Eugène Dupiéreux, S.J. They were followed by another soldier who held a paper in his hand. When it was asked whose paper it was Dupiéreux claimed it as his property. They asked next for somebody who knew German. I was pointed out to them. On Dupiéreux they had chalked a large cross on the back of his cassock. The poor fellow carried his crucifix in his hands and never took his eyes from it. They gave me the paper and the officer said: "You will read the paper first in French and then you will translate it into German. Don't put in or leave out one word, or you will be shot along with him." Poor Dupiéreux was doomed. If I didn't read it, two would be killed instead of only one. The contents of the paper were as follows:

> The Germans have invaded Belgium, bringing everywhere fire and sword. They have ravaged the land like a horde of barbarians. When Omar had burned down the library at Alexandria, one thought that a like deed would never be done again. But it has been done again at Louvain, whose library has been given over to the flames. There's the famous "Germanische Kultur" for you, which they have boasted so much about.

When I had got that far the officer stopped me. Genug! Ah! he exclaimed. Then somebody tried to plead for mercy for poor Dupiéreux. Kein Wort mehr! was the only answer. The doomed scholastic who had listened calmly to the reading of his notes, now asked for absolution. It was a task to get the officer to understand what was asked for. At length he granted the request. Dupiéreux knelt down and made his confession to Father Willaert, S.J. The two then gave each other a good-bye shake of the hand while the officer cried, Vorwärts, für die Front! The young chap was off at once, keeping his eyes on his crucifix all the time. At about fifteen yards in front of our line he was ordered to halt by the officer. Then four soldiers were brought into position between us and the doomed youth. His back was turned to the squad and to us and we all saw the white cross on his cassock. Legt an! Feuer! The four rifles made only one sound. Dupiéreux fell on his back to the ground. For a minute the arms twitched slightly. We were then made to walk half way round the field away from the scene. The twin brother of the dead Scholastic was of the number. One of us looked back to see what was going to happen next. The officer came to the body, put his pistol to one of the ears and fired. The bullet came out through the eye.

The officer then made me translate the following proclamation: "You will be brought along with us in our carts. When we get to a village, two or three of you will be sent to tell the burgomaster that he is to hold the people in check. If we are shot at from the houses we will burn the whole village and slaughter the inhabitants. You will meet the same fate as the people."

We climbed up into the carts, and made ourselves as comfortable as we could, some of us lying on the oats and some on the planks. We had along with us Mgr. Ladeuze, Rector of the University, and Mgr. de Becker, President of the American College. So we went through Brussels, the crowd all the while wondering what was the meaning of the painful sight. At eight o'clock in the evening we were let go, thanks to the intervention of Rev. Father Provincial. TERENCE KING.

Woman and Public Activity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The conclusion of your article "You Begin," in the issue for October 10, indicates the cause of the present public apathy with regard to the Menace and other scandals that are supinely tolerated by the Catholics of this country. In a democracy no legislative action can be hoped for that is not strongly supported by public opinion. And how can public opinion be strong when that portion of its citizens which possesses the zeal, fervor and equipment necessary to give tone to public opinion in such a crisis, is constantly being told except during church bazaars to remain at home? In the beginning man was told that he needed a helpmeet. That need persists to the present. Now it is an acknowledged fact that there is in this country an aristocracy of women capable of assisting man in the peculiar public conditions of to-day. Is it not therefore the wildest lack of wisdom for man to ignore his need and his helpmeet, if not in domestic concerns, at least in public affairs? The work of Catherine of Siena, Blanch of Castile, Matilda of Canossa and Victoria Guelph was of a public nature. If the crude American public opinion could be brought up to the public opinion of the times when those noble women went forth from their homes to give to the public the benefit of their God-given talents, Catholic public activity would not be so slow, so supine, so unintelligent, so apathetic and so indifferent.

Surely the Church is educating her women in her many excellent academies and colleges, not to bake bread and to scrub the floors of her home, but to make her capable of leadership in public and social affairs. And is it not again the height of folly to make her capable of taking the lead in battle, amid conditions such as ours, and at the same time to deny her the field where her zeal, her energy and her capabilities are sadly needed? Should I go to the Congressman of the district in which I live and ask to be protected from the insults of the Menace I should be given the same kind consideration as a child or a woman in the drawing-room receives; but there it would end. I am only a woman, not a voter. I assure you that I have been obliged to control my impulse to initiate something; I have too much sense I trust to attempt the impossible. I know with what extreme politeness legislators receive women.

You truly have struck the key to the solution of the problem. The country needs a Catherine of Siena; and because it is a democracy it needs all the numerous Catherines who are her disciples, and the Catherines need the credentials which will admit them to the council chamber without the stigma that is now placed upon a woman who attempts to initiate any public activity. I assure you that it is my Catholicity that has made of me a strong suffragist, despite the fact that preachers occasionally indulge in a little joke on the subject. My patience with Catholic men in public matters is quite exhausted. They surely need the spur of Catholic women with zeal and energy.

We women who would gladly give to the public the benefits which we receive from our holy religion, trust and pray that some day the Church in this beautiful country of ours will place woman once again where she was placed in those ideal Catholic days that seem to be forgotten, on the throne, not behind it. There she will be able to do the constructive work that is needed in this country, will form and mould public opinion as she forms and moulds her children's minds; and God will throw about her the mantle of His protection, for she seldom undertakes a task, great or small, without invoking His blessing.

Buffalo, N. Y. E. C. H.

Chaplains in the Field

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The reference in your issue of October 10 to the late Father Peter Tissot, S.J., chaplain of the 37th New York "Irish Rifles," is most interesting to the surviving members of the Grand Army, who remember his services in the field with the Army of the Potomac. He left a diary in which he recorded his experiences there, and which was published by the United States Catholic Historical Society in Records and Studies for January, 1903. In this he makes the following note of his opinion of the duties of a chaplain in the field. It seems to have a special value in these universal war times.

> We often read of chaplains flying about on the battlefield from one wounded man to another through the thickest of the fight. I doubt whether it was ever done; at all events it should never be done. It is customary at the beginning of a battle for surgeons to choose a place in a house, if there be one, or a cluster of trees, where they hoist a red flag to show that it is a hospital where the wounded are gathered. It is an understood thing that the guns of both armies respect the red flag. That is the post of the chaplain. He should expose himself as little as possible. If he does expose himself he may be of service to a few, which is doubtful, but if in so doing he is killed, he will deprive numbers of others of his services after the battle. But even with the greatest precautions a chaplain may be very much exposed, owing to the shifting of the battlefield. A place which is very safe now may become the hottest in a very short time.
>
> My experience has taught me that there is not much good to be done on the day of a battle. Most of the wounded are left scattered on the field. Even when they are gathered in one place the first thing they want is a nurse or surgeon, some one to attend to their wounds. Then they are generally packed so close, especially if it be in a room, that it is out of the question to hear a Confession, independently of the din, shouts, yells, "confusion worse confounded." It may be easier in an army wholly Catholic, where the chaplain wears a cassock and is recognized by all at once. There is a better chance of doing good after the battle, when the wounded are distributed in houses or tents. The place for a chaplain to do good is in the camp. If he does no good there, he had better stay at home.

Father Tissot was indeed an engaging personality to all who knew him. He was born at Mégève, in Savoy, October 15, 1823, and entered the Society of Jesus, at Paris, October 10, 1852. He came to New York in 1846 and the following year was made one of the teaching corps at Fordham. He was ordained priest there by the famous Apostolic Nuncio to Brazil, Archbishop Bedini, on October 16, 1853. After the war he was treasurer at Fordham and finally ended his career prematurely by excessive work as a missionary. He died June 19, 1875. The official record of his army service says he was made chaplain of the 37th N. Y. Vols., May 28, 1861, and was mustered out with the regiment June 22, 1863. Although he says, as above quoted, a chaplain has no business on the battlefield, he did not follow his own teaching. It is recorded that in one severe engagement he was observed by General Hancock during the heaviest fire, oblivious of all danger, going about bending over the dying and the dead. "Who's that priest?" said the general to one of his staff. And the officer, an old Fordham student, answered with manifest pride: "That is Father Tissot, chaplain of the 37th New York."

There is splendid material waiting some future historian who will make up the record of the Catholic chaplains of the Civil War on both sides of the conflict.

G. A. R.

Newark, N. J.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

An Armistice on Christmas

There is a movement on foot to petition warring Europe to agree to an universal cessation of hostilities on Christmas day. This is a holy thought. If men will not for their own sakes and for the sake of mankind desist entirely from their work of desolation, they may perhaps consent for Christ's sake to halt the awful flow of blood at least for one short day. The nations who are in the field with the single exception of Japan are all Christian peoples, believing in the divinity of the Redeemer, hoping for salvation through His precious Blood, and professing to have heard and harkened to His teaching. France too is Catholic at heart; and even her atheistic officials are concerned, if not for the honor of God, at least for the good of man. It is devoutly to be wished that the cannon's roar may be hushed on the anniversary of the coming of the Prince of Peace, that the weary world may hear the message of "Peace on earth to men of good will." The day of "peace on earth" seems indeed to be a distant thing, but if only the dripping point of the sword can be sheathed for some few hours, at least its promise may be caught.

Christmas has always been a day of Christ-given joy to all the world, a joy that is the right of all men of good will. And who shall say that those who stand in the trenches, bearing the brunt of the battle, are not men of good will? They have not issued ultimatums nor ordered armaments; their part has been to obey the call of duty, and they have responded nobly. Why should they be defrauded of the hope of putting hatred out of their hearts on the day when Christ was born? Surely there is no need to desecrate the birthday of the Son of God. There will be time enough, alas! for them to shoot and kill their fellows. On Christmas day at least there should be peace. The Babe of Bethlehem has a weak and tiny voice. It can not be heard above the scream of murderous shells, and yet to-day more than ever before there is dire need for all to hear that voice. An armistice on Christmas day! What a tribute to Jesus Christ!

Another Subsidy

Some few weeks ago our Government sent the Scorpion to Turkey, carrying $200,000 of public money to Protestant institutions. A few days since the nation's purse was opened once again, and this time $75,000 slipped into the coffers of similar institutions in Asia. The New York Sun announces this item of news as follows:

Takes Aid to Missionaries

CRUISER CARRIES $75,000 TO JAFFA TO BE SENT TO JERUSALEM.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15.—For the relief of American missionaries in Turkey in Asia the cruiser North Carolina has been ordered to proceed to the port of Alexandria to get $75,000 in gold, which is to be distributed under the direction of Ambassador Morgenthau.

The gold will be taken by the North Carolina to Jaffa and transported thence to Jerusalem for distribution. The gold is part of the sum appropriated by Congress for the relief of Americans stranded in the war zone.

How interesting! How kind! How apostolic! But how cruel! for, were not the real American citizens so busy grilling a certain Catholic candidate for the office of governor, about his connections concerning the use of public money for sectarian purposes, they would lie awake at night fretting over these incidents, or falling asleep, their slumbers would be disturbed by a vision of an "evangelical" tie in the presidential chair. Our Administration should take pity on real American citizens. These continual violations of "the character of our sacred, inviolable liberties, signed with the blood of our illustrious forbears—'all said in one breath'—will prostrate real American citizens and there will be nobody left to 'preserve' our sacred palladium." Meantime, even while we write, the war zone is expanding enormously. Turkey in Europe, two weeks ago; Turkey in Asia now. Thibet next, India after that, then perhaps Norway, and later, perchance, Iceland. Maybe, however, there are no missionaries in the last-named place.

Days of Anxious Questioning

There never was a time perhaps when the world had such insistent need of renewing its faith in the doctrine of original sin. The catastrophe which is looming so large in Europe is making men listen to doubts about the goodness and providence of God. Those who have held high places and so command a hearing are discrediting the influence of religion, because it has not prevented the outbreak of war. Christianity is held up to scorn, as if its authority had been wholly undermined and its claims discovered to be groundless, and all because it has failed to exercise a sovereign influence over human passions and human freedom. Pages which are fearlessly blasphemous in their denunciation and repudiation of Almighty God, are applauded for their outspoken frankness. The problem of evil is obtruded on the public's and the individual's attention at every turn, and a morbid emphasis is laid on life's suffering and sorrow. Unfortunately nothing is proved, no explanation is offered; only false deductions are drawn. If men think of God at all, they declare Him cruel.

We have good reason to believe that our Catholics have in no way been tainted by this blasphemous unbelief, and yet there is need of watchfulness. Each one must look to himself lest he too give lodgment in the hidden depths of his inmost thoughts to evil questioning of the wisdom and benignity of the Lord God of all. Life's pain is not an unsolved and insolvable mystery, at least to us. Others may peer into the darkness and find no answer, but it is not so with the Church's children. We have the solution of revealed truth. We accept and believe the doctrine of original sin. Poverty and desolation, the wasting of tissue and the breaking of hearts, crime and death and war, all have their explanation in the transgression of God's law by the father of the human race. In these days, therefore, of growing and distressing doubt, Catholics would do well to search their hearts and minds and ask themselves how firm is their grasp on this fundamental dogma of the faith.

Catholic Chaplains in England's Armies

The British forces on the Continent had but twelve Catholic chaplains until recent agitation succeeded in inducing the War Office to add seven more. However, there are only eleven in actual service, and their disposition is in the hands of a Protestant minister who has assigned them to the hospitals, so that there is not one English-speaking chaplain in the immediate neighborhood of the firing line. There are a number of regiments that consist almost exclusively of Irish Catholics, and are usually posted where death is imminent and spiritual aid is urgent; and there are few regiments in which Catholics are not numerous. Not one of these has a Catholic chaplain, and there is no such thing as a chaplain marching with his regiment, for he has no regiment, being only appointed to a division when appointed at all. In view of the fact that there are now at least 93,000 Catholics on the fighting line, the attention of the Government was called in Parliament to the insufficiency of Catholic chaplains. Colonel Tennant replied that the regulations permitted no increase, and "The French priests will do what is necessary." It was pointed out that the implied confidence in the linguistic accomplishments of the Irish soldier was unwarranted; but the War Office stood firm. Mr. Asquith was expected to promise concessions in his Dublin recruiting speech, but he promised nothing.

The Irish Catholic, which has been running two lengthy editorials, one insisting that Irishmen shall enlist, and the other that they can have no spiritual aid if they do, has also been telegraphing the War Office, urging the necessity of appointing Irish chaplains to Irish regiments, if they expect recruiting to thrive. The editor has got no satisfaction, the only reason assigned for not appointing field chaplains, being that "only a limited number of non-combatants can accompany the army in the field owing to demands on transports, etc." Meanwhile every French regiment has its aumônier militaire, not paid but provided with transportation to the front and permitted to serve, in addition to the priests in the ranks; and Germany's Catholic soldiers have their Feld Kaplan, with official rank and appointment. In fact, as is stated in the very loyal Irish Catholic, "Of all the belligerents England alone makes utterly inadequate provision for the eternal destiny of her soldiers in the field"; and a Catholic officer writes:

> A few days ago a whole brigade of French troops went down on their knees and received absolution from the priest before going into action. The French Government is infidel. The British Government is esteemed most highly Christian. Yet under the former the Catholic soldier may secure his salvation in battle and under the latter he may not.

The provision for Catholic chaplains in the Navy is still more scanty. The cruisers recently sunk had a large number of Catholic sailors but no Catholic chaplain. We presume that the pressure of Catholic opinion and the urgency of recruiting bodies for the army, will secure that this shocking neglect of their souls shall be remedied. It is an Irish and British, not an American question; but inasmuch as American sympathy has been sought for, it is pertinent to observe that this will not be stimulated among Catholics by the continued refusal of the War Office to make spiritual provision for its Catholic soldiers in the ranks of death.

I Want to Know

It is not one State alone of these United States, or one town or even one individual alone that experiences the desire of having the truth manifested. "I want to know" is as universal a cry as "I want to eat." There is hunger and thirst in the soul as well as in the body. The power which gave man an eye with capacity and tendency for sight, an ear with capacity and tendency for sound, gave the soul a curiosity with a capacity and tendency for knowledge. The reason why these commonplace remarks acquire a particular and pertinent appropriateness here and now is found in the multiplication to-day of the means of gaining information. Horizons are indefinitely extended; the sphere of sound prolongs its radii to tremendous distances. The voice that sailed on the waves of air and sped a few yards away, has now been launched on a sea of less sluggish billows and sweeps in vastly wider surges to thousands of miles. Nor need we await the sound's travel along the channels of wire when even swifter channels open up to it through all the radiating air. If sound speeds so lightly over the oceans of ether, color will not be outdone. In fact color has always been traveling on the waves that sound has but recently sailed upon, but we do not see as far as we hear, simply because we have no mechanical eye as delicate as the mechanical ear, which from wires or from wireless ether echoes back to sound the far-off vibrations of the voice or metal.

Until we are able to see through woods and mountains and the swelling sides of the world, we shall have to content ourselves with the lofty eye of the aeroplane and the long-distance eye of the telescope to accompany the extended ear of the telephone. The man who wants to know to-day, has ample means at his disposal of gaining information. If time and inventiveness changed the toy, zoetrope, into the long reel of the moving picture where flowers grow and butterflies unfold and far-off battles are fought, what may we not expect of other mechanical devices? When the seismograph grows more delicate, we may be able to catch the foot-step of father as he leaves his office, or hear the crash when one snow-flake falls upon another.

But why should eye and ear be the only senses with enlarged boundaries? Does it savor of the "Arabian Nights" to dream that man one day may be able to attach to his nose a sensitive receiver which will bring him the fragrance of the tropics, or draw across his lips by some delicate device sips of Oriental beverages or tastes of Parisian chef d'œuvres. Why, we behold daily almost as wonderful extensions of knowledge in response to the cry, "I want to know." Sex-hygiene makes physicians of primary pupils; biology and anatomy transform sweet girl-graduates into expert surgeons; committees, slummers, and novelists have thrown every crime upon the revealing screen; advertising and publicity have lifted the veil from all other secrets of dress or disease or what not.

If aeroplanes, as has been said, have done away with surprise in war, are we not rapidly coming to the time when the fresh, delightful and invigorating shock of surprise will disappear from everything? Will not the appetite for information grow jaded and pall? There is complete assurance from one who in olden days wanted to know and who refused nothing whatsoever his eyes desired, that all the knowledge of the world was vanity and that he still wanted to know. The uttermost widening of the horizon of sense can not sate a thirst for truth which overleaps such narrow restrictions and extends to the boundless circle of infinity. But what are the hosts of mankind doing to improve the means of gaining information for the soul and to keep pace with the wonderful inventions for enlarging the scope of the senses? Here and there recently a few men have begun to make retreats to get a nearer view of God. They have closed out sounds to hear better and have gone away from engrossing sights that they may see farther and deeper and have resolutely held aloof from distracting thoughts that their unweighted souls may soar to sublimer heights and attain unto more dazzling visions. Few, too few, are they who really want to know.

LITERATURE

The Postern Gate of Happiness

In "The Fugitive," one of the three plays in the latest volume of his dramatic works (Scribner's) Mr. Galsworthy introduces us to a young married couple. The wife has ceased to love her husband and declares that, for this reason, her conscience will not allow her to continue to live as his wife. The husband is a considerate, well-bred gentleman and is ready to make every concession to save his wife's honor and his own. The wife has a literary friend, a clever journalist of advanced ideas, who encourages her, disinterestedly, of course, to live up to her high feministic ideas. The wife departs clandestinely, and for three months earns her own living as a shop-girl. It is an irksome and dreary existence; it helps her, however, to discover that her regard for her literary friend is not wholly platonic. Wherefore she flings herself at the head of this guide, philosopher and friend; and, alas for philosophy! he plays the rôle of Barkus rather than Plato. Troubles multiply. The wronged husband makes it unpleasant for the literary friend by cutting off his sources of income. In this disagreeable extremity the literary friend concludes that the lady is something of a nuisance. She is sharp enough to read the bitter truth in his eyes and does not wait for formal notice. In the last scene she turns up, beautiful, well-dressed, and with her last penny spent, in a fashionable café of the flashy kind. She flings herself again in tragic desperation at the head of the first comer. A stranger buys her liberal champagne, and, during a pause, she covertly swallows a deadly drug and passes away as the curtain falls.

Old stuff, this! Nay, gentle reader, not so fast! The villain in this play is the husband! The insinuating literary friend is the hero! The selfish wife is the heroine. If we do not gnash our teeth at the husband, and admire the lofty philosophy of the literary friend, and shed a tear of sympathy—sympathy, not merely of comprehension, to use De Quincey's distinction—but of pity and approbation over the headstrong wife, then Mr. Galsworthy's play has been written in vain. If we are not convinced that the traditional ideas about marriage are not cruel anachronisms, then Mr. Galsworthy has labored to no purpose.

"You see," this poor, silly wife is made to say, "I'm too fine, and not fine enough. I couldn't be a saint and martyr and I wouldn't be a soulless doll." "The Dolls' House!" Ibsen, for all the world! Most of this feministic truck is imported from foreign languages. With a dash of Oscar Wilde to make it smart and English, it seems to take very well with the ordinary English and American audience. But we invite attention to the quotation. It is a striking sentence and is made more striking in the play itself by several repetitions. It gives us the key to the feministic philosophy on marriage. Incidentally it discloses the central viciousness of that philosophy, an old and sordid viciousness at that. "What are called advanced ideas," writes a modern pagan in a luminous interval, "are really in great part but the latest fashion in definition, a more accurate expression, by words in logy and ism, of sensations which men and women have vaguely grasped for centuries." We hesitate to describe in common phraseology the century-old sensations which find themselves expressed in the modern word, feminism.

In Mr. Galsworthy's play the fallen wife was wrong. She could be "a saint and martyr," and she need not have been "a soulless doll." She could be what all men and women are supposed to be, and what, as a consoling matter of fact, the vast majority of men and women actually are. She could live up to a solemn obligation, entered into deliberately and voluntarily. She could have consulted the feelings of her husband, and of her own and his kindred, instead of concentrating all her thought in a spirit of narrow egoism upon herself. She need not have yielded to gross temptation nor degraded her womanhood through sensual weakness. She could have practised the decencies which a moderate self-restraint imposes. This was only what she meant when she declared she could not be a "saint and martyr." What an intolerable world it would be if ordinary obligations were considered as too heroic to be met by common human nature; and, in the absence of a purely fanciful heroism of character, it were erected into a principle of conduct and a rule of life that we must evade the law rather than be crushed by it!

We do not deny that present educational policies, purely pagan as far as moral strengthening is concerned, tend to multiply men and women of the type of the hero and heroine in this play. Marriage means the assumption of a series of duties which are often attractive by their appeal to emotional forces. But duty seldom remains forever a synonym for pleasure. The hour and the mood are sure to come when duty will rise stark and forbidding before our eyes, stripped of its inspiration and romance. Then is steadfastness tried. Then must the soul stand firm and unflinching to win its peace and its honor through struggle, or retreat covered with a shame and a cowardice which no ingenious justification by authors of "advanced ideas" can make the soul forget.

Fortitude in the marriage state is, we think, a virtue which calls in a special way upon the resources of religion. The marriage vow is a religious act which only religion can make possible of complete fulfilment. Human love, it has been shrewdly observed, must be something more than human, or it is sure to be something less. Only religious considerations can ennoble the joy and sorrow of married life; and, when these considerations are not present, the husband or the wife will find it too trying, in certain crises, to be a "saint and martyr," and will either seek accommodation in some low and ghastly compromise or fling decency to the winds.

Let us not look back to the Cornelias and Lucretias of old time. Our civilization is not the kind that can thrive on the customs of the antique world. If it venture to get along with pagan morals, it will find itself at once too fine and not fine enough. Too fine, on account of its inherited Christian instincts and spiritual refinement. Not fine enough, because it scoffs at truths which Socrates would have died of sheer joy to have known.

The crowning mistake and sadness of popular literature, such as that we have been reviewing, is that it is over-busy in picking from the rough, coarse texture of duty the silver strands of happiness. Only the small writers do this. Genius knows that happiness is conditioned in brave endurance.

> Blind fumblers that we be
> About the portals of felicity,

We can not hope to pass the Angel with the flaming sword or to come upon a hidden postern to the unmixed Paradisal delights of the age of innocence. The moth will first find a safe way of plunging into fire. The only practical system of hedonism so far discovered is the one described in the well-known phrase of Montesquieu referring to the Catholic religion: "While it seems only to have in view the felicity of the other life, it constitutes the happiness of this." The paradoxical recipe for happiness, that we must despise it in order to find it, is not intelligible outside of its Christian context and without the perspective of eternity beyond the temporal career of the immortal soul.

It can not be necessary to warn serious and well-intentioned readers against the large school of popular writers of whom Mr. Galsworthy is one of the leaders. Their art is manifestly of the day. These plays, for instance, are from an artistic point of view leagues behind Sheridan's or Goldsmith's, being little more than socialistic tracts. In all the writings of this school indecency, inseparable from a central baseness, shamelessly intrudes itself at odd intervals. Apology is often made in the stock statement, that the advocates of advanced ideas are not writing for the young and foolish but for sensible and matured minds. We have only to remark in reply that, if they depended for their readers upon the patronage of sensible and matured minds, not one of them could find a publisher for his books. Their plays and novels and essays have a glittering fascination for culture at its shallow and immature stages. The young and foolish, who need to be saved from themselves, make up the bulk of the readers of "advanced" literature and have done most to give its authors their literary fame and their worldly fortune.

It might shock, or merely amuse, Mr. Galsworthy, who hates war, to learn that there are persons who seriously believe that the manslaughtering artilleries of Europe, now so active, are scattering abroad less damaging projectiles than his own books and plays. Yet that is our deliberate opinion, shared, we are fain to be persuaded, by most thoughtful men and women who happen to have bestowed a thought upon Mr. Galsworthy. It is an opinion based upon the principles that spiritual death is worse to the individual and society than bodily death, and upon the fearful warning to those that give scandal to the young and helpless.

J. J. D.

REVIEWS

Prodigals and Sons. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. New York: P. J Kenedy & Sons. $1.25.

The twenty-seven prodigals and sons that are happily and permanently housed in the 320 pages of this goodly book will find a generous welcome at their home coming. They had been away in India and Egypt, France, Germany, Malta and out-of-the-way corners of England, in barracks, Anglican convents and old-fashioned houses, and in abbeys that are long out of fashion. Some of the tales have a cousinly resemblance to old acquaintances of "Gracechurch" and "Monksbridge," and some are versions of olden miracle legends that labor not at all to tune the miraculous to a less believing generation. There are several deft disentanglements of eastern and western mysteries that prove Mgr Bickerstaffe as keen a detective as Mr. Chesterton's Father Brown. Through all of them there runs the genial stream of mellow humor and gentle irony and kindly wisdom and the purest and pleasingest of modern English, that characterizes the writings of John Ayscough. There is a dish for every taste. There is comedy and tragedy, but the comic has a way of popping up almost anywhere, even from a death's-head. The author's saying that a certain English road is "as flat as a comic paper" can never apply to a paper of his. His writing seems invariably a perfect fit for the body of his thought, but it is the content, not the garment, he is thinking of. Like his youthful baronet of Blackfriars Court, he is "a cheery person and took his share of all the innocent pleasures of life; but he had a serious purpose in it, too." He never preaches, yet every story has a lesson that comes both unawares and welcome. "Blackfriars Court" and "The Happy End of Sister Elizabeth" carry more of the essence of the last five centuries of England's religious history than most of the regular histories, and hold more humor than the joke-books—a humor that is always kind and knowing, lighting up and sweetening the tragedies and hardnesses of life. John Ayscough's houses and streets are very real, like his people, but he shows you nicer things in them than are ordinarily observed. There is scarcely a page but invites quotation, yet each would give no more adequate idea of the book than that presented of the "Happy End of Sister Elizabeth," in the last lines which consign her "remains" to Mr.

Trevethick. The tales vary in merit as in subject, but they form the best collection of the author's short stories, which is superlative praise. M. K.

Demosthenes and the Last Days of Greek Freedom, 394-322 B.C. By A. W. PICKARD-CAMBRIDGE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.35.

This new volume of the "Heroes of the Nations" series will be welcomed by students of Grecian oratory. The author shows a mastery of his originals and of the modern Continental works dealing directly and indirectly with his subject. His attitude is that of a temperate enthusiasm for the great statesman, coupled with the fair-minded historian's desire to hold the scales even. He is less willing than Professor Goodwin to accept Demosthenes' authority on points where active antagonism of a thoroughly good hater was allowed free and unscrupulous play. He sifts statements, gives his findings, and at the close of each chapter adds brief notes for the more leisured or more scholarly reader. His summing up is judicious and will carry the assent of the many. It is interesting to turn to some of the more notable points of Demosthenic criticism, which the reader will find adequately treated. The attitude of the orator in the negotiations concerning the peace of Philocrates has met with condemnation; but our author judges him mildly. Demosthenes had worked for the peace, but merely as a breathing space. But that Philocrates and Æschenes were hirelings of Philip is not proved. As for Philip, he had about as much respect for a treaty as a modern European Power would have for a "Keep off the grass" sign, set up in the line of march.

As a judicial biographer Mr. Pickard-Cambridge is not blind to the faults of Demosthenes, and in summing up the orator's policy he is whole-hearted in praising what is admirable in the great Athenian. The book is sure to prove serviceable to those studying "The Philippics" and "The Crown," but will it have an equal interest for the larger public which this "Heroes of the Nations" series aims to reach? We hope so.

A. P. M.

An Introduction to Medieval English Literature. By CHARLES SEARS BALDWIN, A.M., Ph.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25.

"What is a monastery, and how might its influence go forth upon literature?" asks Dr. Baldwin. "Without understanding this, it is impossible to comprehend adequately the course of English literature through several centuries." The answer is found in a discussion of monasteries and the religious life, which is remarkably complete, accurate and sympathetic. Your dry-as-dust savant, satisfied with nothing less than the original rubricated MS., will probably tilt his horn-bespectacled nose at this compact, but thorough little treatise, which Dr. Baldwin has written with an eye to the practical needs of "students not especially trained." The bibliography is excellent; in no case, as far as we have noted, is teacher or student referred to sources not fairly accessible. Dr. Baldwin has produced a book which will interest every lover of early English, and which can be recommended cordially for use in Catholic colleges and academies. P. L. B.

Between the Old World and the New. By GUGLIELMO FERRERO. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

This is a chronicle of events which took place in the course of a voyage from Brazil to Italy. In his preface the author informs us that his work "is not a romance, a volume of travel, or a drama, nor is it a treatise of philosophy or sociology. It is a dialogue." After a careful inspection of its pages, we are inclined to agree with him. It is not, in very truth, any or all of these, though there is an element of each contained therein.

Professor Ferrero takes us with him in spirit to the bridge of the good ship Cordova, as she steams out of the bay of Rio de Janeiro and points out to us the various details of that scene which has been so often and so well described. Then, when the shore line has grown dim and the shadow of sea-voyage sameness is coming upon us, he dispels the threatening cloud by introducing us into a little circle of fellow-voyagers who are singularly keen on debate, and the dialogue begins.

There is all the desultoriness that lends charm to discussions of this sort, but, we regret to add, also the haziness that arises when there is failure to agree upon definitions. The subjects of the dialogue are varied, philosophical and otherwise, and serve to while away the waking hours of the long voyage. But unlike the voyage they reach no very determinate end. Truth, beauty, art, progress are a portion of the intellectual harvest thrown by the disputants upon the winnowing-floor, but, the threshing done, there is scarcely enough good grain to repay the wielders of the flail and little if any to be stored in the granaries of thought.

Signor Rosetti, who seems to be the centre of the group, has doubtless done some thinking in the course of his varied career, but thought and accurate thought are two different things. We are not in a position to judge of his asserted ability as an engineer, but we trust that he used his instruments with greater precision than he displays in handling certain fundamental philosophical principles and ideas and the phrases he employs to express these ideas.

We regret that we can not subscribe with the enthusiasm of the author and his companions to Signor Rosetti's words, when he represents men as being forced to gird themselves day by day "to their unending journey—Truth." "Clear as the stars to which Rosetti pointed," says Professor Ferrero, "was the light shed by his answer on the dark night which enveloped our thoughts." Perhaps he was pointing to the Milky Way. The light which comes to us from his reasoning does not give us the impression that he was indicating the Southern Cross.

The question proposed by the author in his preface, "Why is it that, at the height of his power, man is still discontented and restless?" is not answered by the "philosophy of limits." The answer is clear and was given centuries ago by St. Augustine when he said: "Thou hast fashioned us for Thyself, and our heart is aweary until it rest in Thee."

E. F. T.

The True Ulysses S. Grant. By General CHARLES KING. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $2.00.

The "True" biography and history series, of which this is the twelfth, has a rather provocative title, seeming to imply that previous biographers of American celebrities kept the truth from their readers or had it not to give, and that the Lippincott writers were the first to possess and unfold it in its fulness. Neither implication is true, and though the series are readable and interesting, and have therefore propagated knowledge, they have added little to its sum. The fact that they are, to a large extent, hero books, while securing them the note of popularity, detracts, or at least would appear to detract, from their historical value. This appearance of always writing up his hero rather disposes the reader to undervalue General King's biography, which is in reality an adequate and well-proportioned as well as interesting presentation of the character and achievements of a great American who had hero traits, and therefore, without disparagement to greater because more comprehensive lives of Grant, has intrinsic claims to its title. Grant's own memoirs present the truest picture of the man and his deeds as far as they go, but his modesty kept him silent on many details that are essential to the completion of his portrait. General King's worship of his hero has not prevented him from painting in "the warts," but it has impelled him to bestow on several of Grant's rivals and contemporaries warts which they did not possess. A western man and a volunteer, he has slight regard for eastern generals, and his irritation against the perfect West Pointer is also amusing; but in the main he is accurate, knows how to write so as to be read, and gives as comprehensive account of the great war and its personages as 400 pages may conveniently hold. His views on tactics and persons are no more and no less biased than those of most other military writers, and his selection of illustrations, some thirty in number, are similarly arbitrary. We miss Sheridan from the list, and could afford to miss several of those included. But the bias, while adding to the interest, is not such as seriously to depreciate the value of the book.

M. K.

Songs of Sixpence. By Abbie Farwell Brown. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

We are reminded that to see things from the child's view-point one must get down to the child's level; to appreciate a child's joys and sorrows it is necessary to feel how the little heart throbs. According to Francis Thompson, if we would measure a child's grief we must also measure his capacity for bearing that grief. This seeing into childlife is a gift not given to every one. Abbie Farwell Brown, however, comes very close to the true note in some of the poems in "Songs of Sixpence!"

I'm not as tall as you, sir,
  However straight I stand;
But I am tall enough to peep
  Across to Fairyland.

is refreshing in the midst of so much modern infantile precocity that has outgrown Fairyland and turns up its snobbish little nose at Santa Claus and Little Bo-Peep. The children tell us a simple but beautiful truth in a "Wee Little Song":

A wee little time to be little
  And a long, long time to be tall.
Then why should we want to be growing?
  Oh, why should we hate to be small?

A wee little time to be little
  And a long, long time to be tall.
But we know how to be happy
  And they have forgotten it all!

Few indeed keep very long the secret of knowing how to play. It is locked up somewhere in the heart of childhood, but the author has found it.

The humorous side of child play, too, is delightfully put in "All Wool." The child fears for the lambkin in the rain:

How very horrid it would be
  If they should shrink when wet!
He cannot take his woolies off
  And wear another set.

Again,

The bad bumble-bee has a pin in his tail,
  Mosquito has one in his nose.
The dear little kittens
Have pins in their mittens,
  And Ouch! There are pins on the rose!

brings us back to the days of "Old Mother Hubbard." The "Taller Poems" are not so appealing. In them we feel at once that we are out of the real Fairyland, and some of them might have been dropped entirely without injury to the volume.

J. S. H.

Fine Clay. By Isabel C. Clarke. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.35.

This is the story of a charming little boy who clung to the treasure of his Faith amid surroundings that were hostile and prejudiced. It brings out the very vital truth that a mother's influence is potent for good long after her voice is silent, and that the seeds of religion planted in childhood years will blossom unto fruitfulness even though the tender shrub may be violently transplanted into soil that is hard and exposed to blasts that are biting. There is no mistaking the moral of this tale: the Catholic Faith first and last, is the real prize-heritage worth leaving a child.

It is a pity that Miss Clarke makes us wait for more than 185 pages before we meet Ambrose, who is the centre of interest and a very well-drawn character. Yolande is the dominating figure in the first part of the book, and, though a delightful girl in her innocence and beauty, she is a bit disappointing in her infatuation for a man who is a wild young blade, and wins her love by deception. Her Catholic instinct, however, heartens and protects Yolande in the difficulties that her lying lover brings into her life. The author's style is pleasing. The dialogue at times, being too profuse, loses in strength and interest. Nor is anything gained by the frequent use of French phrases in the earlier pages of the story. "Envisaged" is noticeably a favorite word. More compression in the first 200 pages would have made "Fine Clay" a stronger story.

G. C. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Among the new editions that have lately been brought out by Catholic publishers are "Among the Hurons" (America Press, $1.25), the second volume of Father Campbell's "Pioneer Priests of North America"; a neat and handy Douay Bible (Benziger, $1.00), the low price of which should give it a good sale; and a revised and enlarged edition of H. E. Hall's "The Shadow of Peter" (Kenedy, $0.70), a valuable apologetic work reviewed in our issue of August 1, 1914. In the fifty pages the author has added to the book he discusses historical questions like "St. Cyprian and the Primacy" and gives further consideration to the Anglican Orders controversy. Cardinal Gasquet writes the preface for this new edition.

"The Universe and Mayonnaise" (Lane, $1.00), an attractively illustrated book, in which T. Brailsford Robertson undertakes to make "science" interesting to children, seems quite harmless until the chapter is reached that offers this information: "They [the Spaniards] had guns and knew how to shoot them, which was the only thing they knew that the Incas didn't know." So the ancient South American sun-worshippers, it would appear, practised a higher form of religion than the Catholics of Spain. Mr. Robertson's little readers are also told how "Mr. and Mrs. Anthropoid Ape," the early inhabitants of Siberia, happened to have a gifted son named "Homo" who taught his stupid relatives the value of fire. So "Evolution for the Nursery" would perhaps be a better title for the book.

A "Digest of the Savings Bank Laws," by Joseph R. Praetz, LL.B., of New York (the author, $1.00), is a neat little volume which appears to be a marvel of close and accurate analysis of the complex New York Savings Bank Law. While it is intended primarily for the lawyer, the bank official and the regular depositor, it is not without interest to the impecunious casual reader. What to do when you lose your pass-book, what disposition is made of dormant accounts, the punishment to be inflicted upon one who utters false rumors about the value of securities, are among the topics upon which information is given. The book should be of interest to the 3,181,248 thrifty New York folk, who wish to know what protection the law gives the little hoard of nearly two billion dollars which they have stored up against a rainy day.

Into "The Joyful Heart" (Houghton, $1.00.) Robert Haven Schauffler has gathered a little philosophy, some sound common sense, much good humor, some daring "journalese," a wee bit of poetry, some good advice and considerable bad theology. Like Bishop Kepler's "More Joy," it is a plea for joy, insisting much less on the spiritual promoters of joy and devoting large space to the value of health and the natural virtues as sources of joy. Pantheistic tendencies reveal themselves in such expressions as: "What is a man's own soul but a small stream of the infinite, eternal water of life?" The author sees hope for the future in the late revival of poetry, the increasing love of sports, and the wide use nowadays of gramophones. Yet men there be, alas! who find the joy of living lessened by the very ubiquity of the phonograph.

"Jean Gilles, Schoolboy" (Putnam, $1.25), has been excellently translated into English by Lady Theodora Davidson from the original French by André Lafon. The book has an extrinsic value from the fact that it was awarded the Grand Prix De Littérature by the Académie Française, but over and beyond this it has an interest of its own. It impresses one irresistibly as being a very truthful portrayal of a French boy: it would seem to be almost an exact transcription of the author's own youthful diary, so vivid and natural are its pages. This is responsible for the sameness and plainness of style, that would border at times on the tiresome, were it not that one feels that it is to the boy himself that one is listening. Throughout the narrative there is a good deal of imagination of a very refined kind and a strain of pathos that invests the strange and not wholly lovable character of Jean. It has the delicacy of touch of which French writers have such a mastery, and, a thing that is less characteristic of them, is wholesome and pure.

"The Street of Seven Stars," by Mary Robert Rinehart (Houghton, $1.25), is the story of student life in Vienna, and is centred about the struggle and sacrifices of several Americans who are ambitious for fame. The title names the location of an old royal hunting-lodge, where, to make ends meet and provide comfort for all, a post-graduate medical student sets up an establishment with a gifted young musician and an older woman physician as chaperone. The three impecunious idealists are actuated by kindly and pure motives, but the success of the unusual domestic arrangement seems to argue for the disregard of the safeguards of virtue and to reflect the modern tendency to uproot all barriers to personal liberty. The self-effacing and generous Peter Byrne and the girl violinist, Harmony Wells, whose charm and trust are wonderful, are most lovable characters, and their nobleness carries them over a most unconventional but innocent intimacy to the true haven of happiness, despite the lure of a career apart. The Catholic reader will be pained to find that almost the only reference to anything religious regards some visits made to the wayside cross by the worst sinner in the book.

Once again James Willard Schultz, the author of several Indian stories for boys, takes his readers over the Plains "On the Warpath" (Houghton, $1.25) with Pitamakan, the young Indian hero. From the time of the boy's first appearance at Fort Benton, until he finally merits the rank of Chief of the Black Robe band, there are many exciting adventures, told with that care for particulars which make the narrative realistic. The writer has given his hero an attractive, manly character, devoted to his parents and true to his friends.——Rosie O'Brien is the twelve-year-old heroine of Parker Fillmore's "Rosie World" (Holt, $1.30). Though upon her own confession, she is backward at school and must "work awful hard just barely to pass," she possesses deep knowledge along certain lines, due to her attendance at the "Little Mothers'" classes, and she does her lowly best to make her prosy world a rosy one. The love affairs of her sister Ellen make dismal reading and some of the details were better omitted. "Divorce is so common nowadays, it don't mean a thing!" is Ellen's excuse for keeping company with a divorced man. Yet the author would imply that the O'Briens are Catholics!

The following passage is quoted by a contemporary as a good example of the "balance, dignity and proportion" that are so characteristic of Dr. Johnson's prose:

> He is happy that carries about with him in the world the temper of the cloister; and preserves the fear of doing evil, while he suffers himself to be impelled by the zeal of doing good, who uses the comforts and conveniences of his condition as though he used them not, with that constant desire of a better state, which sinks the value of earthly things; who can be rich or poor, without pride in riches or discontent in poverty; who can manage the business of this life with such indifference as may shut out from his heart all incitements to fraud or injustice; who can partake the pleasures of sense with temperance, and enjoy the distinctions of honor with moderation; who can pass undefiled through a polluted world; and, among all the vicissitudes of good and evil, have his heart fixed only where true joys are to be found.

Besides being excellent English, the paragraph is admirable doctrine. The words show how Catholic-minded the great moralist was.

The Boston Evening Transcript offered its readers the following "Saxon-worded" translation by Mr. Prentiss Cummings of Horace's famous "Eheu! Fugaces":

> The years, alas! the fleeting years! Away
> They glide: nor can thy piety one moment stay
> Wrinkled old age, nor death's dread march delay.
>
> Were all thy kine to Pluto's altars brought > With sighs and tears, grim Pluto heedeth not.
> Thou canst not so escape thy mortal lot.
>
> For all of earth must cross his streams which hold,
> Imprisoned, rich and poor, the warrior bold.
> And storied giants, haughty chiefs of old.
>
> We shun the billows of the roaring main,
> Shun fever-laden winds, and autumn's rain,
> And hide from bloody wars—but all is vain.
>
> Earth surely thou must leave, and home, and kin,
> And visit Pluto's realm to dwell therein,
> And see the sinner punished for his sin;
>
> Must leave, brief owner, lands and all you crave,
> For not one tree shall share thy journey, save
> The sombre cypress. That shall deck thy grave.
>
> Wines fit for pontiffs which you hoard with care,
> And guard with locks, and all unwisely spare,
> Will drench the pavements of a wasteful heir.

It is now considered so offensively "high-brow" to translate or even to quote Horace that the Transcript's "Listener" shows great courage in publishing these verses. Those who are old-fashioned enough to enjoy the Latin classics still, are inclined to conceal their penchant as they would a humiliating weakness.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Harper and Brothers, New York:
The Copy-Cat and Other Stories. By Mary E. Wilkins Freeman. $1.25; The Auction Block. By Rex Beach, $1.25.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
A Book of English Essays. By C. T. Winchester.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Reading Public. By MacGregor Jenkins. $0.75; The Witch. By Mary Johnston, $1.40; War's Aftermath. By David Starr Jordan and Harvey Ernest Jordan. $0.75; The Boy Fugitives in Mexico. By Worthington Green. $1.25.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
The Red Ascent. By Esther W. Neill. $1.00.

John Lane Co., New York:
The Universe and the Mayonnaise. By T. Brailsford Robertson. $1.00.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Essays Political and Historical. By Charlemagne Tower. $1.50; Heroes and Heroines of Fiction. By William S. Walsh. $3.00; The True Ulysses S. Grant. By General Charles King. 24 Illustrations. $2.00.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
Essays on Books. By William Lyon Phelps. $1.50; With Poor Immigrants to America. By Stephen Graham. $2.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Real "Truth About Germany". By Douglas Sladen, with an Appendix by A. Maurice Low, M.A. $1.00.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Cruise of the Janet Nichol. By Mrs. R. L. Stevenson. $1.75.

EDUCATION

Studying the Child

The most hopeful sign of progress in our educational methods is our changed attitude toward the child. We are trying to put ourselves in his place, to get into his mind and heart, to look from his eyes upon the general scheme of things in this rather topsy-turvy world. What is this marvelously complex being, this small boy or girl, whom we propose to "educate"? In the abstract, we know that he is a rational animal. But we have questions of deeper import to propose. The subject of our educational process as he creeps unwillingly to school, or sits in the benches of our schools, his small wits struggling with the intricacies of multiplication, is no abstract proposition, but a very concrete reality. What is the reaction of his soul to our carefully spun theories of mental and physical development? What does this too often unwilling subject of our experimentation think of the whole process? In our own minds this experimentation is freighted with wisdom, admirably adapted to attain its end. But what does it mean to him? Once we can get his point of view, we have found the answer to many a perplexing question. Some learned writer—or was it genial old Izaak himself?—has said, that could we formulate a clear and definite outline of the psychological processes which take place in a fish as he approaches the hook and swims away from it, the piscatorial art would be as simple and as prosaic as digging potatoes. Our hauls would be enormous, for our knowledge of the fish's point of view would be a bait superior to the most attractive lure within the devising of the cleverest of anglers.

The ultra scientific methods of the later nineteenth century, devised for the most part by arm-chair pedagogues emeriti, whose practical acquaintance with the problems of the classroom terminated with the outbreak of the Civil War or thereabouts, paid little attention to the point of view entertained by the child. This was like buying a suit of clothes without reference to the small human who was to bear them about in the face of the world. No wonder that, when garbed in them, he sometimes looked a figure o' fun, an unwilling mad Tom with overlarge raiment and a straw in his hair. In his delightful essay, "Child's Play," Stevenson regrets the general inability of adult mankind to understand the child. True, this is not easy, for the child bears about him the air of that mysterious country from which he has somehow strayed. He is wheeled hither and thither in a perambulator, gravely regarding, from wide eyes, the passing stranger. He is towed forward, sideways, in a kind of stupor, by an inexorable nurse, when he would cast a last long, lingering look at a huge guardsman, disappearing below his horizon with a most musical jingle of spur and clank of chain. Later on, when he goes to school, he is sorely pressed to place those bearded or petticoated giants, who profess the tenderest solicitude for him, and yet, every now and then reach down out of Olympic altitudes, and terribly vindicate the privileges of age. Off goes the child, smarting corporally, and morally rebellious. "I would give a good deal," comments Stevenson, "to know that child's unvarnished feeling. The dread irrationality of the whole proceeding, as it seems to him, is a theory we are all too ready to forget."

Once more are we beginning to realize what our remoter ancestors, who lived in simpler days, took for granted, that the child is a new book with divers uncut pages; a bilingual book, at least, for in it is more than one chapter written in a language not understood by the commonalty of schoolmasters. This realization is a distinct gain. Lacking the gift of self-expression, the child himself can not cut these pages, nor translate the occult language into terms intelligible to the adult mind. This we must do for ourselves, by dint of long and patient study. The finer spirit of child-study has flowered in its modern endeavor to read the child by gentleness and patience, in its reaffirmation of the old principle that we can not deal with children in the mass, since, after allowance has been made for the nature common to all, each child still remains his own world of shortcomings and capabilities. If educational processes are to help, not spoil, the child, they must consider his individual characteristics. No educator has ever denied this truth, but only great teachers have consistently taken it into account. No one acquainted with the classroom will deny that much of what appears to be stupidity, temper, insubordination and general unruliness, is occasioned not by any untoward disposition of the child's soul, but by some definite ailment of his body. Too often, in the past, ignorant teachers have attempted to "break the child of bad habits" by harsh measures of physical repression and chastisement. Even at present there are those who look upon the rod as a therapeutic of sovereign efficacy. But these are the exception. How far we have traveled from the generation which could emblazon the rod and thongs of the schoolmaster on the seals of English public schools, may be learned from a comparison of the methods now accepted even in the sternest of institutions, with the following description of a school-system in the Duchy of Brunswick, toward the close of the sixteenth century:

> When I think of the people's school in which the apples of their fathers' eyes, the darlings of their mothers, are huddled together, I am filled with pity for these poor little creatures who are crowded together in a space where scarcely half of them could sit comfortably. And as, moreover, the school building is situated in a dark, poky corner of the town where no wind and air have access, how is it possible that in such close, smelling quarters, the poor children should not be the victims of all sorts of diseases? (Frischlin, quoted in Janssen's History of the German People.)

So low had the teachers in these wretched schools fallen, that it was found necessary to issue an order, that in the infliction of punishment > every teacher must abstain from all manner of swearing and unsuitable language; they must not hit the boys in the face with keys, books or fists; they must not knock them down cruelly over the benches, tear their clothes, pull their ears, injure their sight and hearing, and flog them like hangmen.

To what evil spirit are these black pages in the history of child-training to be attributed? Men may have been rougher in their manners, more open in deeds of violence in those days, but there is no reason to believe that, as a class, the inhabitants of sixteenth century Brunswick were more brutal than their modern descendants. The evils which infested the schools took their rise, remotely, in the wreck of the old ideals, which had fallen in the revolt against the Church. For centuries, education and religion had worked in harmony. When religion was rejected, the school, thus suddenly dissevered from its ancient support, was left to shift as best it might. As a Church, Protestantism had not as yet interested itself in the school. Deeply involved in the political and religious turmoils of that troubled period, the community had no realization of its duty in problems of education. Any ruin might serve to house the children. Any broken-down soldier, home from the wars, or a clergyman unfit for higher duties, was accepted, or at least, was suffered to be a schoolmaster. Whatever plans this worthy might hit upon in his new calling, were borne with, not so much because the community approved them, as because the community had so little interest in the schools that it did not fully recognize their evil effects upon the children. Given a general lack of interest on the part of the community in the education of children, and the incompetent teacher is ever to the fore. With him, comes the tendency to group the pupils under one rigid discipline, without reference to their needs or capabilities, moral or physical.

In our own day, too much, perhaps, is made of the "individuality" of the child, and methods may be adopted in our primary schools which discredit a pedagogical truth of first importance. If so, this tendency would but indicate a natural reaction from the extreme principles which struck deep root in the northern countries of the Continent in the years following the religious revolt of the sixteenth century. To study and know the individual child, to take advantage of his natural bent, to temper the necessary exercise of authority with a parental kindness which wins the confidence of the child, is the perfection of the schoolmaster's art. Where any one of these qualities is wanting, the teacher becomes a petty tyrant, or a gushing fount of hurtful sentimentality, or a benighted creature who spends his days in vainly trying to make a square peg fit perfectly a circular opening. But apart from occasional excesses, the modern study of the child has done quite as much for the master as it has for the child who is placed under his care. It has given him the point of view of the child. P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

Jim

This is a story about Jim, mostly, and his $11.50, and car fare. Fifteen years ago, in a large American municipality in the Southwest, the liquor trade, especially in the factory districts and the vicinity of the wholesale houses, was singularly free both from legal restraint, and restraint imposed by public opinion. "Saloons" discharged their obligations, apparently, by paying their Government, State and municipal taxes. Their number was not limited by population. Many of them were gay with tawdry lights and mirrors, with music, warmth and animal comfort. They were the haunt and the breeding place of the vampires of society: the gambler, the thief, the gun-man, the pander, the woman, at once the toy and scorn of iniquity greater than her own. They were places which no decent man would enter, of course. That, seemingly, was the theory upon which the comfortable, well-fed citizen, loving his family and his business, and hating rows and politics, allowed them to exist. But they flourished, and not upon proceeds that came from the pockets of those who chose these places as a base of operation. Who supplied the funds? That is a question easily answered. Let us introduce Jim.

Jim comes out of one of these near-by factories on Saturday night with $11.50 in his pay envelope, and his car fare. He has worked eight hours that day, and every other day that week, over a shrieking, whirring machine that cuts out uppers for shoes. When you work a machine like this, you can't take your eyes off the "piece" for a single second. If you do, you may spoil the "piece," and that means a fine, and you may lose a finger, or two or three, into the bargain, and then you're done for. After eight hours of this sort of work, your eyes burn like fire, and there is a pain like the thrust of red-hot iron across the small of your back when you try to straighten up. For all this, Jim has received the munificent wage of $11.50, i.e., $12.00 minus a fine of fifty cents when a drive-belt broke. It was rotten—but that is a story about something else. Jim is tired and hungry, and for some years, he has been considerably underfed. He wants to get home, and quickly too, to the wife and children. The evening air is raw, full of a penetrating Autumn drizzle that gets under the warmest coat, and Jim's shoddy garment is none of the thickest. As he stumbles along—the pavements are bad along Whiskey Row—through an opened door, on a warm, almost sickening draft of alcohol-laden air, comes a burst of ragtime, and Jim hears the cards thumped down on the table, and the loud laugh of "good fellows." At home, there is the patient wife, good as gold, it is true, but little Katie is sick and cried all last night, and there will be a story of how the flour is out, and the groceryman threatens to cut off all supplies unless something is paid on a long-outstanding account, and it's almost impossible to get Tommy to go to school, because the other boys laugh at his ragged clothes. It's hard for a man to work all day, and then face this. She might manage better, Jim sighs, the glare of many gas-lamps in his eyes. Jim is wavering. His tastes are not æsthetic, as yours are, and mine. He only wants a little bit to warm him, and just a glint of light and laughter in his life, now and then. He can't get it at home. Just a little while; he won't stay long. . . .

The swinging doors have closed on Jim. The wife will go to bed late that night, but Jim won't eat the frugal supper she has left for him between two cracked plates in the oven. Little Katie's crying and coughing will numb her heart with dread, and the knowledge that "Jim is drinking again," strikes deeper terror than the fact that there will be little to eat next week. She who came of decent folks may be forced to rely upon the charity of those who give out of their poverty, her humble neighbors; or worse, reach the acme of distress in being obliged to apply for public relief. Jim will wake up next morning, in the gutter, perhaps, or the station-house, with an aching head and a black eye, and an aching heart, we hope, but no $11.50, and no car fare.

Now, don't tell me that Jim is a free agent, that he can look temptation in the face and say, "I won't," and that like Horace's just man, he can stand with unterrified head, with the ruins of all the world crashing about him. True as Matthew. Jim and I both know it, although to Jim, Horace is merely the name of the man he works for. Besides, when you and I talk like that, it reminds me of the cynical spirit of Becky Sharp, who thought that anybody could be good on five thousand a year. You and I don't work eight hours a day over a nerve-racking, body-destroying, whirring mass of bolts and belts and knives. We've got enough to eat, too, and in our homes, perhaps, there is the laughter of merry children, instead of the crying of poor little under-fed things who live in a tenement. We don't have to worry about the grocery bill and Tommy's coat. Jim does. There's the difference. When we're worn out, or think we are, we can take a rest. Jim can't. To him a vacation is a calamity. We spend more money in a month, some of us, on our amusements, than Jim's family spends for adulterated food in a whole year. The cost of that hat, Madame, might have sent little Katie with her mother to the country for a month, bringing back a grateful mother, and a bright-faced, happy little child. But don't hasten to countermand your order; it's too late, it's too late. I think that He, who loved the little children of the poor, is going to look into this case Himself, and send Katie to a bright, far-off country, where there won't be any crying or any hunger, or any fevered little children slowly dying in tenements owned by multimillionaires, and from which she won't have to come back in a month. Jim has worries that you and I know nothing about. He is not a bad fellow at heart. He is only weak, and hungry, and half sick, and despondent. For reasons into which we need not enter, his ideals are not very high. When temptation comes, through an occasion of sin, thrust upon him at the very time when circumstances have broken down half his resistance, it is fairly certain that he will fall. And with him, his family and, I may say, you and I fall.

Judging from statistics gathered by industrious sociologists, Jim has several million brothers in this bright and glorious land of ours. Let us not count the dollars which sober, industrious Jims might have deposited in savings banks. Rather, let us reflect for a brief moment upon broken-hearted wives, and starving children, and jails, and alms-houses, and scaffolds, and insane asylums, and alas! immortal souls often lost to God. Even this does not seem to get you much but a lump in your throat. But some questions we may ask with profit:

> Who put that occasion of sin in Jim's way? Who netted that chain of gilded saloons, close to a district through which these men had to pass? Who allowed them to strike the hand of fellowship with crime, to introduce and foster alluring vice?

Good citizens like you and me, who answered with Cain, that we had no charge over our brother.

Lest we be classed with violent and visionary prohibitionists, putting excess in drink as the sole cause of human misery, let us hasten to add, that we have merely cited one evil to serve as the symbol of many interrelated corrupting forces. There may be worse sources of evil in a community than such saloons; the corporation, for example, which, clearing twenty-one millions in net profits last year, pays its shop-girls an average weekly starving wage of $5.83. But in how many upright citizens is the thought of their community's duty to its children, and its weaker members, aroused only by the outbreak of some social horror? Some progress may be chronicled, but our communities have made only a beginning, and in the matter of preventive legislation, hardly that. The vital questions of adequate public relief, the living wage, compensation for injured workingmen, civilized labor laws for children and women, upon whom the future of the race depends, demand immediate consideration. But how many who might help to a solution, are in the least interested, or will admit that these are matters which concern the community's conscience?

True, men can not be dragooned into virtue by Act of Parliament. Unless their free wills cooperate, even the law of God is powerless. But let us not forget, that statute law can do much to check evil and promote virtue, and that the Christian community sins against God, if it does not employ the force of the law to suppress the gross exterior manifestations of iniquity, thereby removing, to some extent at least, the occasion of fall from its weaker members, and fostering, indirectly, the practice of virtue. More, probably, it can not do. To this minimum it is obliged by God, in whose name it exercises its delegated authority.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Board of Directors of the Oregon City Public Library has voted to remove the Menace from its reading rooms. For this relief much thanks. But while the returning sinner is always to be received with kindness, a comment on the action of this same Board, which once consented to admit the infamous thing, may not be out of place. One of the functions of a public library is to disseminate truth. Another is to foster the growth of culture in the community. Quite apart from his religion or lack of it, can any man in his senses believe that a sheet which decent governments have barred from the mails, on the ground that it is an agent of immorality, is calculated to promote truth or culture? It is to be noted that one W. S. U'Ren, who is asking the citizens of Oregon to make him their governor, strenuously protested against this belated action of the Board.

Boston has a Metaphysical Club, which apparently puts no bounds to the field of its investigations. Tea, tombs, music and the New Thought, are alike grist for its mill. A recent convocation is thus described:

> The Corporation Counsel discussed, "The New Thought in Civic Force." The music was in charge of Mary De Wolf La Monde, who sang "To You," by Speaks, and "Her Rose," by Coombs. Tea followed. At the next meeting Professor David G. Lyon will speak on "The Most Recent Discoveries at Babylon."

Milton would never have written his severe indictment of metaphysics had he drunk tea with the members of so charming a society; but even he might have been puzzled to find the connection between "The New Thought in Civic Force" and the bricks of Babylon. Macaulay once spoke of some one's mind as characterized by "anfractuosities." The thought-path of the Boston Metaphysical Club seems similarly afflicted.

The University of Leeds has addressed a letter of sympathy to the University of Louvain. The following lines are a translation of the closing paragraph:

> What can a new University add when, sharing in your sorrow, it reviews the long history of an elder and mourning sister? What except those words of encouragement which are ever old and ever new, "Lift up your hearts: In the darkness light shall arise: Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning: Until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts."

Whatever may be our sympathies in the present conflict, regret at the destruction of the University is universal. Louvain, particularly during the last half century, was a centre of light and strength to the Church on the Continent. But when Government policies view with unconcern the destruction of a nobler temple, made in God's own image, what hope is there for orphanages, hospitals and schools?

Much space has recently been given in the press to the statement that the best, in fact the only American, way of educating a boy is to send him to the public school. With this statement Catholics take issue squarely. It is rhetoric, poor rhetoric, uttered to tickle the ears of political groundlings. There is absolutely no proof that, either in scholarship or in patriotism, the Catholic, the Lutheran or the Jewish private school is one whit inferior to the public school, the pampered darling of the State. The Catholic parochial school is a sublime confession of faith in God, made possible by a sacrifice which God alone can fully know, by a people who have little of this world's wealth. Its foundation is God. Its every effort is to put the child in the path that will bring him back to God from whom he came. Its teachers, for the most part, are men and women who for love of God and their fellows, and not for financial considerations, have devoted themselves, heart and soul, to the work of education. A few weeks ago, in a public address, an official of the city of New York, high in authority, stated with pride that it was the highest purpose of the public schools to lead their pupils to economic independence. Be it so. But the Catholic school believes that the man is more than his meat. It believes that education should look beyond the confines of a world bounded by time and space. The Catholic school is not housed in a palace, but it lacks no educational factor of tried value. It is high time to recognize the fact that men, not bricks, a spirit of high endeavor, not lordly piles of marble and bronze, make a school. Let us have definite proof of the inferiority of Catholic schools. Unless this be forthcoming, Catholics will resent, and justly, these cruel and unfounded slurs upon a system which, with the exception of the Catholic Church, is the greatest religious force in American life to-day.

The Chancellor of Ripon and the Vicar of St. Wilfrid's, Harrowgate, have furnished the public with a bit of comedy quite as diverting as anything in the pages of "The Prig." The vicar had applied for leave to place on the walls of his church sundry sculptured representations, ten in number, of the Passion. This was dangerously like the popish Way of the Cross, and permission was refused by the chancellor. The foiled vicar thereupon urged that although these representations might look like, and would commonly be taken for, the Roman Catholic Stations of the Cross, they were really not stations because nobody wanted to "stand" and pray before them. On his part, the chancellor regretted that this very plausible explanation could not be accepted. He did not see how these representations could be anything but Stations of the Cross. But, anxious to temper the wind to the shorn vicar, as the Tablet explains, permission might be granted, if other representations were added to the ten, making it clear that the series did not lend itself to a Catholic devotion. He would suggest such supplementary subjects as the Annunciation, the Transfiguration and the Baptism of the Saviour. The mixture might then pass as distinctively Anglican. Whether the vicar accepted this typically Anglican compromise, or chose to stand upon his right as an Anglo-Catholic to disagree with his ecclesiastical superior, is not disclosed.

"There is less flogging in our great schools than formerly," wrote Dr. Johnson, "but then, less is learned there." The tender-hearted School Board of St. Louis, after a four months' campaign conducted by the Humane Society of that city, has ruled that there shall be no more corporal punishment in the schools, unless the consent of the parents is previously obtained. Hereafter, comments the St. Louis Times, the proceeding will be somewhat as follows:

> DEAR MR. JONES: Your son James needs a whipping. What shall I do? Yours sincerely,
>
> R. R. RITHMETIC, Principal.

Son James, being entrusted with the note, looks it over, and personally writes his own reply, as follows:

> DEAR PROFESSOR: I have looked into the matter, and find that my son James does not need a whipping to-day. Thanking you for calling the matter to my attention, I am,
>
> Yours very truly,
>
> FATHER JONES.

Thus are we to spare the rod and spoil the child, continues the Times, and reduce the work of Dr. Blewett and his corps of sluggers, to that of mere mollycoddles. No one wishes to make our schools Dotheboys Halls, but after all, there is much virtue in the tingle of a good sound spanking. It is the only process which will effect a much-needed readjustment of the point of view in certain small persons, whose skins are more responsive than their budding intellects. But, of course, it should always be the court of last appeal, and the system which can, as far as possible, safely dispense with such a court, will in the long run, prove itself to be of the highest efficiency in educational work.

The greater part of the first page of the Pittsburgh Post for October 12, is devoted to an account of the Holy Name Procession which had taken place on the preceding afternoon.

> "Jesus, Son of God, have mercy on us," chanted the choristers, leading the 40,000 men in the Holy Name parade, yesterday afternoon. "From all evil, O Jesus, deliver us," they sang, continuing the petitions of the Litany. The singers passed, and as their voices died away, there came the tramp of the feet of thousands. All through the afternoon it continued so, until in the weakening light of the sinking sun, all that stood out were the great banners carried by the different delegations.

St. Ignatius who set great store on pilgrimages and similar outward demonstrations of faith, would have been delighted with this modern instance in a busy, twentieth century manufacturing town. The spirit of the movement was eloquently stated by Bishop Regis Canevin:

> To-day's procession is a public declaration of our belief in God, a solemn avowal of our readiness to obey His Holy Law, a testimony of our supreme reverence for His Holy Name, an expression of our abiding faith in the divinity of Jesus Christ, and of our loyalty to Him and our country. It is no ostentatious display, no demonstration of mere numerical strength. It is an act of religion, and we hope that to-day's inspiring spectacle will increase in our hearts the love of God and our neighbor, so that peace and justice and love may everywhere reign.

It will be recalled that outbreaks of anti-Catholic hatred made a similar demonstration inadvisable last year. This bigotry, of course, was never shared by the respectable citizens of Pittsburgh, but the cordial greeting extended by the general public on October 11 to the men of the Holy Name, is a cheering indication of the triumph in Pittsburgh, of the American ideal of fair play.

Mother Janet Erskine Stuart, Superior General of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, and author of a well-known work on the education of girls, died at Roehampton, England, October 21, 1914. Mother Stuart was the granddaughter of the second Earl Castlestewart, male representative of the royal house of Stewart, and daughter of the Rev. Andrew Stuart, a clergyman of the Church of England. She was born in Scotland on November 11, 1857. When at the age of eighteen she began to study the Catholic religion, Mr. Gladstone was one of those most earnest in trying to keep her back. But she was too single-minded and courageous to be daunted by difficulties, and the moment she was fully convinced she asked for baptism. She was received into the Church by Father Gallwey, S.J., in 1880. Two years later she asked admission among the Religious of the Sacred Heart at Roehampton. Her saintly life, joined with her undoubted talent for governing, caused her to be made in 1895, Superioress of all the houses of her Society in England. Mother Stuart first visited America in 1898, in company with the late Superior General, Mother Digby. On August 27, 1911, she was elected Superior General of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, and since the well-known mother-house in the Rue de Varennes at Paris had been confiscated by the French Government, took up her residence in Ixelles, Belgium. An heiress of persecution, it fell to Mother Stuart to guide her Society through troublous times. To her last days of suffering was added sudden exile from her Belgian home, when, with a few of her companions, she was forced to remove hastily from Ixelles to Roehampton. Mother Stuart was a woman whose strong and energetic character was tempered by the sweetness and gentleness which she drew from the Sacred Heart, to whose glory she had devoted her life. A worthy successor to those valiant women who more than a century have governed the Society of the Sacred Heart, the memory of Janet Erskine Stuart will long be treasured by her children in religion, and by the thousands of pupils throughout the world who have been trained to the highest ideals of Christian womanhood in the schools and convents of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

The Greatest Book Offer Ever Made

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE

offer for a limited time to those interested in this practical and progressive movement for the spread of CATHOLIC TRUTH, the opportunity of securing a set of the Knights of Columbus Edition of

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

at extraordinary low prices—which the Committee have secured by the manufacture of a large edition.

It is ever ready to answer your questions immediately, clearly and practically, so that you may turn your information into most effective use.

JAMES A. FLAHERTY,
Supreme Knight.

"The Typical Catholic Layman of America"

"An intelligent laity is the prime need of the Church to-day in America. The battle is opened. It is a flood of contradiction, of misrepresentations, of calumnies. History is perverted; Catholic doctrine is put into lying formulas, Catholic discipline is travestied. When the Church, as seen daily, cannot with safety be assailed, the appeal is to centuries of long ago, more unfamiliar to the reader—to remote lands whence no contradiction may come. The remedy is intelligence of all important matters concerning the Church at home and abroad, intelligence that Catholics be guarded from poisonous inoculation, and be, at the same time, in a position to influence public opinion in favor of truth and justice. The most ready arm is the press: hence the duty of the hour is to give generous support to the Catholic newspaper, to read it, to distribute it, supplementing it, as occasion permits, with magazine and book. One book, the summary of thousands, I especially recommend—The Catholic Encyclopedia."

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND

Catholic Progress and Education

The friends of progress and education will be pleased to learn that a special and cheap edition of THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA is about to be issued under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus. The reduced price and the influence of the Knights will put your "university in print" into the libraries of thousands of new owners, and that will mean an immense spread of enlightenment and increase of definite knowledge on all important subjects pertaining to Christianity. I heartily recommend the enterprise and wish it great success.

(Signed) ✠ REGIS CANEVIN.

14,000 Pages
25,000,000 Words
15,000 Leading Articles
350,000 Subjects
1,543 Writers
153 Revisers, Indexers, and Editorial Assistants

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS EDITION
THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

Fifteen Volumes, Royal Octavo, and Analytical Index Volume, One Half Leather.
Gold tops and Stamping in Gold on back of each volume.

15 Color Plates
356 Full Page Halftones and Engravings
66 Original Maps
2,277 Illustrations in the Text

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA—Knights of Columbus Edition

EASY PAYMENT PLAN

For Cloth binding, the subscriber sends $3.00 with the order, and the sum of $2 each 30 days thereafter until the full sum of $35 is paid.

For the leather binding, the subscriber sends $5 with the order, and the sum of $3 each 30 days thereafter until the full sum of $55 is paid for the complete set.

CASH DISCOUNT PLAN

For the Cloth binding, the subscriber will remit $29 with the order, or on receipt of books.

For the leather binding, the subscriber will remit $49 with the order, or on receipt of books.

THE KNIGHTS of COLUMBUS CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE AM 10-14

16 East Fortieth Street, New York City

Please send me the new Knights of Columbus Edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 volumes, bound in ..... for which I enclose payment of .....

Name..... City.....

Address..... State.....

THESE PRICES OFFERED ONLY FOR A LIMITED TIME

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The MULTIPLEX HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

Important Multiplex Hammond Users

President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River New York, N. Y.

REPRESENTATIVES WANTED!

AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week WANTS

Bright, intelligent men or women in cities and towns to handle its constantly increasing circulation.

Agents do not have to go out of their home towns to do a good business.

WRITE FOR DETAILS—CIRCULATION BUREAU
THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 55 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

ARMY AUCTION BARGAINS

Saddles	$3.00 up	Army Revolvers	$1.65 up
Bridles	.90 "	" B-L Rifles	.98 "
Team Harness	21.85 "	" Swords	.35 "
Leggings, pair	.15 "	" 7 Shot Carbine	3.50 "
Tents	2.85 "	New Uniforms	1.50 "

Colts Cal. 45 Revolver $7.45. Ctgs. 1c each. 15 Acres Government Auction Bargains illustrated and described in 420 large page wholesale and retail cyclopedia catalogue, mailed 25 cents East and 30 cents West of the Mississippi River.

Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases

Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING
DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America

112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

STORIES WITH A SUGGESTION

and other articles suitable for a boy or girl comprises the monthly grist of THE CHILD APOSTLE. It is a children's magazine published in the hope of cultivating unselfishness in the young folks. Your boy or girl will like it. Sample copies free. Fifty cents yearly. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

The Coward Shoe
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

"Made in America"

For nearly half a century, Coward Shoes have been retailed to the American Public.

Coward Shoes are "Made in America" from American leathers and materials, in an American factory, built by American capital, and operated by home workmen.

Every dollar received for Coward Shoes is again circulated in this country, contributing to our National growth and prosperity.

No hard times if ALL insist on U. S. A. products. YOU benefit home industries, protect home labor, and keep money in the land by confining your buying to goods "Made in America."

J. S. Coward

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

FOR THE MAN WHO DOESN'T DRINK

WHY buy insurance where you have to pay the extra risk taken on the life of the drinker, when the

AMERICAN TEMPERANCE LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION
253 Broadway, New York City

can give temperance people the very safest kind of insurance at a cost far below that possible by companies where the membership is promiscuous? A postal card with your age will bring you an interesting proposition and a money saver.

S. WILSON, Secretary Home Office, 253 Broadway, New York

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, OCT., 22

NEW ENGLAND THOUGHT

BY MICHAEL J. MAHONEY, S.J.

The author makes a searching study of "New England's soul," the influence of which on the development of our national character has been so strong. In this number, too, is reprinted Father James J. Daly's excellent paper on "Calvinism and Our Literature," and there is added a short article on "Pragmatism." Those who wonder why Protestantism is disintegrating so rapidly in this country will find the reasons explained in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1906

15. I. Object of Federation. Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D.
II. Divorce. Hon. Daniel J. Kenefick

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
12. Making of a Saint.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
20. The Mass and the Reformation. J. Canon Moyes
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.
12. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. Charles D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocylonometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
18. The Index. Peter Finlay, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box X, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Dramas and Dialogues
By S. M. A.

MARY MAGDALEN
Drama founded on Holy Scripture. Price, 30c.

MARY STUART AND HER FRIENDS
Historical Play for Girls. Price, 30c.

THE EMPRESS HELENA
Historical Play for Girls. Price, 30c.

OUR JAPANESE COUSIN
A Christmas Play for Girls. Price, 25c.

THE STEP-SISTERS
A School Play for Girls. Price, 25c.

THE ARCH OF SUCCESS
A Dialogue for Commencement Day. Price, 25c.
(The preceding six plays may be had bound in one volume entitled, "Mary Magdalen and Other Dramas," for $1.50.)

THE LAST OF THE VESTALS
A Drama of Rome in the time of Constantine. Price, 35c.

AT THE COURT OF ISABELLA
Historical Drama of the time of Columbus. Price, 40c.

THOSE SHAMROCKS FROM IRELAND
A School Play for St. Patrick's Day. Price, 30c.

A PATRIOT'S DAUGHTER
Drama of the American Revolution. Price, 30c.

HOW ST. NICHOLAS CAME TO THE ACADEMY
A Christmas Play for Little Girls. Price, 25c.

CHOOSING A MODEL
A Dialogue for Commencement Day. Price, 30c.

(The last six plays may be had in one volume entitled, "The Last of the Vestals and Other Dramas," for $1.80.)

All plays payable in advance. Express or P. O Money Order preferred. If the payment is by Bank Cheque, 15c. extra should be added to pay the exchange rates.

Address S. M. A.,
St. Mary's Academy, Winnipeg, Man.

CATHOLIC MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

Is prepared to furnish Parochial Schools, Convents, Hospitals, Asylums, Clubs, etc., at the LOWEST RATES and the MOST REASONABLE TERMS. Projecting Machines and strictly censored Films of Religious, Educational, Dramatic, Comic and other subjects.

THIS NEW WORLD WIDE FEATURE of Education and Amusement, PROVIDES a source of REVENUE, far beyond the cost of installing and maintenance.

Let me tell you more about it, also rates, terms, etc.

JOHN J. McGRANE, President,
505 Fifth Avenue, New York City

What Shall I Be?
A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth 30 cents	Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70	12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50	100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

FOR SALE:
A LIBRARY of approximately 4,000 volumes

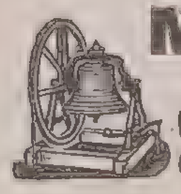
Carefully indexed, about one-half English, one-half German, Catholic authors in the majority, but many standard works, history, travel, etc., well represented. Willing to sell either the German or English portion, preferably both. Price VERY reasonable. Would make an excellent foundation for a parish or private library. Address LIBRARY, AMERICA, 55 E. 83d St., New York.

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

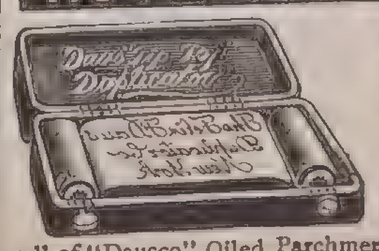
Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)



THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished

GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.



MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

NOTE THE SIMPLICITY

Of making perfect duplicates with the Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator. No intricate mechanism. No printer's ink. Always ready. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Useful in any business. Sent on Ten Days' Trial Without Deposit. Complete Duplicator, cap size, (prints 8 3-4x13 inches). Contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back duplicating surface which can be used over and over again. $5.00

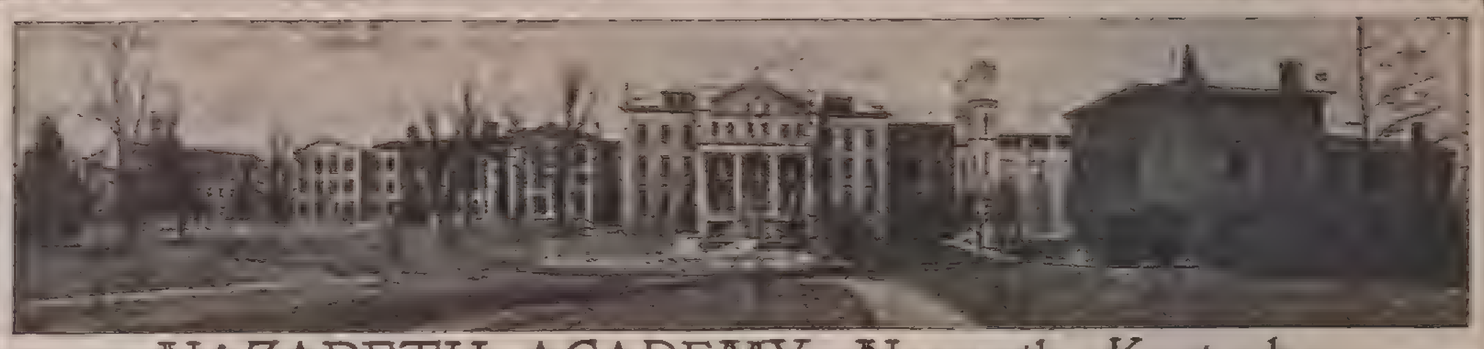
Circular of larger sizes free on request.

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John St., New York.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges



NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown UniversityHospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

COLLEGE OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER
FOUNDED IN 1847

The Alma Mater of numerous prominent ecclesiastics, professional and business men.

XAVIER HIGH SCHOOL
30 West 16th Street, N. Y. City
A SELECT SCHOOL FOR BOYS
Conducted by the Jesuits

Registered by the Regents of the University of the State of New York.

The most accessible school in Manhattan
Near Hudson Tunnels, Sixth Avenue L, Surface Lines and Subway.

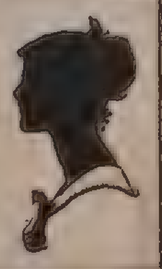
Classical Course. Military Drill under the supervision of a U. S. Army Officer. Rifle Practice. Reading-room and Library. Dramatics. Indoor and Outdoor Games and Sports.

XAVIER GRAMMAR SCHOOL

Offers a four years' course preparatory to High School. Separate building and playgrounds.

Classes will be resumed on Sept. 14

For catalogue, address
REV. THOMAS F. WHITE, S.J.



IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

IT is good to be in a school that is like a big country home—where 300 acres of field and wood call you out of doors, where the things of the mind are the daily talk, and where the associations train you in a thousand little things. 2 hours from Cincinnati. . . . . Write for our little Brown Booklet.

SCHOOL OF THE BROWN COUNTY URSULINES, St. Martin, Brown County, O.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. Terms [illegible] tion with Native Teachers. Gymnasium Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music, and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils

Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance $[illegible] a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law — 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine — Fordham.

School of Pharmacy — Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres.

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher courses preparing College and Post Graduate students. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Memorials of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, beautifully situated

For illustrated booklets, etc.

Address the Sister Directress

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty

One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Mt. St. Mary's College and Academy

PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. College, Academic and Preparatory Courses. Exceptional advantages in Music, Art and Domestic Science.

Address Sister Directress

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

St. Viator College

KANKAKEE, ILLINOIS

Boarding College and High School for Young Men

Limited to 400 Students

Board and Tuition, $150 per annum

Catalogue sent free

Very Rev. J. P. O'Mahoney, C.S.V., President

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

ALTARS IN WOOD AND MARBLE COMPOSITION

THE BERNARDINI STATUARY CO.

28 BARCLAY STREET NEW YORK CITY

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 4
WHOLE No. 291

NOVEMBER 7, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin Oct. 27, p. m.-Nov. 4, a. m.—The Situation in France—German Submarines—The Russian Victories—Turkey—Italy—Austria-Hungary: Russian Persecutions—France: Return of the Government to Paris—Lack of Hospital Facilities. Germany: Satisfaction Expressed by Rome—Royal Service in the Hospitals. Great Britain: Resignation of the First Sea Lord—Kitchener's Volunteers. Ireland: Catholics and Recruiting. Mexico: The Growth of Disorder.....81-84

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Binet-Simon Text in Legislation, I—Mad Homeopathy—Christian Jubilee in Japan—The Young Man and Osteopathy—Catholic Women in Social Work—An Idyl of Age.....85-92

COMMUNICATIONS

One Solution of an Important Question—Italians in the United States—Religious Conditions in Italy—Workers for Real Social Reform—A White List for the Opera.....92, 93

EDITORIALS

"When Friends Fall Out" in Mexico—"The Butterfly Habit"—"The New Reformation of 1914"—Christianity and the War—Real Americans—I have Made up My Mind.....94-97

LITERATURE

Robert Hugh Benson.

REVIEWS: Trees and Other Poems—The Works of Father Frederick Faber—The Red Ascent—Hoof and Claw.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Coming Publications—September's "Best Sellers"—"Vexilla Regis"—Some Books for the Young—"A Soldier of the Legion"—"Little Eve Edgarton"—"Poor Immigrants to America."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....97-101

EDUCATION

Is Johnny Overworked?.....101, 102

SOCIOLOGY

The Law and Lazarus.....102, 103

NOTE AND COMMENT

Orthodox Russians in North America—Statistics of the Society of Jesus—Minimum Wage—Repudiating Know-Nothingism—Difficulty of Collecting Catholic Statistics—Social Pathology in the Public Schools—Death of the Rev. L. L. Conrardy.....103, 104

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—In northeastern France and western Belgium there has been no cessation of the bloody fighting that has marked the high tide of carnage in a struggle of unparalleled casualties. Along the river Yser the little remnant of the Belgian army has been repeating the story of Liège. Retreating from Antwerp they were called on to stay the onrush of the victorious Germans for two days. They have continued to do so for more than ten days, and their dauntless courage has again made them the admiration of the world. Not only have they effectually blocked the advance of General von Beseler, and inflicted on him very severe losses whenever he has tried to move forward, they have had the principal share in forcing a change of plan. No doubt the character of the land with its flooded canals has given them immense advantage of position; the presence of the British warships off the coast and of British marines in the trenches beside them has contributed largely to their success; but when due credit has been given the other Allies, it remains true that if the Germans are still east of Nieuport it has been due mainly to the invincible energy of King Albert's soldiers. He has paid, however, a high price in dead and wounded. The fact that the Kaiser's passage along the Channel has been so far completely checked has not made him desist from the most determined efforts to force his way through. His face, at least so rumor has it, is still set toward Boulogne, and he is prepared to get there at any cost; but it is thought now that he will try to pierce the Allies' line much further south, possibly near Amiens. Up to the present there has been no marked modification of the deadlock, although many successes have been recorded by both sides. In themselves they have not been inconsiderable, but they have produced no important change in the general situation. The line from Nieuport to Arras has yielded to superior local pressure here and there on both sides, so that it has presented a constantly changing though always jagged appearance; but it is practically the same line that it was more than a week ago. Nor is there any likelihood of there being any notable change until many more soldiers can be massed for the attack than are at present concentrated at any one point.

Bulletin, Oct. 27, p. m.-Nov. 4, a. m.

The Situation in France

It is expected that large bodies of German troops will soon be moved from Poland to the Franco-Belgian battlefield, the more so as the invasion of Russian territory by the Germans has proved a failure. Unless this is done there seems to be no prospect whatever of the Germans making progress in the west. Some have thought that a violent effort will again be made at the eastern end of the long line, presumably along the Meuse. Experts are inclined to believe that it has been in the hope of eventually making some such move that the Germans have been maintaining with such sacrifices their precarious position at St. Mihiel, but the persistent rumors of the Kaiser's determination to take Calais at any cost make unlikely any immediate abandonment of the present active assaults on the French left wing. A new development seems to be promised in the recent renewal of activity on the part of German submarines. The warships off the Belgian coast are sufficiently protected it is said by the numerous destroyers that surround them, but the destruction of the British cruiser Hermes in the Strait of Dover points out rather clearly to what a risk any isolated warship will henceforth be exposed. The loss of the cruiser, if judged from a naval standpoint, is by no means serious, as the Hermes was both small and old; but it is an indication of the gravity of the peril which now menaces all British ships even in the immediate vicinity of England.

German Submarines

The German campaign in Poland has proved a failure, at least as far as the invasion is concerned; for in spite of having resumed the offensive for five days of very severe fighting they have again been defeated and again forced to fall back, this time to Lodz, a distance of more than 75 miles from Warsaw. A little to the south, however, in the vicinity of Radom, they have been able to hold their position. It looks as though the Russians would still continue to sweep on and that the Germans would soon be obliged to retire to their own frontier, although it may well be that the Germans have fortified a strong line of defence from Lodz to Kielce, against the day of possible retreat. They did so in France, and it saved them from utter defeat; it is highly improbable that they have neglected to do so in Poland, with the experience along the Marne so fresh in their minds. Their defeat may safely be believed to have been less complete than the Russians have announced, but it has been complete enough to have changed the whole face of the eastern German campaign, and also the prospects of the Austrians. The great bodies of troops that had to be withdrawn from Galicia in order to stem the onrush of the Germans in Central Poland have again been left free to operate against the Austrians, and are seemingly in a fair way to make good their recent losses. It is reported that they have reoccupied Czernowitz and a large portion of Bukowina, and have already begun a movement that may very seriously menace the Austrians who, flushed with their recent advance, have been engaged along the San. It is claimed that a large Russian army is again advancing on Cracow, from Poland, driving the Austrians along the Vistula with the purpose of getting between Cracow and the Austrians in Central Galicia.

The Russian Victories

The most striking part of the week's war news has been the entrance of Turkey into the conflict. It has not come altogether as a surprise; some time ago it seemed inevitable that Turkey would take sides with Germany, and the steadiness with which she has been preparing for such a contingency has lead most people to believe that eventually she would find it impossible longer to preserve her neutrality. What has, however, been something of a shock is the unconventional way in which she has entered upon hostilities. Without official warning of any kind she opened fire on the Russian Black Sea ports, and sunk, besides other ships, three destroyers and one cruiser. To the official protest of the allied powers, Turkey only replied that the action did not have the authorization of the Turkish Government, but was the work of irresponsible individuals, said to be Germans, but she made no offer of reparation. Accordingly Russia and Great Britain have both attacked Turkish territory. It is said that the Allies made every effort to keep peace with Turkey, for her entrance into the war will in all probability involve the whole Mediterranean in the conflict. England especially is trembling for her possessions in Egypt, where she has already declared martial law, and also for her empire in India. Her danger lies not so much from the army of Turkey, as it is said that her forces in both countries are amply sufficient to cope with any troops that Turkey could spare from her operations against Russia, who has already hurried hundreds of thousands of soldiers to the Caucasian Mountains. England's peril lies rather in the fact that she is not sure what her 70,000,000 Mohammedan subjects will do now that she is engaged in war with their coreligionists in Turkey. She is reasonably assured of their loyalty, and yet the growing disaffection in South Africa, which she thought so devoted to her, has given her cause for anxiety lest there be similar developments in Egypt and India. Then there is Greece, who has never been fully reconciled to Turkey, and will certainly not be willing to allow any extension of Moslem power in the Mediterranean. What the rest of the Balkan States will do it is impossible to predict with certainty, but it is clear that they will soon all be feverish with war excitement, since their old enemy has allied herself with Germany. Italy, too, has seen with a good deal of apprehension the failure of diplomatic efforts to dissuade Turkey from entering the struggle. She, too, has many Mohammedan subjects in Africa, who are not at all likely to remain quiet if the rest of their brethren make a strike for freedom. The breach between Austria and Italy has been considerably widened by Italy's seizure of Valona. It is inconceivable that Austria should passively submit to the occupation of this very important menace to their naval and commercial development and safety. As a consequence it has been pointed out that should the prospect of success for the Germans and Austrians loom large, Italy must inevitably face the dilemma of either joining the Allies so as to ensure the defeat of her hereditary foe or else make ready to maintain hold on Valona by force of arms. The probability of her becoming one of the belligerents has, therefore, been much increased. This probability has been further emphasized by the appointment of a new minister of war who is well known to be anti-Austrian, and whose recommendation is his pledge to hurry on the preparations for complete war equipment of the army. It was dilatoriness in this matter which is said to have forced the resignation of his predecessor. The insurrection in South Africa has assumed a much more important character. General De Wet, the veteran commander of the Boers, has placed himself at the head of the rebellion in the Orange Free State and General Beyers has taken charge in the Western Transvaal. That two such leaders should take up arms against England has given a much more serious turn to what promised to be a very minor difficulty. British losses at sea continue to grow. Two warships were put out of commission by the German fleet off Chili, and a submarine was sunk in the North Sea.

Turkey

Italy

Austria-Hungary.—According to Austrian reports the Russians have carried on an organized religious persecution during the present war. Not only has the head of the Uniate Church in Austria, the Greek Catholic Metropolitan of Lemberg, been dragged into Russian captivity, but the Greek Catholic Bishop, Gregory Khomoshin, of Stanislau, Galicia, was driven by the Russians from his see and is now in Hungary. Many priests were made prisoners. According to report the Greek Catholic Union was declared null and void and an attempt was made to impose Russian orthodoxy upon the conquered districts. Die Information writes:

Russian Persecution

> The true adherents of the Greek Church in union with Rome do not of course bow to the jubeo of the Czar; but they must pay with the bitterest persecution and often with life itself for their loyalty. The terrible destruction of religious liberty and the disrespect of the religious convictions of the Ruthenian people will be a historic characteristic of this world-war. Russia, as has often been stated by us, is carrying on a war of pillage and religious bigotry.

The writer hopes that the protest directed to the entire civilized world by the Ukrainian Parliament against these acts of terrorism will find an echo in all hearts that have any regard for religious liberty.

France.—It has been announced that the Government will return to Paris from Bordeaux on November 20, and that Parliament will assemble on December 15, to discuss the passing of emergency measures. While this announcement has not been made officially, little doubt of its truth is expressed. Paris is returning by degrees to normal conditions. Several newspapers, which at the time of the mobilization were forced to suspend publication, have begun to appear once more. The question of reopening the Bourse has been proposed. What is done in this matter will be conditioned, largely, by the action of London and New York.

Return of the Government to Paris

The military authorities have been severely criticised for the lack of proper hospital accommodations in northern France. Many more hospitals must be established, it is urged, in hotels, public buildings and private residences to the rear of the line of battle, and the hurried aseptic surgery, practised, it is said, by "fledgling" doctors should be replaced at once by antiseptic methods. Efforts are being made by the Government to secure surgeons of long experience for the military hospitals, together with a nursing staff which has had several years' at least of experience. According to a Paris newspaper, many of the nurses with the army have little to recommend them but a laudable good will, "which has tried hard to make up in devotion what it lacks in skill and experience."

Lack of Hospital Facilities

Germany.—The Holy Father has expressed his satisfaction to Cardinal Hartmann, Archbishop of Cologne, that through his efforts the German Emperor has given orders that all French priests taken prisoners are to be treated as officers, though compelled to serve in the ranks by their own Government. Filled with ineffable sorrow at the horrors of this war, the Holy Father says that he found great consolation in this act of kindly consideration. He feels persuaded that the Archbishop will extend his charity to all prisoners, and hopes that the example given here will be followed in other countries.

Satisfaction Expressed by Rome

The Emperor's tender consideration for the sick and wounded in the hospitals and his democratic dealings with the soldiers whom he visits in the field and trenches are traits which have evidently been inherited by the young princes. A Sister of Mercy thus writes of two of the members of the imperial house:

Royal Service in the Hospitals

> Prince Oscar and Prince August, sons of our Emperor, visited our hospital during these days. We were introduced to them as the first German Sisters. They were exceedingly kind to us and likewise in particular to the poor wounded soldiers. They helped us put them into bed, soften their straw pillows, carry the mattresses, and the like. They knelt down by the side of the dying, wrote letters home for them, and helped wherever they could. God's richest blessings upon these sons of the Emperor and upon the whole royal house!

Great Britain.—Prince Louis of Battenberg has resigned as First Sea Lord, a post which bears the same relation to the navy as that of Commander in Chief does to the army. His resignation was followed by his appointment as member of the Privy Council. On account of his Austrian birth, Prince Louis has been made a target by certain "yellow" journals of wide circulation, and unfortunately, some influence with the mob. "Prince Louis is a sensitive man as well as a brave and loyal officer," says the London News, "and he has thought fit to offer himself as a sacrifice to this silly and cowardly campaign." The News just stops short of characterizing the incident as a national disgrace, but the Morning Post, while expressing its appreciation of the loyalty and great services of the Prince, considers it "more fitting that, in time of war, the highest position in the English navy be held by an officer of English birth." Prince Louis has been succeeded by Lord Fisher of Kilverstone, "a man," says the Times, "who more than any other is the creator of the British battle fleet of to-day." Lord Fisher was born in 1841, entered the navy at the age of thirteen, and since 1905 has been Admiral of the Fleet.

Resignation of the First Sea Lord

Kitchener's Volunteers

Lord Kitchener's volunteer army is approaching the million mark, nor, as interested reports will have it, has this army been recruited from the hulks. The best men in the Kingdom, says the Catholic Times, are joining it, as the empty halls of Cambridge and Oxford bear witness. The precise number recruited has not been made public, but it has been estimated at nearly seven hundred thousand. All are undergoing a rigid training in the military camps. Lord Kitchener intends to take no chances by sending untrained soldiers to the front.

Ireland.—The Bishops, meeting at Maynooth, passed resolutions deploring the destruction of Louvain, the seminary of Ireland in the Penal days, and ordering parish collections for Belgian sufferers. These have been generously contributed, and besides a large number of Belgian refugees have been well provided for. Reports from Irish soldiers captured by the Germans show they have been well treated. The Bishops' condemnation of the British Government for refusing to supply a sufficiency of Catholic chaplains at the front was repeated at the annual meeting in Dublin of the Catholic Truth Society. Cardinal Logue pointed out, in connection with the Government's suggestion that French chaplains would suffice, that the wounded in French hospitals had to sign a formula requesting the services of a priest, making it difficult for French and impossible for Irish soldiers to secure spiritual aid. The Irish prelates at both meetings, and all other Irish speakers, abstained from reference to recruiting or pronouncements on the war, and the principal speaker, Dr. Keane, O.P., said the war that concerned Ireland was that which the King of Heaven called on her to wage against irreligion, indifference and immorality, and pernicious literature which was the propaganda of Satan. Cardinal Logue said the War Office had requested him to appoint Chaplains for the army in Ireland, which did not need them, but not for the Irish-soldiers at the front who did. Already hundreds of Irish priests have volunteered their services, but they were refused by the War Office, which has respected the religious prejudices of its Indian troops against beef and pork, by supplying them with goats. This, with the War Office's denial to Mr. Redmond of the facilities it afforded to the Carson forces, has made recruiting meagre, despite the appeals of some Nationalist M.P's.

Catholics and Recruiting

Mexico.—The one outstanding fact in news from Mexico is that anarchy reigns in that distracted land. Papers that up to this had carefully suppressed all unfavorable reports have become outspoken concerning conditions. The Army and Navy Journal says:

The Growth of Disorder

Reliable advices indicate that virtual anarchy prevails in Mexico City. There is such a disturbance in the Mexican capital that well-informed authorities on Mexican affairs would not be surprised to hear that wholesale outrages had already been committed in the city. So far a strict censorship has kept all of the details of the disturbances in the Mexican capital from publication in this country, but without making any special effort to secure an account of what is happening there the State Department has a full realization of the dangers threatening.

The New York Sun adds:

The present state of affairs is regarded as just as bad as could be imagined, it is felt here, and officials see little prospect of improvement. For one thing, the American forces will remain at Vera Cruz indefinitely until the pledges required are forthcoming from whatever authority exists in Mexico City.

Meanwhile the convention of Aguascalientes is still indulging in oratory and decrees of deposition. Villa and Carranza have both been "decreed" out of power. Villa refuses to be shorn of authority before Carranza; Carranza refuses to be shorn at all; both are mustering troops in preparation for a new struggle. The situation has become extremely critical. The "First Chief" refuses to guarantee the demands of the United States and as a consequence our troops will remain in Vera Cruz. Under the circumstances perhaps this is for the best. American refugees state that Carranzistas have been active, taking a census of all people in Vera Cruz, against whom their "Chief" has, should have or should have had a grudge; six prominent Mexicans are on trial in Mexico City for complicity in the murder of Madero; and despatches relate that the American manager of the El Rio mine has just been released from prison on the payment of $40,000 ransom. Property and lives are held in low estimate indeed. A "process of law" providing for the confiscation of property has come to hand from Mexico City. It should be styled a "process of robbery." No title is safe under its stupid provisions. The Church is entirely crippled. Bishops are in exile; at last reports all seminaries were closed except one; whole sections of the country are without priests; schools are abolished, and the Sacraments are barred in very many places. In a speech delivered in Waterbury, Conn., Senator Weeks, of Massachusetts, said in part:

In return for all that we have done for these so-called Constitutionalists, what has been their attitude in return? Carranza sent an insulting note to our Government upon the seizure of Vera Cruz; neither he nor his generals have given any attention whatever to complaints on account of the murder of Americans and foreigners within the jurisdiction which he controlled. Especially is this true of the Cumber tunnel fire, where at least eight Americans were blown up; in the Benton murder, where an English citizen was killed; in expelling Spaniards from Torreon and in the murder of Catholic priests.

At the moment of printing news arrived that the Aguascalientes conference elected Guterriez President for twenty days. Carranza remains defiant. Villa pretends to be pleased. A savage war may be expected at any time.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Binet-Simon Test in Legislation

I

A great American humorist who was in many ways a profound philosopher, as all true humorists must be, once said that "It would be much better not to know so many things, than to know so many things that are not so." That particular humorist was very careful not to say that it was better not to know much. This is the day of knowledge of many things, and unfortunately, the knowers of many things are deeply intent in our generation in applying their very limited knowledge to some of the deepest problems of humanity. They are quite convinced that they are the only ones who have ever seriously thought about them, or at least, that ours is the first generation that ever approached these problems properly, and just as sure that we are going to solve them without ado or delay.

After having concentrated for a time on sex education and sex hygiene and various phases of eugenics, a great many educators now are taking up the knotty problems involved in the care of defective children. Unwarned by previous, even recent, experiences which show how much harm haste in these subjects may do, some are intent on legislation inchoate, hurried, quite unscientific though it may be, to solve all the problems connected with this difficult subject. Western legislatures are being urged to institute the Binet-Simon test by law so as to determine all the defective children there may be, and make special State provision for them. Such legislation will create a number of new inspectorships and examiners' places, that, of course, can only be fitted by "properly trained experts." These experts are then to apply the Binet-Simon test and their words are to be law. Now the Binet-Simon test is excellent, so far as it goes, but it has great limitations, is still distinctly on trial, is being constantly modified by its inventors and requires at least as much knowledge and experience as its inventors possess, in order to apply it properly. Even the inventors warn about the necessity for individuation and for recognizing how much the personality of the examiners as well as the patients or subjects count in making decisions.

The story of the Binet test, as it is often called, is rather interesting. In 1904, an educational measure in Paris required the selection of all the mentally defective children in the public schools to be made by means of individual examinations. As there was no definite method of making such an examination, Alfred Binet, the author of a series of books on psychology, and especially on phases of dual personality, assisted by Theodor Simon, also interested in psychology, took up the problem of creating a method of examination, and laid down rules for standardizing a scale of tests. To do this, selected groups of average pupils of the public schools, ten each of the ages three to seven, and fifteen each of the ages seven to twelve, were examined. A standard scale of intellectual attainments, mental development, alertness of mind, or whatever it may be called, was thus obtained. As a devotee has put it, "a hierarchy of tests, arranged in the order of their increasing difficulty was thus secured" and was published in L'Année Psychologique in 1905. This was afterwards adapted to the diagnosis of feeble-minded children, in order to determine whether they were idiots, imbeciles or morons. The idiot is a defective child that never reaches the plane of spoken language; the imbecile understands spoken language and sometimes can talk rather glibly but usually not quite sensibly, except with regard to very simple matters, while the moron, or high-grade imbecile, besides being able to talk, can read and write. Idiots, according to the Binet-Simon scale, have minds that practically never develop beyond the age of one or two years. The imbeciles have a mentality corresponding to the age groups from three years to seven. The morons belong in mind to the age groups from eight to twelve, though the feeble-minded do not apparently progress beyond the twelve-year level of average intelligence.

After using these tests and the scale for three years, it is not surprising that the authors should have revised it as the result of further experimental work. If it is recalled that only a little more than a hundred children, altogether, were examined in order to make the standardization, its comparatively small value as an induction can be understood. These were Paris children of the poorer class, and influenced in many ways by their Paris environment. In 1908, the first revision of the scale appeared. Three years later, in 1911, what has been called the final revision of the scale was published. This appeared also in L'Année Psychologique and in the French Bulletin of the Free Society for the Psychological Study of The Child under the title, as it has been translated, of "A Method of Measuring the Development of the Intelligence of Young Children." This translation has been published by the Courier Company of Lincoln, Illinois, and can be readily obtained.

Binet and Simon suggest a series of questions to be put to the children of the various years, and then from the answers judge of the child's intelligence. At three years for instance the child is asked to point out its nose, eyes and mouth, to repeat two digits, to give its family name, to enumerate the objects in a picture, and to repeat a sentence of six syllables. That is the whole test. At four years, it is asked to give its sex, to name a key, knife and penny when shown, to repeat three digits and to compare two lines. At ten years, it is asked to arrange five weights in order, to copy drawings from memory, criticize absurd statements, to show understanding of certain difficult questions of which examples are given, and to use three given words in two sentences. At fifteen years, the child is asked to repeat seven digits—what a test for those of us who fail to catch four digits of a telephone number?—to give three rhymes, to repeat a sentence of twenty-six syllables, to interpret a picture, to solve a problem from several facts.

Evidently there is no mystery about any of these things, nor on the other hand is there any marvelous criterion of intelligence. Unless such a test is applied, first with the most careful attention to what the child's environment has been, with due and attentive knowledge of any physical pathological conditions that may be present hampering the acquisition of information, and above all with common sense, serious mistakes may be made. As a matter of fact both psychologists and psychiatrists, that is the men of years of training in the study of the mind and of mental disease, complain that, as crudely applied at the present time by many so-called "experts," these tests are most unreliable. They lead to a jumping to conclusions quite beyond our real knowledge. Physicians, particularly, are growing very tired of this rushing into conclusions which have to be taken back afterwards.

I could quote some very serious mistakes that have been made by so-called experts in the application of these Binet-Simon tests, in which, owing to the laws making expert decisions final, or very difficult of review, wrongs of no little consequence have been done individuals. Such cases are, however, rather for medical journals than a popular weekly. The one thing that should be impressed upon every one just now, with regard to such matters, is how little we really know. Ignorance, coupled with assumption of knowledge, makes men ridiculous. Professor Bateson, the President of The British Association for The Advancement of Science, in his last annual address, suggested that the United States was making herself an excellent field for experimentation for other countries to watch; mainly with the idea of knowing what not to do. He thought that "eugenic regulation of marriage on a comprehensive scale, as suggested in America, is devised without regard to the needs either of individuals or of a modern state." We are thus making a laughing stock of ourselves for the world by our pretense of knowledge and hasty application of half-baked principles, some of which will never get baked.

Miss Elizabeth Farrell in the Introduction to the book on "The Backward Child" written by Barbara Morgan, whose long experience well befits her to have an opinion in this matter and gives her the right to express it, says:

> The teacher of some day will look back upon us as we look back upon the sooth-sayers and astrologers of a much earlier time. As they did, so are we doing, ladling out our notions and our cure-alls. As they treated, all bad health was alike; so generally speaking is our treatment of all mental defects the same. . . . The teacher of the future, not too far distant, will want to know, not that the child is backward, but in what area of his mental functioning he is strong and where weakness dominates. She will want to know how he is to be trained; what sense-appeal to make; she will ask that an educational prescription be given her, to save her own strength and to conserve the pupil's self-respect.

That prescription can only be given by some one who knows not a little, but a great deal about the child. Not by some one who comes in and gives a ready-made test in a few minutes, but by an experienced and above all sympathetic common-sense individual. Old Dr. Parry of Bath said long ago: "It is much more important to know what sort of an individual has a disease than what sort of a disease the individual has." Professor Osler said some time since that this still remains true even with all our advance in medicines. It is eminently true with regard to mental states, and hasty decisions made by readily applied tests that are being revised every three years by a final revision each time, are not likely to be helpful unless very carefully applied. Legislation that would impose them in the present state of our knowledge, or rather of our ignorance, would be likely to do infinitely more harm than good

J. J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

Mad Homeopathy

Most of the self-constituted social doctors to-day are homeopaths gone mad. It is, I believe, a well established rule in both the great schools of medicine that at times "like cures like." Typhoid germs cure typhoid. Smallpox germs cure smallpox. This rule is the war cry of the homeopaths; it has only been adopted in special instances by the allopaths. By far the greater number of physicians would not admit that it was a good rule at all times and for all cases. But even if it were, it needs a special interpretation. The homeopathic dose is famous for its minuteness.

Our worthy social doctors, on the contrary, are not by any means famous for the smallness of their evil doses. If they see commercial power concentrated in a few hands under capitalism, they prescribe a still further concentration under a despotic social beaurocracy. If they see the dishonest rich robbing the honest poor, they would cure the trouble by having the dishonest poor rob the still dishonest rich. Perhaps they think two dishonest classes will make one single honest populace. This is something like the exploded theory of the militarists that if you are constantly threatening war you will always have peace. But another way, it would mean that if two men are ready to cut each other's throats, they will soon decide it is better to shake hands and pretend to love each other. Unfortunately we know that when weapons are once drawn, the fight generally continues to the end.

Hot tea may seem to cool you on a warm day; but scalding tea will surely shrivel your palate. That is one important fact to remember. Another equally important fact is this: if you are warm, it will do you no good to have someone else drink the hot tea. There are two ways, then, to misuse the homeopathic formula. If you are a homeopath, you can go mad in two ways. Most of the social doctors have gone mad in both ways at once.

For example, to substitute for the comparatively large number of business concerns with the very large number of directors in each, the concentrated power of a beauro-cracy is actually to scald the social palate. On the other hand, to try to cure the dishonesty of the rich by making the poor dishonest too, is to give hot tea to the wrong man. Yet this is precisely what the social doctors, who are practising without a license, do at present. They either try to cure by a worse poison than the original disease, or they treat those who have no disease to cure.

The number of these quack doctors is legion, and they are the first persons to whom the couriers of the Catholic Church must carry her message. You will find them everywhere. Some are writers. Their theories sound violent and in consequence sell well. You will not always find the writers sincere. Their temptation to make a "good thing" of their theories is too great. But if you do find them sincere, they are the most in need of your message, for they reach the largest number of people.

You will also find many sincere ministers guilty of this social malpractice. They are carried away by enthusiasms. Often they are not men of great mental force. Rather, they are conspicuous for their human sympathy, for their eagerness to do something, though they are not quite sure what to alleviate, and for their powerlessness, as unguided individuals, to resist the fads of the day. From their very weakness and earnestness they can do a world of harm. Thousands of people look to them for guidance, and accept their teachings.

Then, too, there are men and women of a leisured society who find an outlet for their somewhat ineffectual philanthropy in supporting the writers and the ministers. These people are scarcely more than the directing boards of the quack hospitals, or, at the very most, medical assistants. It is they who furnish the money for the playwrights and the livings for the fashionable ministers, or who support slum parishes to further the work of poisoning. They are not malicious; they are only inept. They have little or no originality, and so must pose as patrons of the popular idols. A very special method has to be used in delivering the message of the Church to such people.

Last of all come the persons who receive the most blame and deserve the least. Theirs is the disagreeable task of administering the scalding tea. I mean the men of the poorer classes whom ignorance and the words of educated writers and ministers and society dilettantes have driven to despair. I do not mean the actual Labor leaders. They can be classed usually among the writers. Some of them are malpractitioners; some are not. The men I mean are the middle-men of the various Labor parties, those of them who have become infected by the poison through a combination of unfortunate causes. Perhaps their individual experience with capital has been hard. Their employer may have been dishonest. Being both miserable and credulous they have listened with a great mental thirst to every promise of better times, however shadowy, which their mental betters have held out to them.

These middle-men whose allotted task it is to preach the gospel of hatred to those who already hate too much, or the gospel of dishonesty to those who are honest, these middle-men, I say, are the most to be pitied of all the grades of quack social doctors. To carry the message of the Church to such men is a splendid task. They are already eager for it. If they act directly against it now, it is only because, being virile, and impetuous, they must find an escape for their energy. Take them the message of the Church, and you will find them like children. Fail to make the message reach them, and the poison will make them beasts.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

Christian Jubilee in Japan

St. Patrick's Day, 1915, will have a special significance for the Catholic Church in Japan. The anniversary of the great apostle of Ireland is also the anniversary of one of the most memorable events in the ecclesiastical history of the Farthest East. On March 17, 1915, fifty years will have elapsed since the discovery of the faithful descendants of that race of martyrs converted to the Faith by St. Francis Xavier and his successors; of those heroic souls, who notwithstanding the most relentless persecution known in history, retained their faith and practised it in secret, and whose children constitute today the bulk of the Catholics of Japan. A brief summary of the events of fifty years ago may be of interest to Catholics the world over.

The prelude, as it were, of the great happening of March 17, 1865, had taken place not quite a month before, when on February 19 the first church built to honor the then recently canonized Japanese martyrs was dedicated in Nagasaki, the scene of their martyrdom. It was not the first church reopened in Japan, for the Church of the Sacred Heart in Yokohama antedates it by three years; but the solemnity of this dedication and the historical associations of the locality triumphantly marked the end of the bloody persecution and the dawn of a new era for the Catholic Church in the island empire. The Church of the Martyrs, the cathedral of the diocese of Nagasaki, looks down upon the land-locked harbor and is a conspicuous object from the ship at anchor in that beautiful bay. It must have been an imposing sight on that Sunday morning in February, 1865, when the men-of-war of all the nationalities which at that time had treaty relations with Japan, were assembled at Nagasaki, to take part in the celebration. Prominent among all were the war ships of the United States which had been the first to reopen the Nippon Empire. The commanders and part of the staff of each vessel, in full dress uniform, each with a guard of honor, took part in the dedication ceremony. A French battery drawn up in front of the sacred edifice fired a salute, the Russian naval band furnished the music. It was, no doubt, the great solemnity of this celebration, which was noised abroad and aroused the attention of the ancient Christians in out-of-the-way country places, that led to their making inquiries and brought them in contact with the successors of their former pastors.

A few weeks later, at noon, Friday, March 17, Father Petitjean, who had charge of the church, noticed a group of some fifteen men, women and children, crowding about the locked portal of the church. He approached and asked them if they wished to see the building. Upon their affirmative reply he led them to the high altar and whilst he was kneeling for a moment in adoration, one of the women drew near and whispered in his ear: "All of us here have the same heart as you." In surprise, the missionary exclaimed: "Who are you? Where do you come from?" The woman replied: "We are from Urakami [a village some two or three miles inland from the city, where at present the most magnificent church edifice in Japan is nearing completion]; there almost all have the same heart." Before Father Petitjean knew what to answer, the woman continued: "Where is the venerable picture of Sancta Maria?"

We may imagine the surprise of the good Father to hear the Latin name of the Blessed Virgin from the lips of a Japanese peasant woman. These must be descendants of the ancient Christians; the thought struck him with such overwhelming force that for a time he was speechless. He merely pointed to the side altar with the statue of Our Lady and the Infant Jesus. They all crowded about it, knelt down and for some time carefully contemplated the picture of Mother and Child. And then the ice of reserve and reticence was melted, men and women exclaimed: "Yes, it is Sancta Maria. Behold in her arms on ko Jesu sama, the august Child, the Lord Jesus."

Veneration of the Blessed Mother of God was for these simple people the first indication that they had found the Church of their forefathers. They began to tell the missionary of their ancient traditions, how they had been told that on the 25th of the first winter month the Lord Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary in a stable; that they had a sacramento, called baptisma (the ancient missionaries had adapted the Latin religious terms to the Japanese pronunciation); that they never allowed a child to die without that sacrament; that one of their number was specially appointed to administer the sacrament and that at the time of baptism each one received the name of a santo.

There was no doubt that these people had retained a great part of Catholic tradition, weakened and in part disfigured as their further revelations disclosed, but sufficient to mark them distinctly as Catholics. Parts of prayers like Ave Maria, Pateru Nosteru, even the Confiteor had been handed down from generation to generation. They knew that the first day of the week was called Domingo, that every year a time of penance called Kuwarezuma (quadragesima) was followed by the feast of pasuka (pascha, Easter) to commemorate the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. "Have you also these feasts?" they asked the Father. Upon his answering in the affirmative, the further question was: "Do you know the King of the Great Doctrine? We have been told by our ancestors that in the West, in a great city called Roma there lives the King of the Great Doctrine which they learned from saserudote (priests) sent by him. What is his name?"

Father Petitjean saw at once that they referred to the Holy Father. "Certainly I know him," he replied; "his name is Pius; it is he who has sent me to you. He will be greatly rejoiced to hear about you." At these words joy and contentment was visibly depicted on the countenances of those good people; they could no longer harbor any doubt that they saw before their eyes the lawful successor of those by whom their forefathers had been instructed. They spread the news among their fellow-villagers, thousands of Christians were found where nobody suspected their existence, and the temporary persecution and exile that many had to undergo in the early seventies did not in the least slacken their ardor or shake the firmness of their convictions. By far the greatest part of the Catholics of the diocese of Nagasaki are descendants of those ancient heroes of the Faith, and entire villages and some smaller islands are almost exclusively Catholic.

No doubt, the fiftieth anniversary of this auspicious event will be fittingly celebrated in Nagasaki and the whole of Japan. Presumably the magnificent church of Urakami, erected on the site of the former tribunal, where many of those who, in 1865, had declared their Christian affiliation were tortured and condemned, will be completely finished by that time, and furnish a setting worthy of the celebration.

May the prayers of the entire Catholic world on that occasion supplicate the Throne of Mercy that a new era of grace and prosperity may come to the much-tried Japanese mission. However much the Japanese may appreciate the self-sacrificing character of the Catholic missionary, few of them feel called to investigate the claims of Catholic truth. Modern skepticism and indifferentism are systematically inculcated at most of the higher seats of learning. Popular literature is apt to sneer at all supernatural religion. Their own ancestor worship and time-honored traditions are considered by most Japanese as fully sufficient for their needs and quite as good as imported doctrines. To make them realize that religion means subjection to God, His revelation, and His commandments, is a most difficult task, and one that will depend for its success, above all else, on the silent workings of the Holy Spirit to be invoked by our prayers.

May the prayers of American Catholics who have shown themselves so generous to us in our struggles never fail us in the work which we are striving to do for God and His Church!

Tokyo, Japan. VICTOR F. GETTELMAN, S.J.

The Young Man and Osteopathy*

In suggesting this vocation to the earnest young man, I would do so sincerely recognizing its worth now, and anticipating its possibilities in the future. It is a comparatively new and independent system of therapeutics, the first school having been founded by Doctor Andrew Taylor Still, formerly of the so-called Allopathic persuasion, in the little town of Kirksville, Mo., twenty-two years ago. The first class consisted of sixteen students, and the course was for four months. To-day we have upwards of fifteen hundred students enrolled in our schools which are legally recognized, and the course now is for a period of three years of nine months each in all the colleges except Philadelphia which demands a term of four years of eight months.

The following is a comparison of subjects taught by Association of Medical Colleges and Osteopathic Colleges:

MEDICAL COLLEGES	OSTEOPATHIC COLLEGES
Histology	Histology
Embryology	Embryology
Osteology	Osteology
Anatomy	Anatomy
Physiology	Physiology
Chemistry and Toxicology	Chemistry and Toxicology
Materia Medica	Principles of Osteopathy
Pharmacology	Osteopathic Mechanics
Therapeutics
Bacteriology	Bacteriology
Pathology	Pathology
Medical Zoology
Clinical Microscopy	Clinical Microscopy
Physical Diagnosis	Physical Diagnosis
	Osteopathic Diagnosis
Practice of Medicine	Practice of Osteopathy
Surgery	Surgery
	Applied Anatomy
Obstetrics	Obstetrics
Gynecology	Gynecology
Pediatrics	Pediatrics
Eye and Ear	Eye and Ear
Nose and Throat	Nose and Throat
Mental and Nervous Diseases	Mental and Nervous Diseases
Electro-Therapeutics	Electro-Therapeutics
Genito-Urinary Diseases	Genito-Urinary Diseases
Dermatology and Syphilis	Dermatology and Syphilis
Hygiene and Public Health	Hygiene and Public Health
Dietetics	Dietetics
Medical Jurisprudence	Medical Jurisprudence

After graduation, our examinations for permission to practice are under State supervision, and the certificates granted give us similar rights and impose similar responsibilities as in the case of other physicians in almost every state of the Union. This progress could not have been made if our methods had not been legitimate, our teachings sound, our practitioners qualified, and our results evident. As any profession or even industry, must be built up by experience, so every year our study is, not so much improved upon, as elaborated, the original thought still being predominant.

Doctor Still was a philosopher, a reasoning thinker, a student of nature and her ways, and an intelligent and educated man. He started out with the truth, that nature is complete, physically perfect (notwithstanding some magazine articles to the contrary), and that if we have a normal structure, in normal environment, health must reign; that any deviation from this condition must result in interference with the proper functional workings of nature, thus producing a lessened resistance and a liability to allow the ever attacking germs to find a desirable place to grow. Until such abnormalities are adjusted, nature can not throw off the disease, and internal medication will only change the symptom, and not the cause. When this startling yet reasonable theory was offered by Dr. Still to his medical brethren he was looked upon by some, sympathetically, as a visionary, and by others as a revolutionist. Outside and adverse opinion, however, did not abort the birth of osteopathy as a new science.

The theories of yesterday are the facts of to-day. Thousands upon thousands of the proofs of the efficacy of our work are energetic enthusiasts. Many invalids who came to our clinics discouraged, found relief, enrolled at our school, and faced the world in a few years with a diploma, health, and a message of hope to others. At the present time we have the following recognized colleges teaching osteopathy: American School of Osteopathy, Kirksville, Missouri; College of Osteopathic Physicians and Surgeons, Los Angeles, California; Chicago College of Osteopathy, Chicago; Central College, Kansas City, Kansas; Still College of Osteopathy, Des Moines, Iowa; Massachusetts College of Osteopathy, Cambridge, Massachusetts; Philadelphia College of Osteopathy, Philadelphia.

With all our schools, all our students, and graduates, we can not supply the demand. There are only seven thousand osteopaths scattered over the United States as compared to one hundred and fifty thousand medical practitioners, hence the opportunity for competent men and women. I understand that letters are coming in very frequently to the heads of the various schools (I have seen some on the bulletin boards myself) from prominent men asking for an osteopath for their particular towns, and in many cases offering a year's office rent free as an inducement. Does this demand occur in any other profession? Many thriving towns which support a dozen medical practitioners are without a single osteopath. These facts are not intended to lead my readers to believe that every osteopath is making a success. There are always cases in every profession of a square peg in a round hole.

To sum up, the student who has had the necessary educational requirements (at least a four years' High School course), has studied conscientiously, applied himself thoughtfully to his work, has the strong moral character so essential to success, has the determination to do things after he has thought them, will feel proud to belong to this most promising new profession and to help in the great work of relieving the world's sufferings.

The pioneer work which is open to the young energetic person is unlimited. Our disciples are in many foreign countries. We have twenty osteopaths in London, and Birmingham, Bournemouth, Brighton, Liverpool and Manchester have each a few; Ireland has two, Scotland fifteen, Paris has two. Canada is represented by about two hundred, and we find our brethren pushing ahead in Germany, Sweden, British West India, Argentine Republic, British East Africa, West Africa and Honolulu; yet the foreign field is practically untouched and offers unheard of possibilities for ambitious young graduates.

*The nineteenth of a series of vocational articles.

Atlantic City, N. J. J. S. LOGUE, D.O.

Catholic Women in Social Work

It may be admitted, without apology or self-condemnation, that the great body of Catholic women, whether in Europe or America, have been slow to enter into any of those movements of the present day which have a tendency to withdraw woman from the domestic circle, and thrust her into the lime-light of publicity.

The Catholic woman, conservative both by training and heredity, shrank from whatever might be construed as forcing herself into the arena of politics. As a consequence, a movement, wide and deep and far-reaching, has developed in which Catholic women have taken slight interest, and in which they have been practically unrepresented. Nevertheless, this movement has continued to gather strength and momentum until it has become an element to be reckoned with among the forces of this restless age. Ancient usage and long-established precedents have been broken down, and new avenues for the ambition and activities of woman have been opened up. A German Catholic paper has summed up the woman's movement as, "the recognition, cultivation and development of the feminine individuality, with the ultimate view of the widest extension of her beneficent influence on present and future generations, the most perfect realization of the feminine and through it of the spiritual and human ideal."

German bishops were first among the hierarchy to discern that the activity of lay women, when properly directed, is an ever-growing power for good which should be enlisted in the cause of the Church; and they have, therefore, given their cordial encouragement to the formation of women into associations for the purpose of working at the solution of social questions of the day according to Catholic principles. This work had been hitherto left principally, if not wholly, in the hands of men and women who were agnostics or else members of Protestant churches. This circumstance has had a weighty effect upon those whom the movement sought to reach, since much of the work has been accomplished by a Protestant or anti-Christian propaganda. The awakening, however, though long delayed, has come at last. The first book upon the woman's question was by the German Redemptorist, Father Rassler, in 1895, and it was received with indifference and even with ridicule; but the meeting of the International Council of Women at Berlin in 1904 jarred the German Catholics from their apathy. They began to realize what they had lost for the want of organization. The intense anti-Christian spirit of the organization excited apprehension, and with very good reason. Of the two hundred who took part in proceedings of the convention, only four were Christians, and but one was a Catholic; all the rest were infidels or agnostics. It was quite enough to make thinking people sit up and begin to take notice. Professor Mausbach, Professor of Theology at the University of Münster, pointed out to the Catholics that the achievements of women as represented at this Congress demanded attention from the whole world. Thus encouraged, the German Catholic women determined to organize and bring into the field the influence of religion in their work. This was the beginning of the Frauenbund (Women's Association), which has accomplished so much for the Church and society in the ten years of its existence. It is modelled upon the Volksverein, and has had at its back that magnificent body of men who compose the Centre party in the Reichstag. Besides Professor Mausbach, Father Auerbacher, a Capuchin, and Father Cathrein, a Jesuit, were powerful advocates of the Catholic woman's movement, and lent their aid in directing it into the right channels. The work done in Germany, where the Catholic woman's movement originated, not only shows what can be done by organization, stimulated by zeal for the faith, but also emphasizes the necessity of such organization, if American women are to do their part in saving morals and religion at home. Happily our women are awakening to the situation. Associations are springing up in most of our large cities, and the recognition given to women at the National Conferences of Catholic Charities, at their biennial sessions in Washington, shows the change that has come over public sentiment within a few years past, and how cordially the Church authorities in the United States have welcomed women into their councils. It is a fact freely commented upon by the secular press, that the trend of the woman's movement to-day in the United States is toward infidelity and emancipation from the restraints of morality. Many of the leaders openly advocate free love and the abolition of what they term "the bondage of the marriage tie"; and these loose ideas of morality are propagated by them in their literature and from the platform.

In view of these conditions Catholic women can not remain aloof from social movements without neglecting a great opportunity to infuse into them Catholic ideas and Catholic morals, and in this way help to realize the aim of our late Pontiff, the great Pius X, "to renew all things in Christ." There is no question of our ability to put into this field trained women, intellectually the equals, and spiritually the superiors, of those who for more than two decades have been shaping the thoughts and beliefs and aspirations of vast numbers in our own country and in Europe. Catholic women are needed to fight the growing tendency toward paganism in the home and in society. A single instance of this will illustrate this point. At a "Mothers' Congress" held in Seattle a few months ago, and at which there was an attendance of nearly a hundred women, ostensibly assembled in the interests of the children and the home, there were discussions, more or less profound, on many subjects. Resolutions on diverse matters, from endorsing the teaching of sex-hygiene and eugenics in the classroom to prohibiting smoking on the street cars, were passed unanimously; but of the cancer of divorce which is destroying the homes of the land, corroding the vitals of society, and filling the asylums, juvenile courts, and ultimately the penitentiaries with the unfortunate offspring of divorced parents, not a word was uttered. The crime of race suicide was also unmentioned. This is curious in view of the declared aim of the congress, viz.: "The welfare of the child and the conservation of the home." Now does anybody suppose those omissions would have been possible if a few representative Catholic women had been present, or even one, who would have discussed those questions from the standpoint of Catholic morals? The amount of lasting good to be done on occasions such as that alluded to is simply incalculable. The teaching of the Church is definite on all the social and moral problems which trouble our day; and in the discussion of all the vexed questions there is need for the Catholic woman with her positive religious convictions and her clearer vision of things spiritual.

M. JOHNSTON.

An Idyl of Age

He was a white-haired old gentleman with a marked stoop to the shoulders, and a step that was not so firm as he wished others to think; his hand trembled a good deal as he leaned heavily on his cane and felt for the sidewalk from the step of the carriage which had just drawn up before one of the old mansions on Fifth avenue; but he had a broad high brow with scarcely a wrinkle upon it and a kindly eye that could look the world in the face; evidently he had done no man wrong, and known much happiness in his long and active life. He put on his high hat and his long frock coat fell gracefully about his tall and graceful figure. He straightened himself up for a moment and then turned to help a lady from the carriage. She was strangely like and unlike him, and it was a moment before one realized that the reason for this contradiction lay in the fact that she was his wife. The grace and courtesy with which he offered his assistance, and the air with which she received the silent homage of his action, were as striking as they were unobtrusive, and made it clear at once that he was her knight and she was his lady. One felt that if the severe lapel of his broadcloth coat could suddenly be turned back, one would certainly find her favor pinned over his heart. She was his queen, of that there could be no doubt to the most casual observer, and he was her willing subject; he served her with most unmistakable pride and the most natural manner in the world. Long years of service had fixed their relations and made them easy.

They went up the broad steps, rather feebly but with much dignity, and entering the wide door that the footman held open, passed from sight. How one regretted to see them go! Their beautiful life-story went with them. How one wished that he might have known more, that he might have been invited within and permitted to sit down at the old lady's feet and learn from her own lips the secret of the influence she had acquired over that strong man, who evidently ruled others but was so obviously content to be ruled by her. She was not richly dressed, she was not beautiful, at least as far as regularity of feature was concerned, she did not even seem to be clever; but she had a power and a charm that all these qualities often fail to give.

Wherein lay her charm? It would seem that the romance of their courtship had never worn off. Not that they were still in love, at least not in the technical sense, for they certainly had never ceased to be lovers in the broader use of the word. The emotional intensity of their early love indeed had passed, but in its place had come something deeper, more enduring, more potent; the flash of passion had died away, but the calm light of unalterable affection still burned brightly in both of their hearts. Who had guarded the lamp that was still so radiant? In other hearts love had shone no less clearly at the beginning of their wedded life; but, alas, in many cases the golden glow had dwindled down into a tiny spark, had flickered for a while, and then gone out. How was it that it was still undimmed in these two hearts? Whose hand had trimmed the frail lamp all those many years? Some one must have poured in oil with constant care, some one must have been always on the watch when the flame grew fitful and trembled and flared. If it was still alight, some one surely must have kept it alight. How had it been done? Whose work had it been? One suspected that, if the truth were told, it would be found that she, not he, had been the cause. She was the Vestal, his was only a secondary part. And the result? She was possessed of a love and happiness that money was powerless to buy. What a sympathy, what a tolerance, what a forbearance, what a comfort had been the seed and the fruit of their more than fifty happy years!

And yet this was not all the truth. There were many other wives whose golden jubilee found their wedded love as fresh as it was on the day when they walked so bravely to the altar and plighted their troth for better or for worse; but their expressions lacked an indefinable something that almost transfigured the features of the kindly face that had turned so eagerly toward the other-day mansion. It was clear that she was coming home. A look of fond expectancy was in her eyes. She was proud of that stately gentleman, but he was not her all. She was happy to be with him alone, and yet there were others with whom she longed to be. She was listening with pleasure to his well-loved voice, but her ears were straining for the sound of other voices, not less dear. And now one could hear them as the door swung open, the voices of her children and her children's children. What a welcome was hers! What a chorus of love greeted her return! Into what an atmosphere of affection she passed from the chill indifference of the world! How her mother's heart throbbed within her! There were tears indeed on her cheeks, but not of sorrow, the smile on her lips was too unmistakably joyous to admit of that. Was this then the reason for that indescribably beautiful and illusive something that gave to her countenance a look almost of beatitude? Was she already tasting the sweetness promised by St. Paul to the patience, gentleness, courageous self-sacrifice and suffering involved in carrying out the ideal of Catholic maternity? Was she satisfied now that the prize was well worth the struggle? It seemed that she was, but the great oaken door had shut out the world from her secret. What a pity! So many others needed to learn it! Which were the better, her old fashioned ideals and standards and methods or the new, the modern?

She cared nothing, as one could see at a glance, about woman suffrage. She had never come out of her beloved retirement to shout to the world her equality with man; she had no need to do so; in her own circle she had always been treated as though she were somewhat above him. She was not a feminist nor did she glory in any of those harsh and repellant names that are so often to-day on woman's lips; she had never even walked in a procession. She was simply a dear, old-fashioned, sweet old lady with no other kingdom than her home and no other subjects but those she loved. And yet she was far more of a queen and wielded far more of power than her worldly-minded sisters, whose clamorous self-assertion seems to end only in failure, or where it gains success does so at the cost of one of their most precious gifts. What was the cause of her charm, her power, her happiness? What indeed but her very womanliness, her own inalienable charm, the power and happiness that God meant every woman to have. J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

One Solution of an Important Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your editorial entitled: "Calumniating Women" (Vol. XII, No. 2), you ask: "Who is responsible for the anti-Catholic war news that is making its way to the front pages of our newspapers?"

With reference to the now officially retracted story about Belgian priests having committed outrages on German wounded soldiers, it may suffice to note what is generally known to readers of German weeklies and dailies: namely, that a number of Belgian civilians and officers disguised themselves as priests. A Protestant officer in the German Army tells of the capture of eight such scoundrels in one day, "and not one of them was a priest." Naturally the German troops did not immediately "catch on" to the masquerading scheme, and this may account for stories about outrages and "sniping" by priests.

However, this is only one of the cases exploited by enemies of the Catholic Church. Your hint to Catholic organizations might do some good, provided a sufficient number of Catholic readers of "Hearst horrors" and sensational dailies had enough common sense to quit paying good cash to newsmongers and jaundiced journalists who revile things Catholic and indirectly make fools of their Catholic supporters. But even then we would not get at the Judeo-Masonic clique "doctoring" cables in London and Paris. By those who have followed the "fablegrams" manufactured by this cable cabal during the last five or ten years the slanders AMERICA resents were to be expected. And there will be more. Here is one of the reasons: Europe's "lying trust."

La Lectura Dominical, a weekly published by the Jesuit Fathers in Spain, declared in its issue for August 22:

> Partly with evident amusement and partly with well-founded indignation we have on a previous occasion characterized the lying methods used by the majority of correspondents informing the world on the progress of the war.
>
> Whenever they speak of Germany they regularly use expressions suited to a negro State in darkest Africa. The officers of her army are ballet dancers; her warriors, the worst of savages; the German cannon, pipes from an organ; German guns are reeds; German aeroplanes, mere sparrows; the airships, soap bubbles; the powder of the Germans is sand; their bullets are cotton, and their horses and battleships of paper.
>
> In Europe there has been formed a powerful press syndicate, which we Spaniards, who have our own know full well. Poets, speakers, politicians, enterpreneurs with whom our press does not like to bother, simply do not exist. There is no press but that of the trust, no truth if the trust does not champion it, no interest but that of the trust.
>
> The same thing applies to Europe. Germany does not belong to the allied trust, or rather, Germany is against the trust. Politics, press, telegraphs—everything belongs to the trust; and this explains why Germany does not exist any more.

It so happens that the Germany of Luther and of Bishop Kettler and the Austria of Christian-Social "reaction" happens to be at war with countries in which the "liars' trust" has its principal strongholds. In spite of much that is anti-Christian, these two empires are not the favorite camping ground of the anti-clerical forces in whose interests the cable cabal invents "fablegrams." France and England, on the contrary, have been cursed by these enemies of all civilization for many years. The Ferrer uproar amply proved this.

Now let us note other significant circumstances! The Spanish periodical, Razon y Fé, another Jesuit publication, reports that the Grand Orient of France has appealed to all foreign Orients for aid for the Allies, adding that these latter stand for freedom and progress as opposed to the "obscurantism and reaction" represented by Germany and Austria!

According to Italia, published in Milan, a meeting of Italian Freemasons on September 23 declared for war on the side of the Allies! In accordance with instructions of the Grand Master, a volunteer corps for France and another for a landing in Dalmatia are to be organized. Father Baumgarten, who has for some years been stationed in Rome, informs the Allgemeine Rundschau (No. 39) that the most vicious enemies of Austria and Germany in Italy are the Masonic journals Vita and Secolo! The same may be said of a Buenos Aires lodge sheet with reference to Argentina.

Can this enthusiasm of Freemasonry the world over for the Allies be only accidental with an organization which works with "malice aforethought"? Has it no connection with the "liars' trust" and the cable cabal "doctoring" dispatches in London and Paris for many a year?

If it has, then our Catholic organizations are practically powerless to remedy matters. Their "resoluting" and protesting will not materially change matters. Even a general refusal of Catholics to buy papers which throw mud at the Church would not prove entirely effective. To go to the root of the matter, the American Catholics must free themselves from the slavery of anti-Catholic cable agencies, and this, as Father Plater, S.J., has pointed out, means they must secure their own wire, an independent international news service. ANTHONY J. BECK.

Dubuque, Ia.

Italians in the United States

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read with great interest the defence of the Italian people's faith printed in a recent issue of AMERICA from the pen of Rev. Joseph Sorrentino, S. J. Like the Reverend writer, I too have lived for many years in Italy, and have learned to see and admire many noble qualities in the Italian people, especially their beautiful devotion to the Blessed Mother of God. Also, in my conversations with other American Catholics, I have endeavored to maintain what Father Sorrentino maintains, viz., that the vast majority of Italians are practical Catholics, but I have met with very indifferent success. First of all, against my contention has been invariably urged the patent fact that, in our country at least, the great majority of Italians do not measure up to the accepted definition of a practical Catholic, as one who obeys the Commandments of God and the precepts of the Church. The logical-minded American Catholic finds it impossible to reconcile practical Catholicity with a positive disregard of that precept of the Church which obliges all Catholics under pain of mortal sin to hear Mass on Sundays and holydays of obligation, unless a very serious reason excuses. And what are we who would like to be apologists to answer? We can not deny what almost every Catholic priest tells us, that the Italians in the United States as a rule do not attend Mass regularly. And this condition exists in spite of the fact that many zealous priests have done, and are still doing, all in their power to induce them to attend the Holy Sacrifice, as do Catholics of other nationalities. In fact, I may say from my own personal experience, I know priests who go so far as to throw open the doors of their churches to Italians without asking or expecting any offering from them; and, furthermore, provide them with a priest of their own nationality out of their own resources. This is done, they tell me, in order to remove the objection that Italians sometimes make "that they have to pay"; or "that they do not understand." One would think such generosity would be very fruitful, but these priests tell me they find that out of a colony of perhaps a thousand souls some fifty will attend Mass regularly.

In the face of such stubborn facts from those who know, it will avail me little to state, as has the Reverend writer in his article, "that there are in Naples at least four hundred churches"; "that Mass is said in these churches from five or six o'clock till noon," and "that these Masses are attended by immense crowds." What the American Catholic, and more especially the American priest, wants to have explained is this: If Italian Catholics go to Mass in immense crowds when in Naples, or Rome, or Milan, why do they not do likewise in New York, or Philadelphia, or Boston, where there are to be found densely settled Italian colonies? It is the same Mass, and the same obligation exists. Why have we, therefore, such a small percentage of Italians attending the Holy Sacrifice? Until this is explained away, I see very little to be said for the practical Catholicity of the Italian people with whom Americans have become acquainted. If we say it takes a "public joy" or a "public sorrow to awaken Italian Catholicity, to have churches and shrines decorated," good Catholics who look on will not believe it practical Catholicity, but emotionalism. For, by practical Catholicity they undersand, not the kind that needs an earthquake or other calamity to bring it to life, but the solid faith that manifests itself to the world, in season and out of season, fifty-two Sundays of the year, in the church, and at the Holy Table of the Eucharist.

Furthermore, if you urge the claim that "Italy abounds in well-attended and well-taught Sunday-schools" it is very difficult to find a reason for the widespread ignorance of and indifference to the fundamentals of our holy religion that are evident in the case of so many Italian immigrants to this country. Of course one can not expect to find them all theologians, or trained in apologetics, but one has the right to expect them to show forth their teaching in their lives. "By their fruits you shall know them" must be the test of the religious training in the case of the people of Italy as it is in that of other peoples; and, judged by their fruits in the discharge of their religious duties, little can be said in justification of their Sunday-school education. Then again, if Catholic societies flourish so generally in Italy, to what are Americans to attribute the indisputable fact that Italians, once in this country, gravitate so quickly, and apparently so naturally, to societies whose principles are unalterably opposed to the Catholic Church, and whose banner is not the Cross, but the red flag, or other like emblem of Socialism or anarchy?

I bring forward these difficulties because they are the ones I have so often heard expressed against Italian Catholicity, and for which I have never found any satisfying explanation. It is quite possible Father Sorrentino may be in a position to throw a new light on this subject that will clear up what seems to be a glaring inconsistency between the Catholic lives of the Italians in this country and in Italy. If he will do so, he will be doing something that will be appreciated by me, and I am quite sure by other readers of AMERICA.

Boston, Mass. CATHOLICUS.

Religious Conditions in Italy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will your correspondent, Mr. Herbert Hadley, please give his proofs for two statements in his attack on Father Sorrentino's article about "Religious Conditions in Italy"? I quote from Mr. Hadley's letter in your issue of October 31:

> (1.) Thousands upon thousands of boys and girls beyond the age of sixteen know nothing of their prayers, nothing of their catechism and have never even been instructed for or made their First Communion or Confession.
>
> (2.) Ninety-nine per cent. of them stay away from Mass when they come to this country.

What do our priests say who are working among the Italians?

New York. JOHN CORBETT, S.J.

Workers for Real Social Reform

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been a good deal interested in the controversy aroused by certain of your correspondents with regard to the backwardness of the Church at the present time in social reform initiative and leadership, with the innuendo that the Church has always been behind in these matters. Nothing is more amusing to me than the assumption of knowledge as to what the Church is doing and the very definite assertions as to her failure that one sometimes hears from young Catholics, "they may be young in mind, though old in body," who have usually been educated at secular institutions or have drawn their information such as it may be from Protestant sources. The magnificent social work, thank God it was not called that, but just plain charity, the charity that benefits not harms, accomplished by the Guilds and the religious Orders in the past is simply marvelous. They did not call it settlement work, but when I ventured to write of St. Elizabeth of Hungary as a pioneer settlement worker in the thirteenth century, Jacob Riis read a portion of that chapter at the opening of the Neighborhood House of New York. In just the same way the Church is doing an immense amount of social work right now that a great many Catholics who think themselves well informed know nothing of. We have thousands of social workers throughout the country whom we call Sisters and so on. These writers are emphatic in their assertions just in proportion to their ignorance. There is still plenty for Catholics to do, but we should be told of all that by some one who appreciates what is already being done and not by some one who ignores it.

JAMES J. WALSH.

A White List for the Opera

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Much has been said and written about the "White List" for plays, but what about our operas? The songs sung at the public from the musical stage could hardly be included in any white list. Is the representation of immoral themes justified simply because a thousand-dollar-a-night voice does it in rhymes and harmonized notes, or in a "foreign" tongue?

Hoboken, N. J. CANTOR.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York. President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Subscribers who do not get AMERICA on time should notify the Editor. Allowance, however, should be made for holidays, such as Election Day, which delay the printing of the paper.

"When Friends Fall Out" in Mexico

Villa and Carranza are in the thick of a hot quarrel. They were ardent lovers once: hence, the fracas abounds in rhetoric. Villa played Romeo; Carranza, Juliette; their balcony was the world: their "cooings" resounded from pole to pole. The one canonized the other: Romeo called Juliette a brave creature, a learned creature and just; Juliette lisped back hero, Napoleon, liberator. The change has come; Carranzistas have exhausted good Spanish, poor French and bad English in denouncing Villa, and with the same intent, are now contemplating the invention of a new language containing nothing but opprobrious epithets and wonder points. Meantime Villa is loading his guns. All this was to be expected: it calls for no comment. There is one feature of the campaign, however, worthy of note. The Carranzistas have opened a news agency in New York to tell people about the iniquity of Villa and the Catholic Church. Their first bulletin is at hand: there is an onslaught on the Church in it. Now do not forget the circumstances. Carranzistas, unreasonable haters of Catholicism, supporters of a faction that destroyed churches, defiled altars, vestments and chalices, murdered priests and ravished Sisters are making out a case against the Church. Their proposition is: "the Church was openly playing politics and, in a most shameless manner, kow-towing to Huerta murderers." That is quite clear: the arguments are equally clear. Here are the words of the official bulletin, printed with all mistakes:

Recently The Catholics of the United States sent a protest to the authorities at Washington, claiming that The Constitutionalists were persecuting The Catholics of Mexico. The letter which we reproduce below shows in what a manner The Catholic Church acted.

This letter openly shows that the Church, although by the constitution barred from the affairs of the state was openly playing politics. It was, in a most shameless manner, kow-towing with the Huerta muderers.

From Arch Bishop Mora to Urrutia—

MEXICO, July 11th, 1913

MY DEAR MINISTER AND FRIEND—

Thanking you for the kind terms of your favor of the 9th inst. which I received yesterday, I beg to assure you once more THAT ALL THE CURATES AND PRIESTS UNDER MY JURISDICTION, in compliance with their duty, will make every effort in order to bring about as soon as possible, the fulfillment of the aspirations of all the good people in this republic, who desire the peace and tranquillity of the beloved country.

I say that they do so in compliance with their duty because the Church desires peace, and to avoid bloodshed, and that all cooperate to the ultimate object of society, which is the well-being of all its members.

In this sense, I shall continue to animate to lose no opportunity to exhort parishioners to help to obtain this great boon.

In order to proceed in all justice, I would like, if you have no objection, to know the name of the person who is working against the government. One word from you on the subject will be sufficient.

I enclose a Memo. of something which may be of use to you, and which has come to my knowledge from trustworthy sources.

With kindest greetings, and assuring you of my sentiments of thankfulness, friendship and respect, I beg to remain

JOSE, Arzobispo de Mexico—

An analysis is now in order. Mexico had been running red with blood: murder and rapine had been rife: Huerta, good or bad, came to power: he was at least a de facto president, recognized as such by very many Mexicans and Americans, and by powerful nations skilled in diplomacy: the Archbishop of Mexico, anxious that men and women and children might be spared the horrors of unspeakable, savage strife, wrote to a Minister of State saying that both he and his priests, in accordance with duty, would make every effort to restore the peace and tranquillity so much desired by all decent people, Mexicans and others.

In this holy, manly, patriotic sentiment Carranzistas find an argument to prove "that the Church played politics." "Politics are played" forsooth when a man of God desires peace to save his countrymen from death, and their wives and daughters from worse than death. The Carranzistas have a strong case here. We are crushed into silence.

The second argument is no less crushing: it breaks every bone. This argument is found in these words of the prelate: "In order to proceed in all justice, I would like, if you have no objection, to know the name of the person who is working against the government." In other words, the Archbishop, in the interest of justice asks that any and all priests interfering in politics be reported to him. Since this is true, the Carranzista argument should read: the Archbishop of Mexico was desirous of preventing priests from interfering in politics. Hence the Catholic Church played politics. That is very plain and convincing. The Carranzistas can now leave the domain of reason, fall back on the imagination and tell the world of cavities under altars filled with corpses, of cellars stacked with arms and ammunition, of nuns immured in underground tombs and so on. The imaginative element in their bulletins will no doubt be as entertaining and instructive as the purely rational element.

"The Butterfly Habit"

"Why is it," asks Mr. George P. Brett in the November Atlantic Monthly, "that the American people fail to encourage by purchase and use the best works of our modern authors?" That this is true, he has no doubt. His long experience as a publisher has shown him that solid books are little read nowadays by the 100,000,000 inhabitants of the United States. Books of great scientific interest or historical value find but a few hundred American purchasers. The records of our public libraries indicate that more fiction is read than all other kinds of literature put together, and the novels called for are largely of the "six-best-sellers" type. Mr. Brett heard a certain publisher complain that the selling of books had been curtailed by the cheap magazine, the automobile, the gramophone, the moving-picture and the new dances. The writer remarks:

> This tendency of the times for mere amusement, which my observation seems to show as prevailing among the younger element of to-day, must inevitably be the result of the greatly increased opportunities for excitement and pastime in modern life, which foster what has been aptly termed the butterfly habit of mind. This is born in early years of the "play method" of teaching in school, and strengthened by the habits of a society which votes continued serious conversation a bore.

Close observers will readily agree that this "butterfly habit of mind" is without question a striking characteristic of to-day's young Americans. Reading that requires concentration of mind, conversation that demands intellectual activity, and composition that indicates a cultivated literary taste in the writer, seem rarer accomplishments than they were thirty years ago. The application of false pedagogical theories, and the modern craze for amusement combined with the ease with which it can be gratified are wisely assigned as the chief reasons why reading, conversing and writing, in this old-fashioned meaning, are becoming obsolete. It is now too late, perhaps, to teach those born twenty years ago how to think, talk, read and write, too late to show them what to admire and love. But the children of to-day can be made proficients in these highly important branches. Parents, therefore, should see that the boys and girls God has given them are not deprived of this training.

"The New Reformation of 1914"

The day of grace has dawned. The new reformation has begun. It started in Des Moines, the nursing mother of the Knights of Luther, the home too, of one Spurgeon, a brawling anti-Catholic agitator of strong lungs and a vivid imagination.

Like most movements of this kind the reformation is to take place by a gentle process of annihilation, through suffocation, a popular method of evangelization with some folk. The people to be reformed are Catholics: that of course goes without saying. Here is the plan of action:

> The New Reformation of 1914.
>
> Dear Friend:—
>
> To save America from the fate of Spain, Portugal, South America, Mexico and the Philippines, you are asked by an unknown friend to make four copies of this letter. Mail two to friends, the third copy to some politician and the fourth to some newspaper—all unsigned. You are also asked to mutually agree with Ten Million Other Patriots:
>
> (1.) To employ only Protestants as maids, confidential clerks or private secretaries and advise others to do the same.
> (2.) To encourage and seek out Protestants in business.
> (3.) To encourage and read such papers as are free from Roman Catholic free advertising and influence.
> (4.) To remain away from motion picture shows or theatres which show offensive or biased religious pictures or plays.
> (5.) To support for office only such persons as stand for Free Speech, a Free Press, and a complete separation of Church and State.
> (6.) To assist in Federating all Patriotic and Fraternal Orders who are opposed to the things we stand for and be a "Free Man" in a Free country (sic).
>
> Signed A Patriot.

What will come of this? Other reformations ended in deep potations, illegal marriages and ill-gotten goods.

Christianity and the War

> Three hundred thousand church spires raised to the glory of Christ! Three hundred million human creatures baptized into His service! And—war to the death of them all!

Thus exclaims John Galsworthy in Scribner's Magazine. He beholds the nations praying to God for the destruction of one another. He already sees the reeling subversion that must follow when the tumult is ended and men return to their sound senses. "When this war is over and reason resumes its sway our dogmas will be found to have been scored through forever." Mystic Christianity, or the Christianity of dogma, long in dying, will then be dead forever. He can not say what is to take its place, something, however, that may be described as "the divine element in man, the God within the human soul," something, in brief, that we can best define as pantheistic humanitarianism, so popular in our day.

There is nothing new in these remarks. We quote them only as the latest utterance of their kind. Similar prophecies of the immediate destruction of the Church were made with no less confidence in many other centuries of the Christian era. The suppositions underlying the present accusations against her may be reduced to two. Either she has been directly instrumental in causing the war, or she has already outlived her usefulness as a factor able to hold in restraint the passions of men.

As Catholics we have no wish to defend every so-called form of Christianity, vaguely referred to under that name. We know that there is only one Church founded by Christ, that to Peter alone were given the keys of His kingdom, that to the Catholic Church alone, the Church of the Apostles, belongs the promise of the perpetual indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Is the Catholic Church then, or are her children responsible for the present war? The assertion has been plainly made. We need only ask in our turn: Are the governments of Germany or England Catholic? Are the statesmen of France or Russia Catholics? Belgium surely did not originate the war. Austria, though largely Catholic, is honeycombed with infidelity in its government departments. What then has been the attitude of the Catholics engaged in the war? They have simply obeyed orders. They have done their duty to their respective countries as best they understood it. Whoever may be at fault, their own escutcheon is without blot.

The Church, therefore, has not been responsible for the war. Has she, however, shown herself useless to humanity in not averting it? The Church, we may answer, has been impotent only in so far as men have turned away from her, have refused to listen to her voice. She still remains, as she must ever remain, the one divine institution to purify the world, to combat vice under every form, to restrain the unruly passions of men. But they are free to neglect her warnings as they were permitted even to crucify her Christ. There is no constraint of the will in God's service. How the Church has successfully curbed the concupiscences of man can best be illustrated by the lives of those in every age, our own not excepted, who have listened to her doctrines and practised her counsels—the saints of God without number. What then is the true cause of the evils of the world? It is nothing else than the same principle which underlies the pantheistic humanitarianism of our day, the idolizing of self. It was the beginning of the first fall from grace. It cast the angels from heaven and man out of paradise. Even to-day that new form of paganism, which cries out in horror at the abominations of war, sanctions without remorse the far worse and more widely destructive and abhorrent practice of the murder of the innocents.

But in her prayers, the Church, we are told, contradicts herself. Catholics of every nation are beseeching God for victory. He must be deaf to one side, if He would hear the other. Such misconceptions rest upon a complete ignorance of the prayer that is made for temporal favors. Catholics are taught that no such prayer is absolute. It is always conditioned by the dominant desire that God's wise and holy will be done. This prayer can never be lost or left unheard. It must bring its blessings upon conquerors and conquered. For temporal favors denied it may obtain the greater riches of spiritual bounties. The most highly favored may possibly be those who in the world's eye have been rejected, even as the prayer of Christ in the Garden was thus treated by the Eternal Father. The Church is ever consistent with herself. Her own prayer is for peace and not for war, but above all it is for the coming of God's kingdom upon earth, however victory or defeat may finally be apportioned.

Real Americans

Real Americans are much in evidence to-day. They always are at election time: that is to be expected, for after all the safety of the country depends on them. Their tactics, too, are much the same as they were last year and the year before, and ten years ago. For a while they worked in secret doing their best to discredit honorable men who stood for public office. At last they came into the open, blinked for a time at God's light, then called one another "liars," "crooks," "touts," "thieves," but through all this interchange of amenities they never forget the "Papist" nominees. Many lessons could be learned from this. There are a few to which attention should be drawn. The people who employ such tactics are "Real Americans." There is scarcely one of them without a hyphenated name. That should never be forgotten. Nor should it be forgotten that Catholics are to pay taxes, go to war, accept calumny meekly, but not dare stand for public office. The "Real Americans" will not tolerate such a monstrous thing. They own the country: we are their foot-stools.

I Have Made Up My Mind

Crystals are beautiful things. Many precious stones are crystals. The diamond is a crystal, and the quartz family sparkles in a variety of colors on cuffs and neckties and rings, and wherever else the adventitious aids of nature's quarries can accentuate native beauty by a new attraction or relieve the eye for the absence of beauty by a distracting substitute. Crystals are as wonderful in their birth as they are glorious in their full growth. They solidify out of molten masses or marshal along their rigid lines when some liquid evaporates or, more rarely, start into being from condensed vapors. It is a never ceasing source of wonder to see the multitude of molecules move into lines like well-drilled soldiers.

Crystals are usually handsome, but they are always hard and they have sharp edges and follow rigid lines and protrude into awkward points. Now if crystals had brains and a tongue in addition to their other fine qualities, they would find it hard not to be proud. They would at once be put with that class of people which is also likely to be rigid and hard and angular, the people who have made up their mind. It would be desirable to add the crystals to this family of crystallized souls. They might impart some of their beauty to their human counterparts, who do not furnish us with many precious stones or desirable ornaments.

The process of making up one's mind is mysterious indeed. If the process were put in other more intelligible terms, the makers might not flatter themselves so often upon what they have made. "I have made up my mind," is in most cases only a self-deception, a diamond statement of a charcoal reality. You should rather say you are set on having your own way, that nothing can change you, that there is very little reasoning of the mind but much stubbornness of the will in what you are pleased to think you have made up. Like your brother crystals you have cooled from some fiery state, in your case, one of anger or resentment; you have sharpened an edge on your tongue; you have developed a very stony, if very bright, look in the eye, and all your features have hardened into rigid lines. If you have made up your mind, there is no need of clenching the fists; the nails may hurt the palm. There is no need of gritting the teeth; by that you gratify no one but the dentist. The two ways in which mankind commonly comes into touch with crystals are found in the form of ice and sand-paper, and these are cold and rough articles. It is, as crystallographers tell us, the molecular constitution of matter which is responsible for crystals, and if you who have made up your mind into ice or fractured quartz on sand-paper, could look into the molecules of your so-called mind, you would find strange lines of force. Jealousy and spite and prejudices and pique and selfishness, these are the builders of human crystals.

Happily such are not always the forces making up men's minds. The Catholic who has made up his mind about the truths of his faith in obedience to God's word is a precious stone and may be as unyielding as you will. The happy couple who make up their minds at God's altar with God's blessings are a constellation of jewels; they are twin crystals and may their made up minds know no cleavage! It comes to this then that it all depends upon the mindmaker. If error or malice are the mindmakers, then mere hardness is no excellence. Herod made up his mind to cut off the head of the Baptist because of those at table, and Pilate resolved upon a worse murder because the voices of the mob prevailed. If, however, truth and goodness give firmness and beauty to the mind, if the will hardens into solidity out of the fire of charity, then adamantine infrangibility gives an added lustre to your fairness of soul. You are a crusader who bears a blood-red cross and have made up your mind because God wills it.

LITERATURE

Robert Hugh Benson

Monsignor Benson's Catholic life almost exactly synchronized with the reign of Pius X. Received into the Church September 11, 1903, he passed to his reward October 19, 1914. He was raised to the priesthood in Rome in 1904; and the Holy Father's grief over the lights that were falling from high places was assuaged by the sight of a bright young intellect, original and vigorous, coming forth from the Protestant Primacy of England to take up the championship of Christ and, with the most effective of modern weapons, to fight the battles of His Church in the newest avenues of life. The equal years that were given him were hardly less packed with achievement in his sphere than the full years of Pius.

In the decade of his priesthood he preached and lectured widely, up and down England, in Rome and Ireland and America; and between times he issued some twenty-five volumes, so artistically set and phrased that many will live in literature, and so uniformly wholesome and helpful that the inspiring eloquence of his voice and personality will continue long to preach from their pages. He had imagination and artistic tastes and a many-sided intellect, and a pen facile to translate the varied and subtle reaches of mind and fancy into clear and flowing phrase; but he never wrote for the sake of writing. He had a message from the King, which he begun to deliver only when the King had explained it, and he delivered it in such varying language as those for whom it was given could best understand. The key to it is found in the story of his preparatory struggles toward its acquisition, "The Confessions of a Convert." This is not merely a "human document" nor a controversial tract. The forces of grace that made Benson a Catholic despite himself, and then opened the floodgates of his powers and guided the wide-spreading stream through safe and fertilizing courses, are so visualized in and between the lines that they seem rising from the page to operate in like manner on the soul of the reader.

Reared in the citadel of Protestantism amid a cultured and literary family, fed on the very best that the highest Protestant cul ure has to give in school and university, and trained religiously with special care by the head of the Church of England, the fourth son of the Archbishop of Canterbury found at twenty-one that though he had been always obedient to his father's teachings, whom he loved and revered, his "religion had no spark in it of real vitality." It was an impersonal, objective thing that impelled him neither to fear God nor love him, permitted him to dabble in hypnotism, theosophy, spiritualism, skepticism, with whatever friend attracted him, and also to take orders in the Anglican establishment. Meanwhile he had read and traveled widely, climbed the Alps, steered the Cambridge eight, played half-back in football, and remained untouched by the moral evils that obtained in the best collegiate society. His mind was kept free of morbidity and open to the influx of grace. A retreat given soon after his ordination by Father Maturin, then one of the "Cowley Fathers," disclosed to him for the first time the Christian doctrine and Sacraments as an orderly scheme, springing inevitably from the Incarnation; and his subsequent travels, in 1897, through Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land, bringing home to him the isolation of Anglicanism and the identity of Catholicity everywhere, awakened the suspicion that this was the scheme of Christ. He received the first shock of conversion in a little mud-chapel in Egypt, and the second when on the road to Damascus he read that Father Maturin had become a Catholic. But his response was less ready than Saul's. He returned eager to drown his doubts in active preaching and social work among the poor, the reading of anti-Catholic works, and in high ritualistic services; and all this failing, he entered the Anglican Community of the Resurrection.

He had "dedicated himself once and for all in the highest vocation open to man," he found the community edifying and congenial and doctrinally consistent, he went forth preaching missions in the slums to large audiences whose confessions he heard for many hours a day, he saw evidences of grace multiplying beneath his hand, and for two years he was happy. But the missions brought him into a nearer realization of Anglican incoherency—"hints and fragments and aspirations detached from their centre and reconstructed into a purely human edifice" —and despite himself he got beyond his community. Only Papal Infallibility detained him; and a study of the Petrine texts made him wonder why he had not seen before that there is nothing more manifest in Scripture. Still he fought, and consulted every Anglican of weight; but grace was fighting, too, and not even the disloyal rebuff of a supposedly Catholic authority could conquer it. Arguments no longer availed. He knew that Catholicity was the system that Christ gave "because it worked"; it was for all always, and a child could understand it and know its duties, as Catholic children do. It was "humility and singleness of heart" that wrought conversion, not subtle distinctions; and so he "strove against despair, the very antichrist of humility," and made his submission with the little ones of Christ.

Kindness and liberty he had had, but that liberty was intolerable slavery. He needed not freedom to change his grasp on truth, but a truth that should make him free; not "broad ways of pleasantness, but the narrow Way that is Truth and Life." On the one side stood his old mistress, loving and loved, claiming him by every human tie; on the other, the Bride of Christ, dominant with light and power, claiming him because the Lord, of Whom she was the Bride and he was a son, had said: "Take this child away and nurse it for Me and I will give thee thy wages." Her he chose, for he feared the condemnation: "Unless a man leave his father and mother and all that he hath, he can not be My disciple." He left so much that was dear, subjectively and objectively, that his conversion is no weak argument in itself for Catholic truth; but there is still stronger argument in that which he found. He found certainty of sacramental grace, and the truth and love and liberty of Christ growing ever larger and sweeter, and his own powers expanding a hundred-fold under their sway. Giving all to Christ he had always more to give.

"The Light Invisible," which he wrote in 1902 as a sedative to his doubts, intending it to "hit the water-line" between Anglicanism and Catholicity, he later disliked for that reason. This must have been largely subjective, for it is an exquisite story and quite as Catholic as his later tales of the spiritual borderland in "A Mirror of Shalott." Unsatisfied by mystical experiments, he turned to the question of the Church's warrant for its teachings, and applying his conclusions to a decisive, concrete instance, wrote "By What Authority," finishing the last chapters after he had accepted as Divine the authority of the Catholic Church. Its success inspired his great historical series. "Come Rack, Come Rope," covers the same Elizabethan period, showing a deeper and tenderer appreciation of the poignant and pathetic heroisms of the children of the Faith; "The King's Achievement" goes back to Henry VIII's initial revolt against authority; "The Queen's Tragedy" portrays Mary's attempt to reestablish it; and "Oddsfish," the last legacy of his genius, unfolds how the Popish Plot frightened the weak and spasmodic velleities of Charles II into permitting Authority and its heroes to be trampled down again in shame and blood. As historical portraits these five novels are unequaled in English romance. They are true both to history and the deeper truths of inner thought and fundamental verity; and merely as novels, they have the essential quality, which Scott's do not now possess, of compelling interest. They will be read, regardless of their religious and moral value, and therefore this value is incalculably widened and intensified. With them may be classified the fifteenth century mystical story of "Richard Raynal" and the "Lord of the World" and "Dawn of All," which project into the future the cosmic development of Christian and of anti-Christian principles.

It was because he wanted God's message not only to go forth but to be heard that he conveyed it chiefly through the novel. His intimate experience of the evil consequences of heresy in our day inspired the "Sentimentalists" and "Conventionalists," "The Necromancers" and "The Coward." The demands of Faith, from without and within, are pictured in "The Average Man," "Initiation" and "The Winnowing," and "None Other Gods" is a twentieth century translation of "Richard Raynal." They are as faithful a picture of our age as are the historical novels of the days of the Tudors and the Stuarts, constituting a gallery of persons, places, peoples, events, phases of thought, faith and heresies, fads, fancies, follies, glory and shame and pain and noble visions, that is as artistically pleasing as it is vast and comprehensive. No class or phase is missing. A review of remarkable insight, in the July and August Catholic World, notes that Mgr. Benson is accused of excluding Jesuits from his tableaux. Blessed Edmund Campion's splendid figure in "By What Authority" and "Come Rack, Come Rope" would alone suffice, had not his sympathetic sketch of Father Persons, his fine general tribute in "Initiation," and his making the Jesuit victims of the Oates Plot the real heroes of his latest and finest story, done full justice to the Society of Jesus.

Even this marvelous fecundity of fictional propaganda could not fill the measure of his zeal. "Papers of a Pariah," representing a friendly outsider's view of the Church and its working, "Confessions," "Non-Catholic Denominations" and "The Religion of a Plain Man" are eminently useful for controversial purposes, containing no word, however strong, that could grieve a friend or hurt a foe. His plays of the Nativity and the English Martyrs, his sketch of Lourdes and life of St. Thomas of Canterbury, his two volumes of Lenten lectures, and numerous articles, essays and brochures, do not exhaust the list of services his pen had rendered for "The Friendship of Christ." This was his master passion; and Death was the moment in which he was wont to set its climax. Death, he wrote, "is sweet and friendly as a firelit hall into which men may see from the darkness outside," and, in the last words of his last published discourse, "'To me to live is Christ, to die is gain.' My Friend is mine at last. And I am His." Surely he who, neglecting the warnings of that disease to which he too soon succumbed, poured out his vitality for his Friend, has found Him.

M. KENNY, S.J.

REVIEWS

Trees and Other Poems. By JOYCE KILMER. New York: George H. Doran Company. $1.00.

It occurs so seldom in these days that trained literary ability is employed in the graceful service of Catholic ideals that it is a pleasure to recommend in these pages the new book of poems by Mr. Joyce Kilmer. We trust that it will not have to be said of him, as it has been said of Francis Thompson and Lionel Johnson, that he has found his best and widest appreciation among those to whom his faith and his ideals were most alien.

These poems, be it understood, are no idle and forced exercises in versification. There is a freshness of genuine poetical impulse on nearly every page. Without being a departure from poetic traditions the poems exhibit spontaneously the distinction of individuality. Yet it is not easy to define the peculiar qualities in Mr. Kilmer's verse which give it its newness of music. It is simple and direct, yet not without subtle magic; it seems to be artlessly naïve, yet it possesses deep undercurrents of masculine and forceful thought; it is ethical in its seriousness, and yet as playful and light-hearted as sunlight and shadows under summer oaks. The supreme impression perhaps left on the reader of these poems is of a high sincerity which can afford to be frank and natural without fearing to imperil sanctities.

The commonplace character of many of the subjects may surprise some readers, for instance, "Servant Girl and Grocer's Boy"; "Delicatessen"; "The Twelve-Forty-Five"; "The Apartment House." The Wordsworthian test of skill involved in the poetic treatment of prosaic themes is not easy. The original inventor failed to meet it successfully in one or two cases. But we are much mistaken if Mr.

Kilmer's hardihood has not been justified by his achievement in every instance. A real creative faculty has transfigured these every-day objects of modern life, and we are enabled to see them in a newer and more truthful light than before. Thus the concluding stanzas of a fine poem, with the unpromising title "Delicatessen," will very likely help us to see the prosaic shopman in a new and—who will gainsay it?—the true way:

O Carpenter of Nazareth,
Whose mother was a village maid,
Shall we, Thy children blow our breath
In scorn on any humble trade?

Have pity on our foolishness
And give us eyes that we may see
Beneath the shopmen's clumsy dress
The splendor of humanity.

Here is a poet, moreover, who does not feel obliged to seek exotic subjects for his song in the moral order any more than in the material. He does not crave for attention by depicting the cultivated horrors of a soul that has damned itself. His cleanness of ideal revolts from the unholy juggling of the decencies before satyr-audiences; and he is moved to exclaim in his address "To Certain Poets":

You strut and smirk your little while
So mildly, delicately vile!

Your tiny voices mock God's wrath,
You snails that crawl along His path!

Why, what has God or man to do
With wet, amorphous things like you?

This thing alone you have achieved:
Because of you it is believed

That all who earn their bread by rhyme
Are like yourselves, exuding slime.

Oh, cease to write for very shame
Ere all men spit upon your name.

Take up your needles, drop your pen,
And leave the poet's craft to men.

The vigor of this denunciation is all the more forcible because it appears among poems as sweet and odorous as a day in spring. But Mr. Kilmer's conception of a true poet—and it is the right conception, and constitutes the basis of the only hope we have for the future of English poetry—causes, while it excuses, his bitter indignation. Elsewhere he gives expression to that conception in rememberable lines:

Vain is the chiming of forgotten bells
That the wind sways above a ruined shrine.
Vainer his voice in whom no longer dwells
Hunger that craves immortal Bread and Wine.

In the beautiful dedicatory sonnet to his mother, Mr. Kilmer writes:

Take, then, a little gift of fragile rhyme:
Your heart will change it to authentic song.

The reviewer does not hesitate to predict that sterner and less partial critics will also find here the note of authentic song. J. J. D.

The Works of Father Frederick Faber. Centenary Edition. 12 vols. New York: Benziger Brothers. $0.75 each.

On the twenty-eighth of last June exactly one hundred years had elapsed since the birth of Father Faber, that priest whose name is a household word in the mouths of English-speaking Catholics, and the issue of the centenary edition of his complete works is singularly opportune. Quite apart from Faber's position as a spiritual guide, writer of ascetical works and hymnologist, the man himself stands at the dawning of that Second Spring of English Catholicism. The dark night of the Penal Days had barely passed when he was born, and at the time when he left the Church of England the hour had come for English Catholicism to stand forth boldly to repair the waste places in the spiritual Zion.

Faber presents Catholic truth as a thing of intense vitality; it becomes a mighty flood, sweeping everything before it, and bearing along the burden of the ages. But perhaps this is nowhere more emphasized than in Faber's hymns, which are typical of him and of his time. Faber was not a great poet, and the larger number of his hymns are hardly to be rated higher than pious ditties; this, for their academic bearing. But consider. The Church in England had just emerged from the state of a persecuted remnant, and the blood of the martyrs had hardly become dry. There were practically no hymns in the vernacular, and Faber's hymns were really the first attempt of importance to provide a popular collection. Such has been their popularity that many of them have appeared in almost every English Protestant hymnal; and if the writer did not attain to poetic heights he has left some masterpieces which have become almost immortal. What a world of sentiment and truth, for instance, is contained in the verses beginning:

Faith of our fathers, living still
In spite of dungeon, fire and sword.

Such hymns are the noblest crown of Father Faber.

H. C. W.

The Red Ascent. By ESTHER W. NEILL. New York: P. J. Kennedy & Sons. $1.00.

When we first meet in this story Dick Matterson, a convert, he is all but crushed under the necessity of giving up his preparation for the priesthood in order to assist his family, who have lost everything but an unproductive estate and aristocratic tastes. Betty, a pleasure-loving sister, who adores horses and hates dishwashing; a crabbed father who earned a colonelcy in the Civil War, but nothing since; Jeff Wilcox, lawyer and devoted friend, and a neighbor's charming daughter, heiress to Texas lands which the Colonel declares were stolen from his father, are other prominent characters in the tale. The story of Dick's dogged determination to bring order and something like prosperity out of chaos and poverty, and of his temptation to seize the "beauty, the love, the liberty that the world offers," sacrificed once, denied him now by poverty, but still attainable by effort, is rapid, vivid and convincing; and though touched by pathos, as in capable hands it must be, is relieved by flashes of delightful humor.

"The Red Ascent" is a little sketchy in the earlier parts through a laudable but unnecessary attempt to spare the reader tiresome details, but the story's interest never flags. The last reading that Dick had heard before he left the seminary recited how cliffs outside Jerusalem had been the bloody battle-ground of so many warring chiefs that they were called "The Red Ascent." "Can not the path of every man, who struggles to attain the heights of idealism," he asked himself, "be likened to that bloody road?" The way before him, to be cleared by plough and spade and axe, he dubbed the "Black Descent," but found that even this can lead upward to the heights. Mrs. Neill's book is a strong, readable story, with little preachment in the lines, but much between them to please and enrich the memory. A. E. M.

Hoof and Claw. By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.35.

"And Wing and Fin" might have been added to the title of this new book, for fin and wing, as well as claw and hoof, figure in this series of animal stories. Bear, minx, bison, fox, eagle, trout, wolf, elk, ram, lynx, otter, moose, sucker, fish-hawk—all these come in for their share of attention. The atmosphere is distinctly that of Nature's wilds, the mountains, the woods, the air. The author knows all the territory with interested intimacy, and has traversed the same country in his former works. He makes you feel at home with nature. The life depicted is almost wholly that of the beasts of the field; even the few human characters in the book are subordinated to their animal neighbors. If the degree of "intelligence" attributed to the animals is at times marvelous, it is believed that this is rather for the story's effect than an indication of the author's belief; but "that unknown and quite incalculable sense which seems to have its seat in the fine hairs on the back of one's neck, and in the skin of the cheeks," for being mentioned so often, leads one to suspect that there is more than quiet humor meant, though of the latter the author has a fund.

The gamut of the emotions is run in the book. Sadness is found in "The Trail of the Vanishing Herds"; awe in "Runners of the High Peaks"; humor in "Up a Tree"; weirdness in "Shadows and John Hatch." One must like the style of the stories, but, if not accustomed to Mr. Roberts' vocabulary, may be startled at such words as "glams" and "splangency," and have a lurking suspicion that Lewis Carroll may have had a share in the book's composition. But the author is speaking the language of the woods, and for this such are technical, rather than pedantic. If the book has any other purpose than interest, or devotion to nature, it is by no means evident. "Shadows and John Hatch," which furnishes the subject for the frontispiece to the illustrator of the book, Paul Bransom, is perhaps the best of the stories.

C. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The following books, which are being brought out this fall by English publishers, will soon be appearing, no doubt, on this side of the Atlantic: From Washbourne come "The Wit and Wisdom of John Ayscough," "The Duchess Ilsa," by E. Vernon Blackburn, and "What Faith Really Is," by Father H. G. Graham. From Sands & Co., "New Testament Stories," by Rev. C. C. Martindale, S.J., and "Norah of Waterford," by Rosa Mulholland." Longmans announces "The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation," by Mgr. Ward; "The Romanticism of St. Francis," by Father Cuthbert, and "The Upper Room," a drama of Christ's Passion by the late Mgr. Benson. Cassell will publish "What of To-day?" by Father Bernard Vaughan, and "The Wisdom of Father Brown," by G. K. Chesterton, while Smith Elder will bring out "Molly," a novel by Katherine Tynan, and "The Ways of Miss Barbara," by Mr. and Mrs. Castle.

The Bookman's list of the six novels that were most widely read in this country during the month of September is a sad indication that the general public's taste in reading is by no means improving. "The Eyes of the World," the first of the six, as has been already remarked in these columns, though a well-meant protest against morbid "realism" is likely to do more harm than good. "The Auction Block," which comes next, is an exposure of the life in the New York underworld, particularly of that portion associated with the stage. That a book so full of vicious characters and disgusting scenes should be a "best seller" is very disheartening. With "The Prince of Graustark," the third of the six, we rise at once to a much higher level. The story, as was said in our issue of September 12, while improbable enough, is clean, healthy and interesting. In "Hidden Children," the facile Mr. Chambers' thirty-eighth novel, he makes his leading characters' morals a little better perhaps than is usual with him—which is faint praise—and leads the reader through 650 weary pages. But having once produced a "best-seller," it is apparently quite easy to repeat the performance. "The Twenty-fourth of June," the fifth book on the list, was noticed favorably in AMERICA for September 5. It is gratifyingly free from the objectionable qualities that abound in "The Devil's Perch," the last of the Bookman's "best-sellers," which is merely the story of two married women's intrigues. The publishers announce that "this novel has never been printed in a periodical or a newspaper." That is something at least to be thankful for. Unhappily, however, it has now been published as a book.

What was perhaps the last work to which the late Mgr. Benson put his hand is "Vexilla Regis" (Longmans), a special book of devotions and intercessions on behalf of all affected by the war. Though his physician had made him cancel all engagements till Christmas, the state of Mgr. Benson's health did not cause his friends great anxiety. He died of heart failure, at Bishop's House, Salford.

Among recent books for the young are Mary Agnes Finn's "A Broken Rosary and Other Stories" (Benziger, $1.15), an edifying volume for Catholic girls; C. M. Home's "The Worst Boy in the School" (Benziger, $0.45), which tells how a lad's unamiable disposition was changed by kindness; "The Conversion of Cæsare Putti" (Benziger, $0.45); W. Hall-Patch's improving tale of St. Philip Neri's times, and Worthington Green's "The Boy Fugitives in Mexico" (Houghton, $1.25), the story of two Americans of sixteen, who do deeds of prowess that many a gray-haired campaigner would be proud to have achieved.

Those industrious authors C. N. and A. M. Williamson have finished in "A Soldier of the Legion" (Doubleday, $1.35) their fifteenth novel. La Legion Etrangére, that Algerian regiment made up of men of various classes, races and "pasts," would seem to offer much richer material for a romance than these authors were able to find. They have "gotten up" their subject well and give a great deal of interesting information about barrack-life in Northern Africa, but the story is ill constructed and its characters do not always act like human beings. The book opens well and promises to be quite absorbing, but several persons who are introduced with a great flourish soon disappear to make way for others less interesting, and some of the situations in the story are far from edifying.

"Little Eve Edgarton" (Century, $1.00) a marvelous maiden whose story is told by Eleanor Hallowell Abbott, does so "want a house, and the things that go with a house; a cat, and the things that go with a cat; kittens, and the things that go with kittens; saucers of cream, and the things that go with saucers of cream; ice-chests—and". Here her heavy lashes assert their charming habit of coming "shading down across her cheeks." She is a unique successor to "Molly Make-Believe." The characters in the story are hardly human, and their words and actions would scarcely be tolerated among refined men and women; but "Little Eve" is a delightful contrast.

Mr. Stephen Graham having finished a pilgrimage to Jerusalem now makes one to New York. From Liverpool he takes passage in the steerage with a crowd of "Poor Immigrants to America" (Macmillan, $2.00), who for the most part are Russian peasants. After arriving here he goes tramping through the Middle West in search of good "copy." The author's impressions of America are interesting, but not very profound. He contrived to avoid meeting educated people and made the remarkable discovery that "the Negro's way of speaking has become the way of most ordinary Americans." "I remember always that I am a 'booster'" appears to Mr. Graham to be the chief tenet of the American creed. The book is fully illustrated.

PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Bros., New York:

The "Summa Theologica" of St. Thomas Aquinas. Translated by the Fathers of the English Province. Part III. Third Number qq LX-LXXXIII. $2.00; Popular Sermons on the Catechism. From the German of Rev. A. Hubert Bamberg. Edited by Rev. Herbert Thurston, S.J. Vol. I. $1.50.

Desmond Fitzgerald, Inc., New York:

Lady Rumdidoodledum's Children. By S. B. Dinkelspiel. $1.00; The Curly-Haired Hen. Text and Illustrations by A. Vimar. Translated by Nora K. Hills. $0.75.

Devin, Adair Co., New York:

Yourself and the Neighbors. By Seumas MacManus. $1.25; Twenty-Five Years' Reminiscences. By Katherine Tynan. $3.50.

George H. Doran Co , New York:

Trees and Other Poems. By Joyce Kilmer. $1.00; The Author's Craft. By Arnold Bennett. $0.75.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:

Appearances. By G. Lowes Dickenson. $1.00; A Soldier of the Legion. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. $1.35.

J. Fischer & Bro., New York:

Motets by Rene Becker; Tui Sunt Coeli; Laetentur Coeli. $0.12 each; Mass in Honor of St. Barbara. $0.80; Mass in Honor of St. Benedict. $0.80.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:

The Doers. By William John Hopkins. $1.00; The Birds' Christmas Carol. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. $0.60; Is Conscience an Emotion. By Hastings Rashdall. $1.00.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons; Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:

Oddsfish. By Robert Hugh Benson. $1.35.

Mitchell Kennerley, New York:

Drift and Mastery. By Walter Lippmann. $1.50.

The Macmillan Co., New York:

Through the Grand Canyon from Wyoming to Mexico. By Ellsworth L. Kolb. $2.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:

Who is Responsible? By Cloudesley Brereton. $0.50.

Student Volunteer Movement, New York:

Students and the World-wide Expansion of Christianity. Edited by Fennell P. Turner.

Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York:

The Seven Champions of Christendom. By F. J. Harvey Darton. $1.35; The Story of Greece. By Mary Macgregor. $2.50; Perch of the Devil. By Gertrude Atherton. $1.35.

Yale University Press:

The Influence of Isocrates on Cicero, Dionysius and Aristides. By Henry Mortimer Hubbell. $1.25.

EDUCATION

Is Johnny Overworked?

When Johnny comes marching home from school, he does not ordinarily exhibit, in manner or appearance, those signs of "fatigue" with which certain recent theorizers in pedagogy have been pleased to invest the vespertinal schoolboy. If he lives in a small town, he has probably had the delicious joy of kicking an old tin-can through sundry arcs and ricochets for several blocks. Probably, too, he has covered some part of his homeward journey "hooked onto" a grocery wagon, warily regarding a menacing driver uttering dire threats. Quite possibly, after many dares and counter-dares, he has knocked the chip from some youthful shoulder, and allowed the high joy of battle to surge into his young soul. A whistle or a shrill call, the sound of altercations with the cook, preserving her household gods against assault, the scurrying of hasty feet, and the banging of doors; these are the familiar echoes which announce Johnny's safe arrival to the maternal ear. Hungry, he is; yet this is a chronic state, and no alarming symptom of decay. The more pressing wants of his inner being assuaged, he is off again to knock out flies, to play football, to coast, to skate, to engage whole-heartedly in the sports dictated by the season of the year. A boy is ready to face life, keen and undaunted, only after he has left school and its memories behind him. A keen eye, a seeing eye, invested with prepossessions, is required to discern in Johnny even the first traces of fatigue.

That's all very well, says the theorist, but I was not referring to physical fatigue. Johnny's muscles may not be tired, and yet it may be quite true that his mental powers have been pushed, during the day, to the limit of their endurance. This process, repeated day by day, will ultimately work harm to his nervous system, and by consequence to his general health. Putting my objection definitely, I should say, first, that the school hours are too long for our children from seven to twelve years old; next, that the length of the school year might profitably be curtailed, and finally, that the curriculum of the grade school is over-crowded.

These objections, as practical educators will recognize, are not factitious. On more than one occasion they have been urged seriously upon the attention both of educators and of the public. There is some truth in them, but their close alliance with the prevalent idea that mental work is bad for the school-boy, and that he should be taught through his fingers rather than through his brain, weakens their force in the minds of practical school-men who are well acquainted with actual school conditions. The public opinion which once bore with over-severity in the conduct of popular schools is now swinging to the other extreme. The American school-boy, says Dr. Perkins, is treated as a rare and delicate plant. That he should plow his way through the snow to school, is not to be thought of. A cloud no bigger than a man's hand brings up a vision of Johnny with wet feet, and dreadful colds, and refuge is taken in the excuse that one can not be too careful about Johnny's lungs, strong and vigorous as they would now seem to be. At the slightest sign of indisposition, he is kept at home, and probably put to bed. If he does get to school, he is not allowed to work more than four or five hours a day, or four or five days a week. Great care is to be taken that he does not strain his eyes with over-much reading, or that his mental poise is not unbalanced by too much study. These and similar practices do not appeal to Dr. Charles L. Dana, of the Cornell Medical School, who in recent issues of the New York Sun, has been discussing the results of his investigations on fatigue in school children. He finds that coddling mothers and "house-broken" fathers are too quick to adopt the "caressing attitude" toward their children, at the very time when a carefully considered firmness is most necessary for the child's proper mental and moral development. They think, apparently, that study is a dangerous thing for a boy, that persistent brain-work should be allowed him only under the most careful conditions, and taken away from him on the least excuse.

> Now as a matter of fact, this is absolutely wrong. Mental work is not only healthful for a growing child, but it is absolutely beneficial. There is nothing so important for him as to be impelled to do hard work, and to finish thoroughly a given task. If he works with the idea that the minute the sensation of ennui comes upon him, he should stop, his work will never be thorough or effective. . . . The European idea is, that after the age of ten a child is able to do hard work and ought to do it. The American idea is, that it is able to do some work and ought to be persuaded to do it.

Obliging members of the medical fraternity, Dr. Dana finds, have done their share in spreading the delusion that school children are generally over-worked. "Teachers have told me that their desks were loaded with doctors' certificates, advising this or that pupil to have a rest, or to be excused from a study that he did not like." Without doubt, serious harm both to mind and body may be the results of methods that are too exacting, but the effects of an unwise indulgence are far more disastrous. It is better that a child should suffer now and then, from "brain fatigue" than that he should never be trained to use his brain at all. Dr. Dana asserts that in his practice extending over thirty years, he has met with but one case of break-down from what was said to be over-study, and that in this case, the youth was restored to health by providing him with a pair of glasses.

Dr. Dana's investigations make it abundantly clear that the pupils of the English, French and German schools undergo a training far more severe than that to which American children are subjected. If little Johnny were named Otto Kaulen, and if he lived, say, at Berlin, he would go to school for forty-five weeks a year. His bright and happy face would gladden the teacher's heart every morning at eight o'clock promptly, and under his or her tuition, he would remain for six hours, except on Wednesday and Saturday, when he would be dismissed after four hours of work. Johnny, as we know him in America, has a school year of from thirty-five to forty weeks, or about 190 five-hour days. The German school year is from five to ten weeks longer. Exclusive of religious instruction, the German school-boy's week numbers 1,635 minutes; Johnny's week has about 1,312 minutes. There are a thousand hours in the American school year; one thousand five hundred, in the German year of forty-five weeks. In addition to this, the German boy is usually in the grade school, by the time Johnny's mother, or the principal of the school, is thinking of promoting Johnny from the Kindergarten. In France and England, much the same conditions are found. The French school year has from forty-two to forty-five weeks, five days a week, and six hours a day. The English school year contains, on an average, two hundred five or six-hour days. The results of this intensive training as Dr. Perkins mournfully views the matter in the Yale Review, is that by the time the American boy is eighteen or nineteen years old, he is at the very least, two years behind the German, French or English boy.

One may find some consolation in this sorrowful conclusion by reflecting that statistics are proverbially misleading. Moreover, what may fit the temperament of the European child, and be found quite consonant with his surroundings, may be wholly unsuited to the child of American environment and tradition. But after all, is this special problem of retardation to be solved by giving the children more time in school? Some degree at least, of the backwardness which Dr. Perkins finds in American boys and girls, many experienced teachers will attribute, not so much to a too brief school year, as to the poorly arranged programs of study forced upon the elementary schools. After all, education is a process of training. Training implies concentration, and the attempt made in our schools to concentrate the child's mind upon six, seven or eight poorly correlated subjects, is an attempt to do the impossible. The result is not concentration, but dissipation and fatigue. Against the drag of an overloaded plan of studies, a teacher of the highest type can occasionally produce excellent results, but even the best efforts of a merely average teacher can not be expected to overcome this handicap. A thorough revision of the curriculum, rather than a new horarium seems to be called for, if we are to lessen this retardation. Let us build our railroad before we begin to worry about the time-table. P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

The Law and Lazarus

Lazarus, our unowned, disfigured brother, lies without the gates. Crumbs are his living wage; dogs, his medical attendants. He is not a pretty sight. He offends the esthetic eye. His unmannerly presence comes between our nobility and the wind. Plainly, something must be done for, or with, Lazarus. But what?

"Let us pass some new laws," proposes the sociologist, as he gazes at the wreck. "This Lazarus, as is obvious, is beyond our help. But there is hope for the future. Let us remove by force of law, the conditions which led Lazarus to this sorry pass."

"New laws!" straightway sniffs your old-line charity worker. "We have too many laws as it is. For all your laws remedial and punitive, such as he are inevitable. Let us offer Lazarus a dollar and an old coat: let us bid him hobble off to the nearest alms-house, and there shrive himself like a Christian man against death. Come, Lazarus!" And he gives him an arm, while the sociologist shrinks back for the moment for fear of infection.

Which of the two has proposed the fitter method of procedure? A difficult question, in the solution of which a brief biographical note may aid. Lazarus, as we know, saw nothing but evil things in his days, and yet he began life, a healthy young workingman, with the fairest of prospects. The seeds of the disease which at last carried him off, were implanted during his apprenticeship in a white-lead factory, which for the sake of larger dividends, dispensed with the necessary sanitary devices. At least, so I have heard; but another report says that he contracted the affliction, then generally termed "leprosy," in a match-factory. The records are not clear; but at all events, the progress of the disease was quite slow, in fact, for some years altogether imperceptible. Lazarus had married, and everything was happiness in the little cottage which he hoped some day to call his own. Suddenly wages dropped, owing to certain combinations which the captains of finance were mobilizing, and with the drop came a necessary recession from the modest standards of living in Lazarus' family. Ere long they were forced to take up their residence in a tenement. The surroundings were all that they should not be. We need not detail them. An unusually hot summer—and how hot it can get in a room which has no windows!—coupled with the use of embalmed milk, and the younger of the two children, sickly from babyhood, dropped out of the fight for life. Lazarus himself was far from well. He coughed a great deal, had no appetite, and ugly sores began to appear all over his hands and face. Often he was obliged to "lay off" for a few days, and soon the financial situation became alarming. The wife had never been herself since the "littlest one" went. Worry about Lazarus and the incessant struggle to keep the two little rooms they called home, still further weakened her powers of resistance, and in that bitter winter, when Lazarus finally lost his position in the white-lead factory, God's finger touched her, too, and she went out to be once more with her heart of hearts, the "littlest one."

By this time, Lazarus knew too well that the deadly poison of powdered lead had worked itself into his very fibre. The little home was broken up. A kindly neighbor took the older child under her care, but there were many hungry mouths to feed, and after a time the girl was sent to an institution in a far county. Lazarus never saw her again. He went about from village to village in the neighborhood, trying to work at odd jobs, and managing to subsist on the crusts of the poor. He was getting feeble, and was almost blind. That day when he fell near the gates of Dives, he was very near to death. But in that busy manufacturing town, no one heeded him until the sociologist and the old-line charity worker, themselves tired out after a hard day's work, the one in compiling statistics and examining proposed legislation, the other in distributing old clothes and excellent advice, drove off the pitying dogs, and proceeded to plan for him, each after the manner of his kind. Like many of the poor, Lazarus was fairly certain of a decent burial, if nothing else, from the agents of organized charity, who so often are in only at the death.

But what bearing has the law on the case of Lazarus? What can be said for the claim of the sociologist? With certain reservations, very much. Aristotle held that the state exists that man himself may exist, fitly, nobly. Leo XIII taught in more than one Encyclical, that it is the business of the state to provide efficiently for the welfare of man in those things in which he can not reasonably provide for himself. Indirectly, too, the state can and must foster religion, but for this end it can not legislate. The general principle, all will readily admit. Discord arises, only when changing times and circumstances necessitate a change in the machinery which the state has hitherto employed to attain its end. Upon this broad principle, has been based much of what is termed the modern preventive and remedial legislation, designed to remove as far as possible, untoward conditions affecting life and morals, and to apply a sane and gentle remedy to the cure of those who have been affected by social and industrial evils, as yet beyond the law's control.

The instance which has been raised in the present case, confessedly of minor importance, is the duty of the state to secure proper safeguards for the worker in dangerous trades. To many, this very proposal now generally adopted, once smacked of socialism, or at least, undue paternalism, when in reality, it was but the state's belated awakening to its duty. On the other hand, there is grave danger that the state, in its social legislation, may infringe upon the prerogatives of the spiritual society, the Church, and upon the inalienable rights of the individual. To blind ourselves to this danger would be folly, in view of the marriage and other laws now in force in certain American States. While the validity of the principle enunciated by Leo XIII can not be impugned, an exaggerated notion of its extent, or an unwise application of law logically based upon it, must result in a despotism immeasurably more vicious than the evils which the state is endeavoring to remove. All this is true. And yet it is no argument against a just regulation by the state when needed, of the relations of men in social and commercial life. It may be asked why the law should be invoked to readjust, for instance, the strained relations of capital and labor. Will not religion suffice for this purpose? Yes, if it could be brought to bear upon the case. But capital and labor alike are often deaf not only to public opinion, but to the most urgent pleading of religion. Statute law is a club, a scourge, held in reserve for men who can not be reached in other ways. Admittedly, it is at best but a poor method of securing social justice. It does not reach the source of the evil, man's rebellious will, but it can often rescue the victims of oppression, and by its deterrent effects, make possible the ascent to higher conditions. Not public opinion, to cite a practical case, not religion alone, but the engine of the law, put in motion by religion, brought the children out of the English mines a century ago, miserable shrinking beings, some of whom had never seen the clear light of the sun, beings human in nature only, and not in manners, and scarcely reclaimable to civilization. And we have had similar instances nearer home, and still have.

But law can be enforced only when backed by public opinion. "You can not go any faster," President Wilson recently reminded the members of the American Bar Association, "you can not go any faster than you can advance the moral judgments of the mass." Ultimately then, the reform of social and economic conditions must be the work of religion which alone can advance these moral judgments. "If there be any remedy for the evils of the world," we are taught by Leo XIII, "it can be only in a return to Christian life and manners." But until Christianity has leavened the world, certain insolent powers in the social and industrial world must be held in check by the state, reflecting in its law the spirit of Christianity. In this is seen at once the law's efficiency, and its necessary limitations.

Doubtless the old-line charity worker erred when he denied all value to preventive social measures embodied by law, and stated his faith in methods of immediate relief alone. But he recognized the higher truth, which modern sociology persistently ignores, that man has a supernatural end. Let us strive to do away with all social injustice by every lawful means. Let us seek to prevent and succor poverty and suffering, in the spirit of the Divine Almoner, who, in the days of his flesh, had care for the temporal wants of His people. But, while we can not fully understand, let us in our most earnest striving to prevent human misery, admit that suffering has its appointed place in the divine economy. Many a man who like Lazarus received only evil things in this world, and submitted, not in weak despair, but in the sublimity of an abiding faith which sees God in the hand that chastens, has gone to God, because of the pain and sorrow that led him to the gates of Dives. And a nobler example is found in Him who, having joy set before Him, chose the Cross, despising the shame.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Czar and the Holy Synod have appointed Eudokim (Meschersky), formerly Bishop of Kashir and Auxiliary Bishop of Tula, Russia, to be the Russian Orthodox Archbishop of New York, Aleutia and North America. Archbishop Eudokim was born in 1871, and was a professor in the Ecclesiastical Academy at Moscow before his elevation to the Episcopate. They have also appointed Rev. Alexander Nemolovsky, a Russian Orthodox monk who has been in the United States about twelve years, to be the Bishop of Winnipeg and Canada. There are said to be 100 orthodox churches and chapels in Canada, many of them composed of Galician and Bukovinian former Uniate Ruthenians.

As an incorrect census of the Society of Jesus has been published in a number of secular and religious papers, the following figures may be of interest. On January 1, 1914, the Society numbered throughout the world, 8,262 priests, 4,481 scholastics and 4,151 lay-brothers; in all, 16,894 members. Of this number, 2,183 priests, 429 scholastics and 1,027 lay-brothers, totaling 3,639, are on the foreign missions. In the United States, including Alaska and the Philippines, there are 2,676 Jesuits. Of these, 1,211 are priests, 910 scholastics and 555 lay-brothers. These are divided among four Provinces, Maryland-New York, with 895 members; Missouri, with 859; California, with 404, and New Orleans, with 253. In addition to these, 265 Jesuits, mostly members of European provinces, are working in the Philippines, in Colorado and New Mexico. The annual increase of the Society in the United States on January 1, 1914, was 58, and of the whole Society, 180.

The State Minimum Wage Committee promulgated an order on October 23, which will affect all employers of women and minors in Minnesota. Remuneration is to be based, according to the order, on the necessary weekly living wage. In cities of the first class the mercantile wage is to be $9.00, the manufacturing wage, $8.75. In cities of the second, third and fourth classes, the wages are to be $8.50 and $8.25 respectively, and outside the cities, $8.00. The mercantile classification includes women and minors employed in all mercantile lines, office-help, waitresses and hair-dressers. The manufacturing and mechanical division embraces in addition, telegraph and telephone help, laundry workers, dry cleaners' employes, and lunchroom or hotel help. Whether or not the order will prove practicable, will depend largely upon the thoroughness with which the committee has performed its preliminary investigations, and upon its legal hold on the employer. The Minnesota experiment will be watched with much interest.

The old-time Know-Nothing scarecrow has again been set up in the political field by the self-styled "Guardians of Liberty." These worthies recently undertook to teach the good people of New York how to vote, but they made the mistake of putting the names of Justice Seabury, a Protestant, and Mr. Oscar Straus, a Jew, on the list of candidates whom they wished to endorse. Mr. Seabury promptly replied:

> I seek the support of the citizens on my record as a judge. I have nothing but contempt for the so-called Sons of Liberty who seek to raise so despicable an issue as religious prejudice. I repudiate any assistance offered on such grounds.

Mr. Straus was even more emphatic in his disavowal of this set of bigots:

> I desire to protest against, as I deeply resent, such an un-American effort. I would far rather be defeated a hundred times than be elected by such methods. I would have addressed this letter to the so-called "Guardians of Liberty" but who are in fact the Enemies of Liberty, but as they are apparently a secret organization, I am unable to find their address.

"Who compiles the campaign literature of the 'Guardians of Liberty'?" asks the New York Sun. "I am old enough to remember," said Mr. Henry Watterson in a recent communication to the press, "when it was argued that the Pope might some dark night swim the Atlantic, and lead an Irish insurrection against the native Americans." The "Guardians of Liberty" are responsible for statements even more absurd than that cited by Mr. Watterson. "But to this owlish output of superstition and bigotry," remarks the New York Sun, "there is but one fitting answer. Don't be fools, or if you must be fools, do not assume that all the people are fools."

The connection of manners with the compilation of a National Directory of Catholic Charities, while not obvious, is made perfectly plain by a few gentle remarks penned by Dr. Kerby in the Catholic World for November. This directory is needed badly, how very badly, is known to every Catholic social worker. Two years ago the National Conference undertook to supply the need. After the expenditure of valuable time, much labor and some money, the Conference announces the suspension of its efforts. It has met an insuperable obstacle, lack of manners. Those concerned, simply refused to answer polite inquires, in no wise touching upon confidential matters, put and re-put by the Conference.

> As a result of the most persevering efforts, the files of the National Conference show at this date that complete information is on hand from ten dioceses; incomplete information is on hand from fifty-three dioceses; there is no information whatever from thirty-two dioceses. Out of a total of over a thousand institutions in charge of religious in the United States, information is on hand from five hundred and thirty. A last effort was made in June of this year when a personal letter was sent to five hundred and twenty-six institutions, asking that the simple directory blank be filled out and returned. But thirty-eight replies were received to the five hundred and twenty-six letters.

It is hard to see what excuse can be offered for this gross discourtesy. Complaint is frequently made by State officials, compilers of year-books, and by publishers, that as a rule, their politely worded inquries are not even acknowledged by Catholic institutions. As long as this policy is pursued, Catholic institutions can not complain that little notice is given them in State reports and books of reference. Meanwhile social workers all over the country, non-Catholic as well as Catholic, will regret that lack of manners has prevented the publication of the National Directory of Catholic Charities.

The presidential address delivered by Dr. Martin J. Synnott, to the State Medical Society of New Jersey, is of interest to all who are in touch with the modern attempt to teach morality, by imparting a surface knowledge of hygiene and sociology to youngsters in the public schools:

> Mental enlightenment, as such, is altogether inadequate to afford the moral check sought for by our hygienists. "I see the better and follow the worse," said Ovid. Sex instruction does not necessarily bring about self-restraint. It may impart light, but it does not impart power. And it is precisely an increase of moral potency that is essentially called for. We should teach the children the Commandments of God rather than the physiology of sex, and emphasize morals more than hygiene. What instruction is to be given, should be given in the home and by the Church.

Current theories of eugenism are worthless, Dr. Synnott thinks, since they are necessarily based upon an imperfect knowledge of biology and a still more imperfect knowledge of human nature. "After much pretended knowledge, we are just ready to admit our deep ignorance of biology. Many a weakly child has grown up to be a very valuable factor for the race. Newton was so delicate that only by the greatest care and solicitude did his mother succeed in keeping him alive." Dr. Synnott's remarks recall an even stronger passage in Smith's "Social Pathology": "The names are legion of those men of great talent whose works have glorified human life, and who yet were born into ill-fitting bodies which soon broke down under the tasks of life, but not before genius had done its work." The Blessed Curé D'Ars and the "Little Flower," to recall two great names at random, would have failed in the physical tests set by modern pseudo-science, conditioning the right to live. In fact, it is doubtful, whether under certain laws now in force in a few American communities, the saintly parents of the "Little Flower," could have secured a marriage license. And yet the spirit of high endeavor instilled into millions of minds by the very memory of a simple, holy child and a venerable priest, has done infinitely more for the "perfecting of the race," than any theory which has yet issued from the laboratories of those self-styled scientists, whose fundamental and most unscientific error is their refusal to allow for the fact that man is something essentially different from the brute.

The death of the American missionary, the Rev. L. L. Conrardy, in Hong-Kong on August 24, leaves the whole world poorer for the loss of one well worthy to take his place with Vincent de Paul, Damien, and all other heroic pioneers of charity. Father Conrardy was the friend and companion of Damien, and from him was drawn the inspiration of devoting his life to the Chinese lepers who are even more neglected than their afflicted brethren of Hawaii. To help them more effectually, Father Conrardy took a degree in medicine, and returning to China, was so successful in his charitable enterprise, that at the time of his death, the leper colony at Shek-Lung numbered over seven hundred inmates. Devoted to the lepers, this wonderful old man was interested in everything that tended to the good of souls and the glory of God. Only ten days before his death, he wrote a letter to AMERICA, full of praise and encouragement, enclosing his subscription for the next two years. "You can count on me for the rest of my days," he wrote. "If I could have my way, every English-speaking Catholic in the world would be provided with a copy of AMERICA." The holy end of this apostle of the lepers came, not as he had hoped among his lepers, but rather suddenly at the hospital in Hong-Kong.

AMERICA asks the prayers of its readers for this great soul, and hopes that all who were privileged to help Father Conrardy by their alms during his life-time, will not forget his successor, the Rev. G. M. Desmazières, who with equal courage is continuing the work at the asylum at Shek-Lung.

Longmans' New Books

Books by Monsignor R. H Benson

Vexilla Regis

A Book of Devotions and Intercessions on behalf of all our Authorities, our Soldiers and Sailors, our Allies, the Mourners and Destitute, and all affected by the War. Arranged, Translated and Compiled by Mgr. Benson. [Immediately.

Old Testament Rhymes.....net, $0.75
Paper Covers, net, $0.40

"This new book is an artistic triumph, beautifully bound. It is just suited to catch the eye and impress the whole child. The analysis of the sacred events embraces all the great events of the Old Testament." Tablet.

A Child's Rule of Life.....net, $0.75
Paper Covers, net, $0.40
The Cost of a Crown.....net, $1.00
Confessions of a Convert....net, $1.20
The Friendship of Christ....net, $1.20
The Maid of Orleans.....net, $1.00
A Mystery Play..... $0.90
Non - Catholic Denominations .....net, $1.20
Papers of a Pariah.....net, $1.25
Paradoxes of Catholicism...net, $1.25

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM & STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

The Coward Shoe

"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

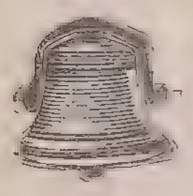
Exercise is as necessary to the feet,as to the arms. Coward"ARCH EXERCISER" Shoe (flexible shank) developes the foot naturally, giving strength, elasticity and endurance to the muscles of the arch and ankle.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE
JAMES S. COWARD
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING DIRECT FROM MILLS

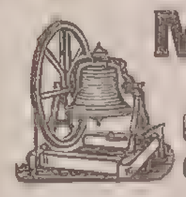
SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.



SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium



For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

FOR THE MAN WHO DOESN'T DRINK

WHY buy insurance where you have to pay the extra risk taken on the life of the drinker, when the

AMERICAN TEMPERANCE LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION
253 Broadway, New York City

can give temperance people the very safest kind of insurance at a cost far below that possible by companies where the membership is promiscuous? A postal card with your age will bring you an interesting proposition and a money saver.

S. WILSON, Secretary Home Office, 253 Broadway, New York

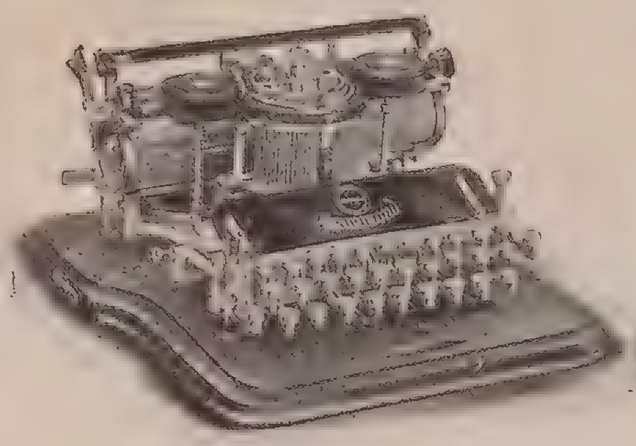
Tel. phones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE



Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST.. NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The

MULTIPLEX HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

Important Multiplex Hammond Users

President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River New York, N. Y.

BIND YOUR COPIES OF
AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week

In Book Form For Future Reference

"BIG BEN" BINDER Is handsome and durable
Opens flat to any page

Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.
I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "BIG BEN" BINDER

NAME ..... CITY .....

STREET ..... STATE .....

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

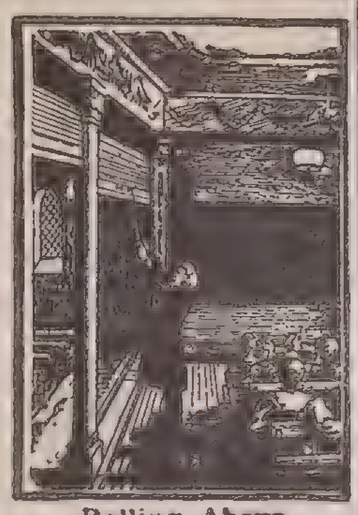
For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

Rolling at Side



Wilson's Rolling Partitions

MADE TO ROLL OVERHEAD OR FROM SIDE

A marvelous convenience and most effective method for dividing large rooms in Churches and School Buildings into small rooms, and vice versa; made from various kinds of wood; sound proof and air tight; easily operated and lasting. Made also with Blackboard surface. Fitted to new and old buildings. Used in over 25,000 Churches and Public Buildings.

Write for Partition Catalogue A.

JAS. G. WILSON MFG. CO,
3 & 5 W. 29th St. New York

Rolling Above

ALSO VENETIAN BLINDS, WOOD BLOCK FLOORS, AND ROLLING STEEL SHUTTERS

ARMY AUCTION BARGAINS

Saddles	$3.00 up	Army Revolvers	$1.65 up
Bridles	.90 "	" B-L Rifles	.98 "
Team Harness	21.85 "	" Swords	.35 "
Leggings, pair	.15 "	" 7 Shot Carbine	3.50 "
Tents	2.85 "	New Uniforms	1.50 "

Colts Cal. 45 Revolver $7.45. Ctgs. 1c each. 15 Acres Government Auction Bargains illustrated and described in 420 large page wholesale and retail cyclopedia catalogue, mailed 25 cents East and 30 cents West of the Mississippi River.

Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York

STORIES WITH A SUGGESTION

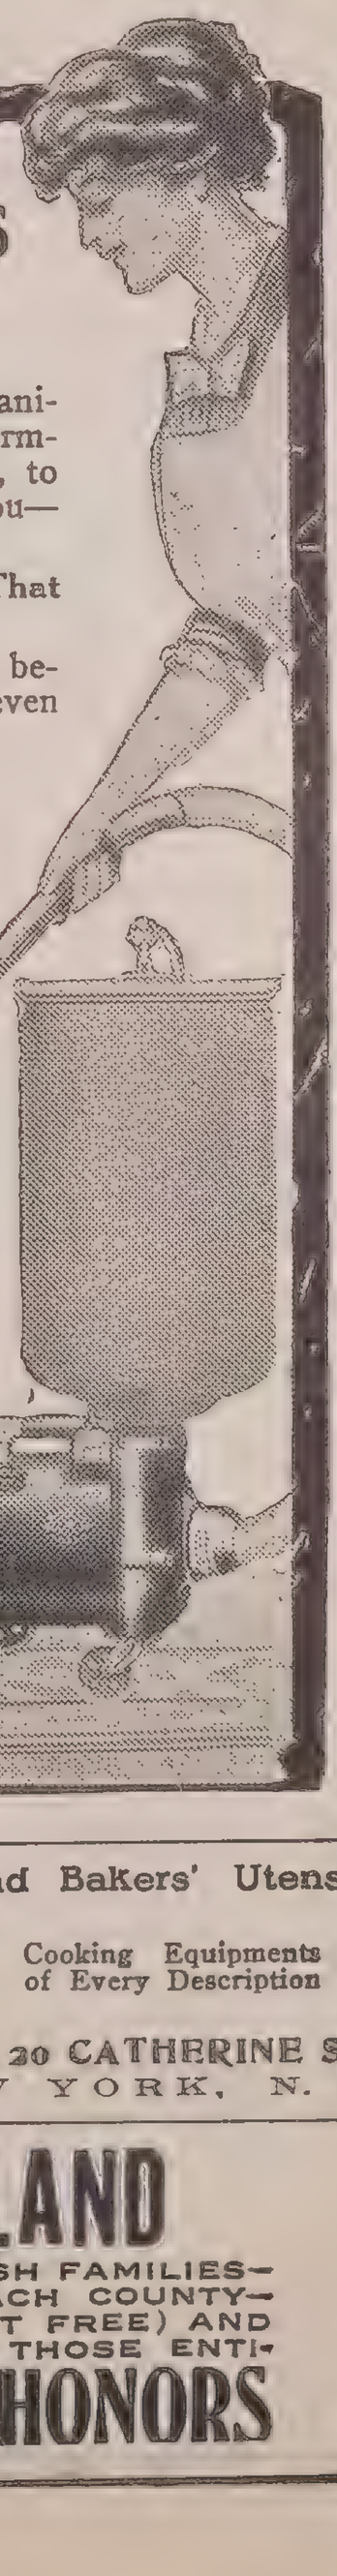
and other articles suitable for a boy or girl comprises the monthly grist of THE CHILD APOSTLE. It is a children's magazine published in the hope of cultivating unselfishness in the young folks. Your boy or girl will like it. Sample copies free. Fifty cents yearly. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:



Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box X, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

Own The Cleaner That Gives The Greatest Service

The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is the most sanitary because it gets everything, from microscopic, germ-laden dust that low-powered cleaners can not reach, to heavy refuse they can not lift. It runs lightly beside you—you don't have to drag it or push it on a stick.

"It's The Speed and Volume of Rushing Air That Count."

The Bissell has highest efficiency at the tool mouth, because it moves more air—at greater speed—than even built-in cleaners costing five and six times as much.

It is now giving complete satisfaction in many Churches, large Office Buildings, Hotels, Theatres, etc., as well as in private homes of all sizes.

No "extras" to buy for any sort of cleaning. We give FREE an Emery and a Buffing Wheel for sharpening knives, polishing silver, etc. Fittings for washing machines, bread mixers, light lathes, etc., furnished at low cost.

Let It Do Your Cleaning for a Month. We will pay the freight and let you test this wonderful Cleaner, and its handy 1/3 H. P. Motor, for one full month for a ridiculously small payment which you may apply on the machine. But there's no obligation.

Easy payments if you wish. Write to-day.

THE BISSELL MOTOR CO.

344 Huron Street

Toledo, Ohio

Note: The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is made and guaranteed by The F. Bissell Co., Toledo, Ohio, who have no connection with the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR

HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, OCT., 22

NEW ENGLAND THOUGHT

BY MICHAEL J. MAHONEY, S.J.

The author makes a searching study of "New England's soul," the influence of which on the development of our national character has been so strong. In this number, too, is reprinted Father James J. Daly's excellent paper on "Calvinism and Our Literature," and there is added a short article on "Pragmatism." Those who wonder why Protestantism is disintegrating so rapidly in this country will find the reasons explained in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1906

15. I. Object of Federation. Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D.
II. Divorce. Hon. Daniel J. Kenefick

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
12. Making of a Saint.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
20. The Mass and the Reformation. J. Canon Moyes
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.
12. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. Charles D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocylonometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
18. The Index. Peter Finlay, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on their purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
Hudson, Jay & Staple Sts., New York, N. Y.

THE FRANK MEANY CO PRINTERS
Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.
"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.
Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.
LUDIN, RAYNER, BOLEN & BYRNE BEVERAGES.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

CATHOLIC
MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

Is prepared to furnish Parochial Schools, Convents, Hospitals, Asylums, Clubs, etc., at the LOWEST RATES and the MOST REASONABLE TERMS. Projecting Machines and strictly censored Films of Religious, Educational, Dramatic, Comic and other subjects.

THIS NEW WORLD WIDE FEATURE of Education and Amusement, PROVIDES a source of REVENUE, far beyond the cost of installing and maintenance.

Let me tell you more about it, also rates, terms, etc.

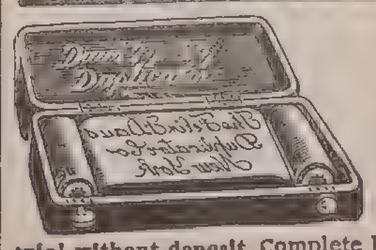
JOHN J. McGRANE, President,
505 Fifth Avenue, New York City

What Shall I Be?
A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE
By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth 30 cents — Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70 — 12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50 — 100 Copies $11.25
Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York



FOR SALE:
A LIBRARY of approximately
4,000 volumes
Carefully indexed, about one-half English, one-half German, Catholic authors in the majority, but many standard works, history, travel, etc., well represented. Willing to sell either the German or English portion, preferably both. Price VERY reasonable. Would make an excellent foundation for a parish or private library. Address LIBRARY, AMERICA, 55 E. 83d St., New York.

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA
The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.
A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.
Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM
EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each
Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds
E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

CLEANLINESS OF OPERATION

is one of the strong features that has helped to earn the present world-wide reputation and endorsement of the Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator. No printer's ink used, thus avoiding soiled hands and clothing. No expensive supplies. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Sent on ten days' trial without deposit. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4x13 inches, (contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back Duplicating surface which can be used over and over again). Price $5.00
Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

FOUNDED IN 1847

The Alma Mater of numerous prominent ecclesiastics, professional and business men.

XAVIER HIGH SCHOOL
30 West 16th Street, N. Y. City
A SELECT SCHOOL FOR BOYS
Conducted by the Jesuits

Registered by the Regents of the University of the State of New York.

The most accessible school in Manhattan

Near Hudson Tunnels, Sixth Avenue L, Surface Lines and Subway.

Classical Course, Military Drill under the supervision of a U. S. Army Officer, Rifle Practice, Reading-room and Library, Dramatics, Indoor and Outdoor Games and Sports.

XAVIER GRAMMAR SCHOOL

Offers a four years' course preparatory to High School. Separate building and playgrounds.

Classes will be resumed on Sept. 14

For catalogue, address
REV. THOMAS F. WHITE, S.J.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....

ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

IT is good to be in a school that is like a big country home—where 300 acres of field and wood call you out of doors, where the things of the mind are the daily talk, and where the associations train you in a thousand little things. 2 hours from Cincinnati. . . . . Write for our little Brown Booklet.

SCHOOL OF THE BROWN COUNTY URSULINES, St. Martin, Brown County, O.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law — 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine — Fordham.

School of Pharmacy — Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't.

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty

One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Mt. St. Mary's College and Academy

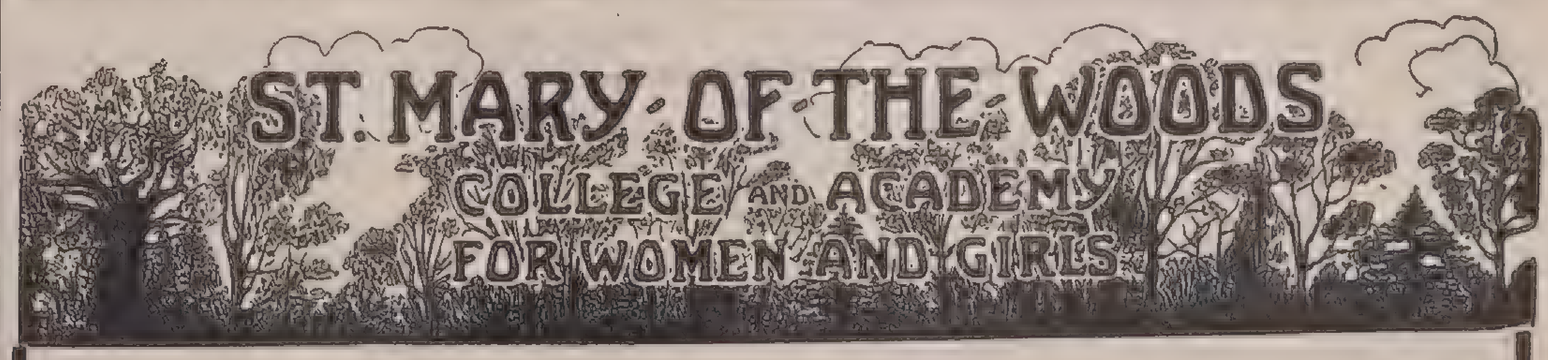
PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. College, Academic and Preparatory Courses. Exceptional advantages in Music, Art and Domestic Science.

Address Sister Directress.

St. Viator College

KANKAKEE, ILLINOIS



Boarding College and High School for Young Men

Limited to 400 Students

Board and Tuition, $250 per annum

Catalogue sent free

Very Rev. J. P. O'Mahoney, C.S.V., President

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

No. 1813

Height 8¾ inches.

Sterling silver, gold plated, $80.00. Silver cup and paten, gold plated, $60.00.

Other models from $18.00 and upwards.

Illustrated book on request.

The W. J. Feeley Company are metal workers and have a Factory employing over two hundred, who are skilled craftsmen devoting their talents to wares intended for Altar Service or Sanctuary requirements.

If you intend to place an order for new wares, write for their designs and prices.

They are in a position to give you some interesting information.

THE W. J. FEELEY CO.

347 Fifth Avenue, New York City

183-203 Eddy St., Providence, R. I.

KENEDY'S NEW BOOKS

THE HOLY EUCHARIST IN ART

BY P. D. CORBINIAN WIRZ, O.S.B.

7½ x 10. Cloth. 97 Illustrations $1.00 net.

An adequate explanatory text accompanies these good reproductions of paintings dealing with the Blessed Sacrament from the catacombs to very modern times. The volume makes a very good gift book.—AMERICA.

MUSTARD TREE

BY FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J.

16mo. Cloth. 60 cents net.

Three dozen pungent essays for spirit and life on practical subjects, all short, crisp and entertaining.

ODDSFISH!

BY MGR. ROBERT HUGH BENSON

12mo. Cloth. $1.35 net.

Admirers of the author's historical stories will welcome this new one which gives a vivid picture of the court of Charles II of England. The story is a fitting companion to "Come Rack! Come Rope!"

THE RED ASCENT

BY ESTHER W. NEILL

12mo. Cloth. Frontispiece in Color $1.00 net.

A splendid story of American life. Cheerful determination, clever character drawing and charming up-to-date dialogue make an interesting and thoroughly enjoyable novel.

P. J. KENEDY & SONS

44 Barclay Street New York

From all Catholic Booksellers

IN PRESS

LIFE OF VENERABLE PHILIPPINE DUCHESNE

Mother Duchesne, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83rd STREET

NEW YORK

Representatives

WANTED

NOW IS THE TIME

AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

WANTS

Bright, intelligent men or women in cities and towns to handle its constantly increasing circulation.

Agents do not have to go out of their home towns to do a good business, as America is a national publication.

Write for details,

Circulation Bureau

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 East 83rd Street New York, N. Y.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 5 } NOVEMBER 14, 1914 { PRICE 10 CENTS
WHOLE No. 292 } { $3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin Nov. 4, p. m.-Nov. 10, a. m.—A Deadlock in the West—Belgium's Danger—German Defeat—Austrian Reverses—The Fall of Tsing-Tao—Campaign Against Turkey. France: Church and State at Paris—Education in War Time. Germany: German Concentration Camps. Great Britain: Aliens, Hostile and Friendly. Ireland: The Volunteers and Mr. Redmond. Mexico: The Crisis and Two Affidavits—First Affidavit—Second Affidavit 105-108

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Backward Children—The Great Message—Woman and Religion—The War and the Revival of Catholicism in France—A Catholic Daily Newspaper—London in War Time.....109-117

COMMUNICATIONS
The Abolition of the Greek-Catholic Church by Russia—One Vote Lost—The Italian Question—Filling the Gap—Help for Mexico—Indifference is Impossible—Reparation for the Outrages in Mexico—"Lest We Forget"—Dispassionate Readers—Germany's Bearing in the War—Delirious Gallomania—Religious Conditions of the Italians.....117-121

EDITORIALS
Patriots to a Patriot—Delicacy of Conscience—Votes for Women—China and Chicago—Current "Literature"—Talking to Oneself..122-124

LITERATURE
The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry, III, Katharine Tynan-Hinkson.

REVIEWS: Oddsfish!—Ancient Greece—Poems—Gideon's Band—The Story of Greece—Good Stories for Great Holidays—The Seven Champions of Christendom—The Home Book of Great Paintings—Little Women Letters from the House of Alcott—Statuta Dioecesis Oklahomensis.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Lord Clandonnell"—"The Prophet's Wife"—"Handicapped"—"The Doers"—"Five Birds in a Nest"—"Shipmates"—"Mustard Seed"—The Catholic Mind—"The Witch"—Translation of "Summa Theologica"—General King's Biography of Ulysses S. Grant—Studies—Cecil Chesterton's Coming Lecture Tour—Ernest Dowson.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....124-129

EDUCATION
Salvation by Knowledge.....129, 130

SOCIOLOGY
The Modern School of Philanthropy....130, 131

NOTE AND COMMENT
Too Many Foolish Laws—French Anti-Clerical Skulkers—"Freak" Laws—The Propagation of the Faith—Some Sunday Programs—An International "Dry" Campaign—Homicides in the United States—Growth of Malthusianism in America—An Episcopalian Rhyme of All Saints 131, 132

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—The situation in France and Belgium still remains unchanged. There has been no cessation of the German offensive, but the stubbornness of the resistance offered by the Allies has everywhere prevented their advance. In Belgium, especially, the losses of the Germans, which are said to be very great, have forced them to give up, to a certain extent, their possessions along the coast, and it has been rumored that the reoccupation of Ostend by the Allies will be announced at no very distant date. The river Yser, which for so long has been the scene of such desperate fighting, has been abandoned by the Germans, who have transferred the main point of their attack further south. Dixmude, Roulers, Ypres, Lille, la Bassée, and Arras, continue to witness the most desperate struggles, but the net results of the wanton shedding of human blood are practically negligible. What is worse, there seems to be no prospect of a truce to the fighting. General Joffre undoubtedly has the situation well in hand, and seems to be able to bring reenforcements to any point just as needed. There is a growing admiration for his generalship, and a confidence that he will be able to resist any attacks that can be made. It is said that he is quite content to allow the Germans to assume the offensive, as it involves costly losses which must eventually so weaken even their perfect war machine that at last human nature will be able to stand it no longer. He is, therefore, biding his time until the Germans have become utterly exhausted. He was willing to wait at the beginning of the war until the opportune moment arrived, and no one is likely to forget how severely he struck when he judged that it had come. That moment, however, to judge from present indications, is a long way off. So far from diminishing the fierceness of their assaults on the French lines, the Germans are massing larger bodies of troops at many points, and are making more violent attempts to carry the strong positions of their opponents than at any previous time. They seem to be bent on clearing every man out of Belgium, and to be prepared to be very prodigal with human life in order to accomplish their purpose. It has been pointed out that the struggle is every day receding further from the possibility of a crushing defeat for either side, and that as a consequence, a solution by force of arms has also become less and less likely. Germany, it is claimed, forsees the time when the dispute must be submitted to discussion, and wishes to be in a position in which she can insist that she retain the territory she has won. This would mean, of course, that Belgium would become a German province. It is incredible that the Allies, while they can fight at all, should abandon their heroic friend, without whom they would long since, in all probability, have been brought to their knees; and yet expediency has before this countenanced the sacrifice of friends. Whatever may the truth of the suggestion, and it is pure speculation, that some such motive is behind the present reckless waste of human life, it is certain that at no time of the war have the German efforts been more violent than they are at present in Belgium. There is absolutely no end in sight.

Bulletin Nov. 4 p. m. -Nov. 10 a. m.

A Deadlock in the West

Belgium's Danger

German Defeat

The thoroughness of the defeat which Russia has inflicted on Germany and Austria is becoming more apparent every day. Last week the Germans in Central Poland were occupying a line that stretched from Lodz to Radom, they have now fallen back to the river Warthe. Not only have they been obliged to retire from Radom and Lodz, but they have lost Petrikau and Kielce as well, and also Sandomierz, which being situated at the juncture of the San and Vistula rivers is a point of great strategic value. Dispatches from Petrograd claim that the Germans have been so badly beaten that they can not reenforce the weak parts of their line and that the Russian advance can not be stemmed. Whether or not this is true remains to be seen; so far at any rate the Germans have been able to retire in order. It was believed that they intended to stand firm when they reached the line of defence that they are said to have constructed from Thorn to Cracow, but it is now reported that they have failed to do so and that the Russians are already across the border. The Germans are certainly much farther back than they were at the beginning of October, and their advance on Warsaw has been as complete a failure as their rush on Paris. Both were brilliant and spectacular, but neither has gained for them any lasting advantage. In Northern Poland also, they have been forced to retreat until they are within their own border. Invasions of East Prussia and Silesia are not unlikely.

Austrian Reverses

The Austrians, too, have shared in the defeat, and the dispatches are again beginning to read as they did in September. Czernowitz has been retaken by the Czar's soldiers, and Jaroslau, and parts of the San river; and they claim to have advanced as far as the Nidzicka river, some thirty-five miles from Cracow. The Austrians once more seem to be unable, in spite of the most vigorous efforts, to hold back the march of the Russians. There is this difference, however, that the Austrians are no longer said to be disorganized. It remains true, nevertheless, that they have never been able to withstand for any length of time a determined Russian attack; the likelihood, therefore, of their doing so now is very slight, especially as Germany has just at present more than she can do to take care of herself. Vienna, however, has made the statement that the Austrian retirement is part of a general plan necessitated by the falling back of the armies in Poland and not by the force of the Russian attacks in Galicia.

The Fall of Tsing-Tao

What the papers with surprising unanimity have called the most picturesque incident in the war, has come to a close. The fortress of Tsing-Tao has capitulated and with it the whole Protectorate of Kiao-Chow has passed from the Germans. The defence, which lasted 74 days, was much shorter than was expected. It was probably abandoned to save useless expenditure of life, since its final surrender was inevitable. The arrow is no longer "pointed at the heart of Japan," and Germany has been ousted from her stronghold in the Far East. It is hard to overestimate the commercial loss to Germany involved in the passing of Kiao-Chow from her hands. Since its acquisition in the year 1897 German commerce has made immense strides in the Pacific; and Japan is rejoicing at having driven one of her most formidable rivals from Eastern waters. She is pledged to restore the captured province to China; and her own native spokesmen have had no hesitation in assigning the reasons for her readiness to do so. What she covets above all is an isolated position in the Far East. She has no desire to have the European nations as her neighbors; and she realizes that any further acquisition of Chinese territory by herself, would mean further acquisitions by other countries. This would be very detrimental to her interests, as it would involve the necessity of large additions to her army and navy and a proportionate increase in the taxation of her people. It is thought probable that the British troops, which have been cooperating with Japan, will be transferred to Egypt. The three squadrons of warships that have been detained at Kiao-Chow are also free, so that the Emden will need a doubly charmed life from now on, if she is to continue her daring depredations on British shipping.

Campaign Against Turkey

Russian operations against Turkey are slowly but surely gathering momentum. Already four Russian army corps, mainly composed of troops hitherto stationed in the Caucasus, have penetrated into Armenia and have won minor engagements at Passine, Diadine and Bajaset, the last named place being situated at the foot of Mt. Ararat; they have also driven back an offensive movement carried on by the Kurds in the district north of Kara kilissa, and are now taking possession of all the territory in the vicinity of Erzerum. Further south, Russian officers are said to be in command of a native force that is besieging Van. The Armenians who have no reason to be attached to Turkey, are reported to be everywhere receiving the Russians with open arms, and to be furnishing them supplies of every kind. Roman dispatches are responsible for the report that the Russian fleet in the Black Sea is bombarding the Turkish towns of Zunguldak and Kuzlu. The British have taken Akabah, east of the el Tih desert, and the combined British and French fleet are reported to have silenced the forts of the Dardanelles. Their purpose, so it is declared, is to enter the sea of Marmora, capture Constantinople and the Bosporus, and then enter the Black Sea and engage the Turkish fleet. It is said that Russia will be unable to transport large bodies of troops into Turkey until the Turkish warships, and particularly the two cruisers recently acquired from Germany, which are inflicting serious damage on the Allies' shipping, have been put out of commission. England, meanwhile, is looking with a good deal of apprehension on the movements of the Turks toward the Suez Canal. It is unfortified on its eastern side, and can not be adequately protected by British warships against a daring enemy. German engineers, it is claimed, if supported by Turkish soldiers, could easily make it impassible, either by blowing up a portion of the bank or by sinking vessels in its midst. The Turkish army, now moving toward it, has been estimated at from 15,000 to 150,000 men. The position of England in Egypt will continue to be precarious until the loyalty of the Egyptian army, organized by Lord Kitchener, is assured. At the head of the Persian Gulf the fortified town of Fao was captured by Indian troops aided by British marines and British warships. Batum, a Russian town on the east shore of the Black Sea, which is being shelled by Turkish warships, is still holding out. The German cruiser Yorck came into accidental contact with a German mine in the North Sea and sunk immediately with more than 200 of her crew. All Germany is elated over a raid made by a German squadron in the vicinity of Yarmouth. That German ships should be able to menace the coast of England and get away unharmed has come as a good deal of a surprise to the world at large, which has been generally of the opinion that the German fleet was hiding and trembling for its existence.

France.—On November 6, Cardinal Amette, Archbishop of Paris, celebrated a solemn requiem Mass at Notre Dame for the officers and men who have fallen on the battlefield. While the schools and colleges of the city were represented by their official heads, the Government of this Catholic people saw fit to continue its policy of aloofness from all religious movements. Apparently, the Government considers it an extreme extension of courtesy not to forbid them. At the last moment, however, President Poincaré appointed a "personal representative," allowing it to be understood that the delegate was in no sense an official person representing the Cabinet. The wish of the Figaro, expressed some weeks since, that the Republic of France might learn from the great American Republic, that a government may without degradation take part in religious movements, remains unfulfilled. Meantime the Socialists, alarmed at the revival of religion, are clamoring against the good Sisters who are doing such heroic work for the soldiers. Thus is gratitude shown. The brawlers should be sent to the front to learn the lesson of patriotism from the thousands of priests there. An effort has been made to reopen the University of Paris and other institutions of higher learning in the capital. At Paris, the usual courses in the advanced studies are now offered, as in former years, but a great change has taken place both in the faculties and the student-groups. As practically all able-bodied men between the ages of eighteen and twenty are in the army, the students are, for the most part, elderly men and foreigners. Two hundred of the professors are also at the front, and their places have been taken by masters and lecturers on the retired list. The reply of the French universities to the universities of Germany on the cause of the war has been published, and is being read to the pupils of the high-schools and lycées. Throughout the country the elementary schools have fared better than might be expected. This no doubt is, in one way, at least, a blessing for the children: it distracts their mind from the horrors of war.

Church and State at Paris

Education in War Time

Germany.—The number of prisoners of war in the German concentration camps, as given for November 6 in a Reuter telegram, was 433,247. They are divided as follows: French, 3,138 officers and 188,618 men; Russians, 3,121 officers and 186,779 men; Belgians, 537 officers and 34,907 men; English, 417 officers and 15,730 men. Prisoners not yet encamped were not included. Reports agree in stating that the treatment of the captives has been very humane. In this connection Germany has again shown a new consideration to the French captive priests who had been forced to bear arms. They were removed from the concentration camps, at the request of the Bishop of Paderborn, and transferred to Catholic institutions. Belgian priests detained for one reason or another have similarly been housed at the Münster seminary. Great indignation had been expressed in Germany at the imprisonment in the English concentration camps of German male residents between the ages of 17 and 55. No objection was made to securing such as might be under suspicion, but the German Government insisted upon the liberation of all others. England was therefore notified through the American Ambassador that this must be done by November 5 or Germany would apply England's own method in retaliation. Unfortunately no heed was given to this remonstrance and English male subjects resident in Germany are, under the same conditions, being gathered into the concentration camp at Ruhleben.

German Concentration Camps

Great Britain.—Two problems continue to trouble the Government at home. What is to be done with aliens who may be hostile, and what disposition is to be made of the Belgian refugees? The sensational wing of the press continues to demand that all Germans and Austrians, including those recently naturalized, be interned. It is urged that while foreigners over fifty years of age may be of little use as soldiers, they may be exceedingly useful as spies. On the other hand, the police have lessened their activity in rounding up aliens, because the military authorities are unable to supply suitable quarters for their internment. The question presented by the friendly aliens is scarcely easier of solution. Hitherto the Belgian Relief Committee has hesitated to employ Belgian workingmen, on the ground that this might unsettle the English labor market. It has now taken the higher ground that unhappiness and demoralization are likely to follow complete idleness for an indefinite period, of a people trained to work, and it has been decided to introduce the Belgian refugees, as far as possible, into trades and occupations in which the native population can not readily be employed. Farming, in which it is felt the traditional Belgian skill in intensive cultivation will be very valuable, lace-making, zinc-working and diamond-cutting, are suggested as occupations in which the Belgians might be employed without injury to the English laboring classes. The Government is now conferring on the matter with a committee made up of Belgians and members of the Labor party.

Aliens, Hostile and Friendly

Ireland.—The Irish Volunteers' first National Convention, held in Dublin October 26, was attended by delegates representing 180 companies that adhered to the original organization. On the same day, Eire, a new daily paper supporting its principles, was issued. Mr. John McNeill, who was reelected president, said the movement was started for the defence of Ireland as against the Carsonites when the Government, yielding to the Orange threats, had broken their own pledges and coerced the Irish Party into accepting a partition of the country. The army mutiny had impelled Mr. Redmond to take up the movement and, unwisely, to assume control of it. When later, while the Home Rule Bill was still suspended with an Amending Bill around its neck, he urged the Volunteers to fight for England on the Continent, they had to part company with Mr. Redmond and keep the organization to its original object, to defend Ireland within its own shores. They were Irish soldiers, not imperial mercenaries. The Convention passed resolutions to that effect, and also pledging its members to resist the threatened Ballot Act, a form of temporary conscription. It was stated that Mr. Redmond had never turned over to the committee, composed in equal parts of his own nominees, any portion of the funds subscribed, but that they were receiving considerable sums from the United States. Among their supporters was the President of the American Hibernians; the President of the Irish National League of America had also seceded from Mr. Redmond on the recruiting question. Messrs. Redmond, Dillon and Devlin are still urging Irishmen to enlist, though they insist that Ireland has contributed much more than her quota to the army, that her home needs, owing to the demands of agriculture and the drainage of emigration, are pressing, and they are embarrassed by the War Office's refusal to form an Irish Brigade and grant them the facilities afforded to the Carsonites.

The Volunteers and Mr. Redmond

Mexico.—There is scarcely any need of dilating on conditions in Mexico. Suffice it to say that they could scarcely be worse. A crisis is at hand, and no doubt Carranza will soon be forced to yield to pressure. His successor will be a Villista. Meantime the "First Chief" is attempting to recover lost popularity by calling Mexicans to arms against Americans. He is also trying to persuade his countrymen that American Catholics are anxious for armed intervention. This is a calumny worthy of Carranza. It was invented in order to discredit the Church. It now seems opportune to print portions of two affidavits sworn to by two different priests, victims of the same persecution. Some names are suppressed for prudential reasons. Though the portions printed are as graphic as any parts of the fifteen or twenty other sworn affidavits in AMERICA'S possession, yet they are not as shocking as many passages that might be quoted.

The Crisis and Two Affidavits

First Affidavit

While we were all being kept in a special room, as narrated by Father ——, this Father asked permission from the officer in charge of the guard that I might leave the prison and receive medical attention, as I was suffering from a very high fever. At this request Villa became very angry, for I overheard the officer telling Villa and also heard Villa uttering very vile words saying: "Take the big goat out and shoot him." . . . One of the soldiers put a rope around my neck and led me out. . . . Then I was led to a corner of a room and a soldier pulled the rope tight around my neck and choked me until I became unconscious. . . . I recovered consciousness quickly, but the soldier again pulled the rope tight, choking me. I again lost consciousness and in coming to my senses I heard Colonel Fierro inquiring of the soldier: "Is he dead?" and I answered, shaking my head, no. "Then shoot him in the head," said Colonel Fierro, and a shot was fired over my head so near that I saw the flash, etc.

Second Affidavit

On going out of the room we were met by several soldiers who were commanded to load their rifles by Colonel Fierro, . . . then some one nicknamed Vaca told us . . . we were all sentenced to be shot. . . . Vaca then tightened the rope around my neck and with his thumb and forefinger caught me by the throat and choked me until I became unconscious. When I came to, I was lying on the floor, and when Vaca saw that I opened my eyes, he drew his revolver and pointed the same at me and fired a shot at my head. . . . He then commanded me to stand up . . . and he again caught me by the throat and choked me as before. I fell to the ground, not losing consciousness, however, and Vaca then tightened the rope around my neck and then I became unconscious. My senses returned and when Vaca saw this he again choked me. . . . On the platform of the station . . . we overheard a colonel . . . speaking in language worthy of the time of Sodom and Gomorrah. We were placed in a freight car under guard of soldiers. . . . When our train was about to leave, the Sisters sent a girl about fifteen years of age from their school, with blankets for the Fathers. Villa ordered this girl to be thrown into the car. . . . The girl, breaking loose, ran away. . . . In Paradon they put a prostitute into our car. (The rest is for the most part unfit to print.—Editor.)

Comment would detract from this narrative. Future numbers of AMERICA will contain other items bearing upon the conduct of the Mexican patriots.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Backward Children

The use of the Binet-Simon test or of any other ready made formula for the determination of the backwardness of children has always one serious drawback that must be carefully attended to, or the application of the test will do harm rather than good in a great many cases. It is that any universal measure of human beings, any criterion that is supposed to determine human ability, any examination method that has ever been invented does not make due allowances for the individual. Individuality is the most striking and significant feature of humanity. In spite of the immense number of human beings alive at any one time no two of them look alike. It is probable that no two human beings have ever been born who looked exactly alike. What we mean by looks is practically the facial features and expression. This represents only a very limited portion of the individual and yet even to this small amount no two human beings have ever exactly resembled each other. What is thus true of the human face is true of every portion of the human body. There is a general impression that the rest of the body of most people is almost identical in appearance, but just as no two human faces are absolutely similar, so no two corresponding portions of any other part of the surface of the body are the same. Anatomists even go farther and tell us that no two parts of the interior of the body are precisely alike. Blood vessels divide differently, nerves are distributed differently, tissues are differently arranged, there is no absolute anatomical type for any portion of the body. Anatomists must strike an average and expect any human being to approach that more or less closely, but every man differs from every other in every portion of his tissues quite as much as in the face. Nature has no hard and fast plan to which she is bound, but only an idea of function which she secures.

Here, then, is the most important characteristic of men, individuality. A great deal of modern education and social science seems to have a definite tendency to treat all men alike and to make identical criteria for them, above all, attempts to develop them in the same way. If it were possible to make all men alike, which fortunately it is not, the endless variety which more than anything else in the world makes life worth living from the human standpoint would be sadly interfered with. You may try to pour humanity into the same educational mould or model it by the form and pressure of its time into identicalness, but it always comes out charmingly different. These differences in their almost infinite variety are of themselves a testimony to the Infinity that creates them.

In a number of instances of the application of the Binet-Simon test that have come under my observation, directly or indirectly, the difficulty has been that some of those who applied the test with most confidence have been least well intellectually developed themselves to apply it in such a way as to respect the individuality of young people. Merely mischievous boys with tendencies to disturb others because of a certain restlessness of disposition—and in one case at least because of an ability to learn things rapidly and easily when he really wished that he had time hanging heavy on his hands—have been pronounced lacking in mentality or mental control, because the examiner had not succeeded in getting a satisfactory test. Women examiners, particularly, are likely to become impatient and then draw hasty conclusions which may affect seriously the future of an individual, though the only trouble in the case is that they have not sufficient sympathy for the individual to recognize what is the real difficulty. They can standardize ordinary mediocre children, who have been brought up in nice conventional surroundings where regard paid for what others think is the supreme ideal of existence, but they can not judge properly of the departures from this, some of which may represent eminently desirable elements of human nature.

Any one who attempts to grade backward children ought surely to know the story of Sir Walter Scott, who, while at school, as we have it on the authority of his teacher, was "an incorrigibly idle imp and who refused absolutely, when every gentleman knew some Greek, to learn even the alphabet," yet proved to be one of the geniuses of the race. It is children who are different that sometimes need more care and attention, not for their own sakes and to keep them from being nuisances to others, but for what they will subsequently accomplish for humanity, rather than the unnumbered multitude of nice conventional children who will never amount to anything in the world. Nor is it merely the poetic mind that may thus be unsubmissive to ordered teaching, but even the future scientific genius may give no hint of what is to be. In the chapter on the Irish School of Medicine, in "Makers of Modern Medicine," I have quoted—in telling the story of the famous Dr. Stokes of Dublin—a passage in which the late Sir William Stokes, himself a very distinguished physician, records in his biography of his father, that the first Sir William's apparent > indolence and disinclination to any steady methodical system of study were sources of real concern to his parents, and caused his mother especially much anxious thought. One day while reading his favorite author, Sir Walter Scott, he fell asleep, to be awakened shortly after by some warm drops falling on his face. He started up to find his mother bending over him. It was her tears that had awakened him. Stung with remorse at having been the cause of so much sorrow to his mother, whom he loved very dearly, his nature underwent an immediate and salutary change, and the dreamy, indolent boy became thereafter the ardent and enthusiastic student.

This Sir William Stokes became one of the most distinguished of nineteenth century physicians, famous for his breadth of view and for his scholarly knowledge of medicine.

We all remember the story of the ugly duckling. It was hatched among the ducks, seemed particularly awkward in its movements, so that it became the laughing stock of its companions, to its own and its foster mother's serious disturbance, until one day it discovered its true brothers and sisters in the swans and then it proved, instead of an ungainly duckling that could not by any chance be able to fit properly into its lowly surroundings among the ducks, to be one of the graceful birds of the park and not a conventional inhabitant of a poultry yard.

It not infrequently happens that children, and particularly boys between twelve and sixteen, do not mature well. Some apparently physical lack of development actually seems to keep them back for even several years. They become discouraged rather readily. Some of them have to do a great deal more work than others in order to accomplish the same tasks. For such boys there sometimes comes, about sixteen or seventeen, such a sudden efflorescence of ability that it enables them not only to catch up but to outstrip their companions, and prove that they too have real talent approaching genius. One of the best thinkers that I know has told me that he went through an experience of this kind that was very discouraging for himself and for his friends. I know of another case which occurred in one of the best educators of the country. I used to think that these were much more exceptional than they are until some of the studies made by means of the Binet-Simon test where mistakes were made, brought a series of them to my attention. Dr. Max Schlapp, who is one of the New York State Commission for the Investigation of the Feeble-minded and who has for years been occupied with this subject of backward children, has told me of a number of such cases that have been under observation and has emphasized the necessity for taking this element into account always. He has enabled many teachers to understand something of the difficulties of such boys: yet how hopeless the outlook often was.

Of course it may be said that these are only the exceptions that prove the rule. The fact of the matter is that there are so many exceptions, however, that it is dangerous as yet to attempt to formulate the rule. We do not know enough about the developing young human being to be able to set standards or make formal declarations. Many a young person who does not come up to nicely planned standards and examination tests, not only by the Binet-Simon method, but in our examination ridden education, proves to have much more in him than some of those most successful at examinations. Some people actually seem to have a special faculty for passing examinations who do not prove to have very much faculty for anything else.

We can only do harm rather than good by any premature attempt to introduce fixed standards of judgment for retardation of mental growth, or backwardness, as yet. The standard will work all right for certain cases, the judgment with regard to which could easily be made without any such formal test, but it is likely to fail in a number of those cases where judgment is most difficult, and where the supposed information obtained from a fallacious test will so readily lead astray and give us some of that most undesirable knowledge which Josh Billings so aptly called "the knowledge of things that ain't so."

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

The Great Message

To-day we are cursed by over-specialization. It is no longer enough to say to a man, "Be good." If there are a thousand ways for a man to be bad, you must tell him the thousand particular ways in which he can be good. In an age of specialists, the moralist must specialize just as much as the other scientists; otherwise very few will understand him even if they show enough interest to listen to him, which is improbable.

Perhaps that is why the social message of the Catholic Church has reached so few at the very time when every one needs it most. The old inclusive commands sound trite to many a worldly ear. What is more, the ways of giving them have, in many cases, become ineffective. To-day men expect things to be brought into their homes and daily lives. They no longer go out to seek truth or moral help.

The crazed specialists who fill our schools and colleges, who write for our magazines, who dabble in philanthropy, and lead our laborers, have no desire at all to ask the Church her opinion. If the Church has anything to say, they expect her message to be brought to them by some obliging person, and they expect it to be brought in a form they understand. This attitude of the specialists may be the result of laziness or merely of bewilderment. In any case, it is exasperating. But that does not alter the fact that it exists, and that it accounts very largely for the failure of the Church to bring her message home to these wandering souls by the old methods.

The opinion of the Church is so little known by Protestants and agnostics that they have actually come to the conclusion that she has no opinion at all. Even some Catholics are showing a lack of confidence in the Church. They themselves have come under the specialists' spell. They have heard what those outside the Church say; and being human and weak they have turned traitor.

As a matter of fact, the message of the Church was never fresher or more virile than to-day. Its very freshness and simplicity help to hide it, just as the simplicity and childlike qualities of a really great man often make him obscure. The message is so simple that the youngest child in our schools knows it by heart. "Love the Lord, thy God; and love thy neighbor as thyself for the love of God."

In this exquisitely simple command is summed up "all the law and the prophets." It is the greatest social message the world has ever known. Even if a man is an agnostic or an atheist, it is at least possible for him to love those about him. He can fulfil the human part of the message, even if he is unconscious of the divine motive.

The love which Christ preached and the Church preaches to-day is far more than mere sentiment or emotion. Your love for your fellow-men may show itself in a hundred ways, none of which could be branded as emotionalism. You can not rob a man if you love him; and you can not be indifferent or unjust to him. With love, the dishonesty, the hatred, the envy, all the evils that tear us to pieces, are impossible. The love "of the law and the prophets" is the central moral force of the universe. Its negation is decay, death, hell. The source of this love is known to naturalistic science as magnetism, its effect is called cohesion. If you destroy the cohesive bonds of a substance, say by friction, you create heat and even fire. The human diseases which result from acts of excess and immorality are merely forms of this same decay, the destruction which follows any breaking up of nature's cohesive bonds. Nature demonstrates the central idea of hell-fire before our very eyes. This is love as scientists know it.

To the man of the street love is known as fellowship. An act of hate destroys this fellowship. It creates disorder and restlessness, the characteristics of all heat and decay. Any break in the fellowship or love of one man for his neighbors brings social fire, social decay. What is the disease of society to-day if not the disorder of hate? The simple, inclusive command, "Love God and thy neighbor," has been denied and attacked. The result has been and is social hell-fire.

To the spiritual minded love is charity. The saints see in love much more than the scientists see, much more than the men in the street. The scientist specializes, the man in the street specializes; each sees a part of love. But the saints and the Church see love as a whole and call it charity. The scientist says, "Do not drink too much alcohol; the excess will cause disease." The man in the street says, "Be decent and honest, and respect your fellow-citizens, otherwise you will start a social revolution." The Church and her teachers say, "Love God and your neighbor; for if you do not, you will not only bring physical disease and revolution, but you will kill your soul."

The Church speaks at once in the language of science and of the man in the street and of the saint. She is sounding the dominant chord of temporal and eternal life. But because to-day is a day of specialization, her language is not heard, nor if it were heard would it be understood by many.

The Church to-day needs laymen, as well as priests, who can carry her message into the thousand and one specialized lives of the scientists and the men in the street. The Catholic business man can carry the message in a specialized form to his fellow business men. The Catholic laborer can interpret the general message to the special needs of his socialist friends. The Catholic woman of society can meet the sins of society by another special form of the message.

The business man is honest among his kind; but he is often dishonest to his laborers. The society woman may be honest to her servants and her creditors; but she is often a traitor to the highest function of woman. She needs to have the message of love interpreted in one way; the business man needs it in another. And among the best interpreters are those who move in the same circle of life, who understand its difficulties and temptations, who can learn the tact necessary to make their message heard.

The great message of the Church is both old and new; but the way in which we give it to the world must be new. For each and every man in every class of life we must have a special messenger and a special form of the message. Then we can look for a true regeneration. We can then expect the millions of Protestants and agnostics to hear us. Then, too, they will learn that the simplicity of our message is but the simplicity of greatness.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

Woman and Religion

Some thirty years ago when the problem novel was coming into vogue, the theological aspects of "Robert Elsmere" were already passé with those American women who led the public opinion of that day, but to its suggestions of social service as a substitute for the formal worship of God there was as yet little or no response. Theology was long since at a discount, and by the most advanced women utterly discredited, for the Concord School of Philosophy was supposed to have fired the shot which had struck home to the vitals of the Christian religion. It is true that the Emersonian variety of pantheism still held the mind up to a fictitious supernaturalism which for a time did service in maintaining a moral tone of some aspiration. But as the "Over-Soul" has so little support in right reason—which for its three dimensions has God first, myself second, and all phenomena else next—that "Free Thought" easily brought it down to so many varieties of spiritualistic and materialistic conceptions that each woman of pronounced individuality could choose her favorite, or failing to be pleased could elect one of her own making.

Although for most Protestants dogmatic Christianity was intellectually dead, and had been buried by "Higher Criticism," yet, as it still persisted in the lives of some representative women, it was a force to be reckoned with in any sort of social enterprise desiring nation-wide recognition. Otherwise the Woman's Christian Temperance Union could never have flourished. Just how weakened the essential elements of Christianity had become can be gauged by the fact that at the close of her term as president Miss Frances Willard could, without offence to her international union, eulogize the red flag as the emblem of a great host making for industrial peace, when in fact it is the most potent force organized among the masses in tearing down the truths upon which peace shall be established. Evidently once a popular assent is given to the right of private judgment in things of vital import to the soul, the inherited Christian sense becomes too dull to distinguish foe from friend. So it was that gradually our Blessed Lord lost His place in the Atonement with women active upon the sociological field, and became merely the most conspicuous figure in all time as a leader of men upon paths of social betterment. His path was indeed steep for the multitude of His day and generation to climb. But it is the belief that under the law of evolution, which is taken for granted, human nature is so susceptible of change that it is becoming less difficult to be altruistic, especially so now that universal education is insisted upon. When "all is becoming" there is no Being, and having no point of rest by which in contrast to realize action, Transcendentalism after a little while tumbled down at the hest of Utility. And the philosophy which was to set all the folk wise who would "hitch their wagon to a star" is now as the Temple that once stood at the tip-top of Concord hill. It is being preserved, for it has been hauled down to the slough at the bottom to make room for a commercial enterprise. Just so the ecstatic wave of spiritual independence has sunk to a foundation that rests upon schools in which God is left out.

Indeed women are more sinned against than sinning! They did not blast the Rock of Ages, for since they were taught that the individual is at once the "created and the creator" how could the Ten Commandments stand in defiance of the knowledge of the age? There is superficial evidence that woman's religion is now flourishing. But the facts are extant to show that the vagary known as "Christian Science" is the mental product of a man. For it was one of "old Doc Quimby's" mental patients who first preached the Quimby cult before establishing it as her own.

Just here a deeper aspect of the case is presented, for the question arises, Why does woman accept the authority of men? Why does she not become her own authority, since "free thought" and private interpretation of the Scriptures is the criterion of the masses? Besides it is a popular superstition that women are more religious than men. Hence in this land of religious liberty women are as free to make a "new religion" as is the distinguished President Emeritus of Harvard, and not a few are as well qualified.

It were of course sufficient to remind Christians that our Lord commissioned men, not women, also, to preach His gospel to all nations. Yet if this were the opportunity it would be a satisfaction scientifically to trace back the designs of Almighty God, thus coming to the basic principle that not the individual is the unit of civil society, but rather the family. Consequently in the constitution of things human it is writ large that the family, being a moral body, has its authoritative head in the man. If the head goes wrong, what shall prevent the other members from following? Surely without the supernatural revelation to man by God of the fundamental laws relative to things human there is extant no explanation which can reconcile a bad world and a good God. Inquisitive woman wants to know! She has, alas! taken man's word for it, not God's. So the ripest fruit of the so-called Reformation is a popular absence of belief in the authority of Christian dogma. There is, too, a more deadly bloom which is already passing into the green. Since God is alleged to be merely within and not also distinct from His creation, it is absurd to pray. One were best to grin and bear it, for as Nature is constantly evolving, beginning nowhere and going onward and upward forever toward the self-same place, by supplication one can not, for she can not, change one jot or tittle of her law. But worst of all is the propaganda, well in the bud, that the Christian religion is but a shrewd scheme to "prevent us from doing what we want." The acceptance of the world, the flesh and the devil as the aim and end of existence is set forth upon the principle that "self-expression" is the law of life to the utter repudiation of self-sacrifice which as a guiding principle of Christianity has unnerved and enslaved the human mind.

Of course it were too much to expect that women should be strictly logical in doctrine. Better still that deeds do not logically follow words, else the divorce-courts would be put out of commission by the repudiation of the Sixth Commandment, and animality would be in full swing. Neither should one expect women logically to follow their leaders, as sentiment holds in sway the multitude. But a false psychology is perhaps as dangerous to religious health as a radical deduction. A national leader of women, of international fame, Rev. Anna Shaw, President of the Woman Suffrage Association, does not "believe in being tied down to rules as old as the hills." But Dr. Shaw does believe that the marriage service should be "cut out. It is useless and has served its day." However, to accommodate the prejudices of the "after Christians," to use Professor Devas' admirable phrase, Reverend Anna Shaw performs a ceremony of marriage to suit each case.

> "The principals consult me beforehand and we prepare the vows." But there shall be no head to the families thus set up. "As for the word obey I had only one girl who wanted to make such a crazy promise. There was only one thing for me to do. I refused to marry her." ". . . It is wrong for one human being to be obeyed by another. It is an absolute sin." (Address, Philadelphia, June 15, 1914.)

Happily the positive quality of mind is rather rare among women. For this reason they are pious, loving and serving God because of a recognition of His goodness, rather than because of a comprehension of His glorious works. Not less religious is man than woman, they differ only in the expression of their piety. Once mechanical, mathematical, inexorable law occupies the throne of religion in the mind of a sincere woman, consequences moral and intellectual are thrown to the winged winds. There is the stuff of which heroes are made in those women who because of false teaching are thrown back upon a mechanical ideology for their moral code. Where one such has a national vogue her influence makes greatly for the destruction of that which she elects to serve, namely, the cause of mankind, which is enthroned to the exclusion of Almighty God. One of our ex-presidents has called upon Miss Jane Addams for a political service, assuming her influence to be foremost among American women. It is too true that Miss Addams has a vast sympathetic following which is based upon the enchantment of mechanical order. This "best-loved woman in the United States," who is a pathfinder for Bebel's most vicious book, has this to say:

"The Socialists are making the sole attempt to preach a morality sufficiently all-embracing and international to keep pace with even the threads of screws and the size of bolts, so that machines become interchangeable from one country to another." (Newer Ideals of Peace.)

What, then, is the religion of women dominant in the sociological affairs of our country? Certainly it is not Christianity.

MARTHA MOORE AVERY,
Director of Boston School of Political Economy.

The War and the Revival of Catholicism in France

As a spectator in Paris of the first two weeks of war I am left with the impression that one of the chief results of the present conflict will be a great revival of Catholicism in France.

Of all the peoples in Europe the French are almost alone capable of rapid communal expression. That criticism of the democratic ideal which bases its case on the inability of masses of men to express their collective will in an adequate manner, seems borne out by the greater part of modern European history. Yet the French nation by some oddity in her development gives this accusation the lie. That indescribable thing which differentiates one nation from another emphasizes in her case the fact that the strange force in Gaul, which has ever made her the decisive battleground of Europe, is capable of being canalized into the collective protest of a people. And it is this power of rapid communal expression that leads one to think that the Catholic revival in France will not be a passive one, expressing itself merely in a cessation of attacks on the Church. It will be an active, nay, even a violent, national movement that will reimpose the Faith on France.

Gaul, again, almost alone among the children of the Roman Empire, retains the Roman tradition in its purity. You can watch her reimposing it on the Maghreb, on the northern shores of Africa, in her military camps, the straight roads, the planting of trees, and the towns with their one straight street. Europe, which once held northern Africa and lost it in the great Moslem raids, holds it again through France. That which alone has made the second reoccupation of the Maghreb incomplete is that though the soldier of the Roman tradition has recaptured Africa, the Roman faith is absent. The faith of St. Louis no longer vitalizes the French arms. Yet this clinging to the "secular" side of the Roman tradition, has ever made Gaul the battleground of Europe. From those boundaries of hers, which have hardly varied since she became a nation at the close of the Dark Ages, she has led those great European raids against Western paganism and Eastern decadence. She alone was capable of conceiving the Crusades; she alone in her fierce practicality conceived the Revolution. On whether the Faith holds firm in France, then, depends eventually the salvation of Europe. That is what lends such extraordinary interest to the prospects of a complete resurrection of the Church in Gaul at the conclusion of this war.

I see this Catholic revival, first, through a series of recent happenings, and then through a series of personal impressions.

Before the war began there were numerous signs of a renascence of the Faith in France. (Mr. H. G. Wells, who almost alone among non-Catholic writers has a strong sense of fact, although his interpretation of facts will not always be acceptable to the Catholic mind, has recorded his own belief that a great revival of Catholicism will be among the most marked developments of the twentieth century.) In the face of such conspicuous conversions from infidelity as those of Paul Bourget, Huysmans, Brunetière, Coppée, Retté, it was impossible to ignore the influence of the Church among litterateurs who a few years before were entangled in materialism or Eastern mysticism; while an esthetic appreciation of the Faith was a clear note in the verse and prose of the French naturalist writers. Again one saw the resurrection of the Catholic spirit in the admissions of radical politicians that the attack on the Church had been barren of results, save that it had tended to strengthen and renew the Catholic body. These realized their inability to dissociate the French mind from the moral demands of Christianity. Active anti-clericalism died about the year 1905. Moribund radical politicians did, it is true, attempt to revive the anti-Christian ardor of past years at the time of the Agadir crisis, against the advice of many of the keener minds of the movement; but that was a distinct failure. Thus, before the war, the reappearance of the Catholic spirit in literature and the effective pressure of the Catholic mass of the nation on the politicians had opened the gates to the rising tide of the Catholic renascence.

What, then, of after the war?

To a person who witnessed, as the present writer did, the extraordinary religious fervor in Paris at the commencement of hostilities, not merely among ardent Catholics but among those who had for many years neglected their religious duties, it would seem impossible that there should be a reaction to indifferentism at the cessation of hostilities. Mornings at Mass, and afternoons spent in wandering through many churches in all quarters of the city, speedily brought me to the view I put forward: that this crisis has shocked the French nation into a realization of the power of religion in moments of high tragedy. And if in moments of high tragedy, why not in those minor tragedies that crowd even everyday life?

Nor do I think that these personal impressions of mine of great services at the Madeleine, the Sacre Coeur de Montmarte, play me false. I find that other witnesses support me. I quote from an article from the pen of an acute observer in a recent number of a prominent London weekly:

> To what extent the services attracted once rather slack congregations I realized less than one month ago. Outside a village which never was famous for church-going enthusiasm, I chanced upon a game-keeper engaged in conversation with half-a-dozen soldiers bivouacking under a railway bridge, a few miles north of Hirson, and he was just saying: "In our village there are no political parties; no Royalists, no Imperialists, no Radicals; everybody goes to Benediction at night." This was the plain truth, and it applied to all those parishes where a priest was left: everybody went to Benediction at night. The old Catholic feeling, which no amount of religious controversy can kill, was alive everywhere.

It seems to me impossible that those of the French nation who were shocked by the destruction of Reims cathedral and other churches, can revert to the Radical game of taking these very edifices from their rightful owners. I can not see how the death of great priests like the Abbé Délebecque, the bravery of those thirty thousand of the clergy who are, according to a London estimate, at the front, can fail but to impress the imagination of a people who have been asked to regard these men as cassocked imbeciles. The French nation is united. When atheist has stood shoulder to shoulder with Catholic in battle, the former can no longer call the latter unpatriotic and a danger to France. Those who have sneered at the pulpit as the "coward's fort," will have to admit that even if the pulpit is the "coward's fort," the priest in any other kind of fort is a very brave man. Those who have regarded the Church, even as many did at the time of the Revolution, as dead, will have to admit not merely that it is alive, but alive and kicking. How can there be a revival of religious persecution in the face of such impressions and admissions?

There is one other point I would emphasize. If Alsace-Lorraine becomes again at the end of this war an integral part of French territory—I do not say that it should or will, O Heckler for Neutrality!—it is not conceivable that even the stupidity of Radical politicians will allow them to impose the anti-Catholic laws on a province that has enjoyed a large amount of religious liberty under German rule. And is it possible to make an exception of Alsace-Lorraine to the exclusion of the other provinces of France? The answer is self evident. Here I end my somewhat dogmatic diagnosis and prophecy of the future of Catholicism in France, knowing full well that prophecy is apt to be not merely unwise but foolish!

LOUIS H. WETMORE.

A Catholic Daily Newspaper

A saintly priest has well said that, "if the daily newspaper as it comes into our homes were to be given to the world in book form it would have to be placed upon the Index." No thoughtful observer of our times who has the welfare of mankind at heart would venture to disagree with him. Whilst there is good as well as evil in the daily newspaper even of to-day, the evil has outgrown the good and has become dangerous on account of its insidiousness. The good comes like the light of the day; we see it and rejoice in it because it brightens up everything. The evil comes like the invisible dust in the air; it penetrates our thoughts, reaching every nook and corner of our minds unperceived, until by its accumulation it has besmirched our moral views and has made evil lose its ugliness for us. We condone the evil on account of its evanescence, failing to realize that although its impress is momentary the constant recurrence of it produces a lasting influence.

The daily newspaper of to-day is in a decadent state. By common consent and practice the daily newspaper has three functions: to inform the people; to communicate between buyer and seller, and to mould public thought. Only one of these functions remains anything like normal, namely, that of communicating between buyer and seller and even this has been perverted. Because the success of the daily paper depends upon the number of its readers, keen competition for readers has brought the price of it below the cost of production and has widened and thinned down its function of informing the people into one of pandering to their curiosity, animal instincts and prejudices. As a logical sequence the burden of earning dividends has fallen upon the advertiser, and the function of moulding public thought has been sacrificed to his interests and to the whims of the people.

While society in general has something very vital at stake in the newspaper's decadence, Catholics have more at stake than society in general. It strikes at our civilization, but it also strikes at Christianity the foundation of our civilization. If Catholics really want to hand down their precious heritage of faith in its full strength and vigor to their children and their children's children they must reform the press at least in so far as they themselves use it. A Catholic school education and a sermon once a week with even the best home environment will not withstand the post-graduate work of the newspaper, which in picture and type daily presents the weakness, crimes, scandals and sins of the community in attractive coloring as though they were the deeds of heroes and martyrs. It is man's nature to become imbued with what he sees, hears and reads until it is part of him and he reflects it in his acts.

The daily newspaper has every qualification for good that it has for evil; it remains for man to make it an agent for good. There are always more edifying acts in a community than disedifying ones; more good deeds done than bad ones. For every faithless husband and wife there are hundreds of faithful ones. For every one who commits a crime there are thousands who do virtuous deeds and noble acts. For every evil act which is dressed up as an heroic deed there are thousands of real heroic deeds which could be set forth in their nakedness. A daily newspaper which would record what is beautiful, good, noble and edifying in the community would be a power for good. It would find many readers, for, after all, there is a better psychological foundation in the people for good than there is for evil. Most Catholics would support it; all ought to support it. Those who would not do so in the beginning could be educated to do so. What people really want in a newspaper is the news. When that has been told simply, briefly and truthfully without nauseating details, whatever more is to be given most people would prefer to have come from the good side of life rather than from the bad side. It is only the morbid, perverted mind which likes to wallow in intellectual and moral filth and the majority of human beings have normal minds.

New York, Philadelphia and Chicago have large enough Catholic populations inside of a newspaper radius to support a distinctively Catholic daily newspaper. A capital of two million dollars would establish such a paper in any of these cities and carry it to an investment basis. It might take from five to ten years to do it but it could be done if the project were carefully managed and persevered in. The financial returns after the paper had been securely founded would be ample to justify the undertaking on a commercial basis and the ethical returns and the good which would come to civilization from it would be beyond calculation.

The task of establishing such a paper belongs to the layman. It is peculiarly a function of the "Lay Apostolate." It fits the layman exactly and the layman fits it. It is a business enterprise which can be used to extend the Kingdom of God and preserve the truths which Christ has revealed to us. There is no preaching in it, merely an acting out in everyday life of the teachings of the Church for the edification of all. It is a way, too, in which help can be extended to the brother outside of the Church who has not been blessed with the faith and to whom the Catholic layman is a brother's keeper. There are thousands of good people in the world clinging to the remnants of a pre-Reformation standard of morality which the story of divorce, dishonesty, political debauchery, murder and everything which is debasing as it appears in the daily press insidiously robs them of, setting them adrift in the ocean of irreligion and immorality. A clean, edifying daily paper might preserve for them this vestige of Catholicity which they have by inheritance and tradition, and perhaps ultimately bring them the full substance of what is now a shadow.

Reformation of the press within itself can scarcely be hoped for on account of the practices which have sprung up in the newspaper business through competition for commercial advantages. It must come from an outside force strong enough to gather and hold readers on an ideal standard of ethics. The Catholic Church undoubtedly is the best equipped and strongest organization for this purpose in the world to-day.

The resources for a Catholic daily newspaper exist. Much of the best newspaper talent in the country is Catholic. There is ample capital in the hands of Catholics for a Catholic daily paper. Catholics who have thought about the matter are willing and ready to do their part. Catholics who have not thought about it are either indifferent or disinclined to do anything. Serious sober thought would make all realize that in such a task there lies a duty. Really all that it is necessary to do for bringing into existence what every thoughtful Catholic seems to think ought to exist is to organize the resources at hand, to coordinate them and direct them to the desired end with a strong faith, firm purpose and persevering effort.

Catholics in the United States have built churches, schools, and eleemosynary institutions and have liberally supported them. They have done these things for the preservation of their faith. What they have done, excellent as it is, is incomplete and insufficient until they have buttressed it with the establishment of Catholic daily newspapers. Such papers are necessary for a voice in matters of public interest, for defence of Catholic principles, and above all for correct information on a thousand and one subjects which through ignorance or design are misrepresented or ignored in the daily newspapers as now published. They would serve a splendid purpose for postgraduate work among Catholics by keeping them in touch with the social, philanthropic and intellectual life of the Church, by reports of the happenings in parishes and eleemosynary institutions and of the proceedings of conventions, summer schools and gatherings of various kinds. There is not a day but that something is going on in some part of the United States of interest to Catholics in all parts of the United States, an account of which would be both instructive and inspiring. Such papers would supply to Catholics the crowd-stimulation which comes to men who address vast, sympathetic audiences and would give them some sense of proportion of their numbers compared with other religious bodies and the population at large.

Catholics need Catholic daily papers also for the purpose of strengthening their Catholic weekly papers. Strictly speaking, a weekly newspaper can not be produced because news is too evanescent to be of interest at the end of a week. Catholic weekly papers could be made most interesting and valuable journals were there Catholic daily papers from which to draw the news of the day. They ought to summarize the news of the week and comment on it. At present only a few of them, notably AMERICA, can even attempt it. Were this generally done they would be much more welcome in Catholic families and when known and understood would be regarded as an indispensable part of the literature of the household. Under existing conditions it is practically impossible to make our Catholic weekly papers what they ought to be because there is no reliable source of information for summaries and comments.

A Catholic daily paper should be planted in the hearts and faith of the rank and file of the laity. The capital should be subscribed by the many not by the few. Twenty thousand subscribers of one hundred dollars each would be ideal for a capital of two million dollars. This would give the paper a Catholic foundation from which it could not be dislodged. A stockholder holding one or even ten shares would place the Catholicity and efficiency of the paper before his dividend; a stockholder holding from one thousand to ten thousand shares probably would reverse these items. Besides, no man can bequeath his Catholicity to his heirs, and it often has happened that the second, third, or fourth generation removed from the most devout parents, has been found outside of the Church. Then again with holders of a few shares of stock, death and the change of fortune could not bring embarrassment to the management through new, unfriendly interests.

What legacy can a father leave to his son so pregnant with happiness as something which will help him to maintain his faith? What sincere Catholic would not gladly invest thousands of dollars to insure his offspring's loyalty to the faith? In daily Catholic newspapers Catholics have the best security for the faith of their children and their children's children which mere money can give. How much better to invest a little of one's wealth in these than to leave it in forms which corrupt and debauch? One can see the future of one's own family in what has happened to one's own generation of those who have gone before. How many have lost their faith through the influence of a non-Catholic environment and a degenerate press God only knows?

LAWRENCE F. FLICK.

London in War Time

It is Trafalgar Day. Round the decorated Nelson column in Trafalgar Square there have been all day patriotic demonstrations, to which a practical purpose has been given by making collections for the war relief fund and for our guests, the Belgian refugees. Round the base of the column hang memorial wreaths, in honor of the brave men who met their deaths so resolutely and devotedly when the lurking danger of the North Sea struck their ships and gave no chance of striking back. We are proud of our navy in this war. It has done all we expected and we expected the best. Our ships have kept their silent watch on the narrow seas; they have paid the price in gallant lives; when the opportunity offered, they have fought with the disciplined efficiency that brought swift destruction on their opponents; and in the hour of victory our seamen showed a reckless courage in saving the lives of their late enemies, and a manly appreciation of the courage with which the German sailors kept their guns in action to the last.

The great day of trial—the pitched battle on the sea—is still to come, but we look forward to it with confidence. Meanwhile the navy is keeping our shores safe by its mere presence and its silent power. And it is also keeping the great ocean routes clear, by "bottling up" von Ingenohl's squadrons behind the batteries of the Frisian coast. There are a few hostile cruisers still on the prowl. They were out before the war began. Some of these raiders have been hunted down; the rest will soon be caught. Meanwhile the damage they can do is relatively a trifle. Our food-ships come into our ports; our mail steamers and cargo ships start on the appointed days. There has been none of the huge rise of prices that was predicted before the war. For a few days they had a tendency to rise; then came the official statement as to supplies available and on the way; the guarantee of insurance on food cargoes; after that prices first steadied and then in most cases actually dropped. Raw material for the sugar refineries was short for a time, because the war had come as a surprise. A Government grant to the importers settled the difficulty and now the price is very little above what it was six months ago. In the London restaurants and teashops the scale of prices has never been altered from the peace tariff.

The war is, it is true, fifteen weeks old. The first week was the worst. We were plunging into the unknown. There had been no war with a European neighbor for many a long year. We had never attempted a general mobilization. We could not realize what the readjustment of business would mean. And then there was a really dangerous financial crisis. The London banks had been financing big foreign transactions, taking over bills for half Europe, helping the Stock Exchange to carry on with prices dropping hourly in the anxious week before the crash came; and financing contractors, traders and manufacturers on securities that now left no margin. An immediate liquidation would have meant a deficit of fifty millions sterling. If a run had started, the great banks would have gone smash like a train of fireworks crackling off in succession. The four days' bank holiday, the temporary moratorium, the Government guarantee of a whole series of liabilities, and the issue of pound notes and ten-shilling notes (not of the Bank of England but of the Treasury) warded off disaster.

The mobilization went like clockwork. Every one who had anything to do with it was surprised at the easy and rapid way in which the home army expanded from about 150,000 to over half a million. Then came the rush of new recruits and old hands rejcining. In some of the foreign papers I have seen absurd stories about the people hanging back. The plain fact is that the rush of recruits surpassed all expectations, and at one moment was an actual difficulty on account of all preparations, that had been made on the most sanguine estimates, proving insufficient. Even those who had opposed the idea of war were enthusiastic supporters of the Government from the moment that the Germans marched into Belgium. Whatever may be thought in other countries of the merits of the quarrel, the people here are solid in support of what they hold to be a just cause and a necessary fight for the safety of the country and the empire.

And I feel sure that no praise can be too great for the calm, orderly spirit in which they have faced the trials of war time; for the generosity with which all classes have contributed to the funds raised for the victims of the war; and finally for the eager kindness with which they have welcomed and provided for a host of refugees from Belgium. Not the least praiseworthy feature of this hospitality is the way in which even Protestants are taking care to provide for the spiritual needs of these Catholic exiles. At the Alexandra Palace, a great place of entertainment in North London, where the scheme had proved a failure and the huge buildings are derelict, temporary quarters are provided for many hundreds. It is a kind of receiving depot from which the refugees are passed on to more permanent quarters. Here the theatre has been converted into a church with several altars. The high altar is just behind the line of footlights. The refugees begin the day with Holy Mass, said by some of the priests who have come with them. It is true that Catholics are represented on the reception committee, but the majority are Protestants.

And let me note that the war, though it has temporarily paralyzed more than one of our organized Catholic works, is indirectly helping the Church in England. At the front and at home Catholics are doing their part. One of the first patriotic gifts made after the war began was the offer by Cardinal Bourne of the free use for the wounded of a fully equipped and fully staffed hospital just founded at Willesden Green in North West London. Catholic names are numerous in the roll of honor of those who have fallen in fight.

Just after the Belgian refugees began to arrive we had a Catholic procession in the streets of London, ending with a service at the Cathedral. It was a processional of prayer for the dead and for an honorable peace. English and Irish, Belgians, French and Poles marched under their national banners. We had about 5,000 in line. I acted as one of the marshals and interpreters for the foreign contingents. While the procession was being formed I had a talk with a soldier in khaki uniform, a gunner of our Royal Artillery, with a row of war medal ribbons on his jacket. The Soudan ribbon started the talk and we exchanged memories of old campaigning days on the Nile. I asked him where he last saw fighting and he told me he had been wounded at Mons, had now recovered and next week would be back with the guns in France. Then we talked of the fighting in Belgium. "I never saw men like the Belgian priests," he said. "I could not imagine braver or better men. They were up to the firing line, and whether you were Catholic or Protestant didn't matter. They never asked, but just set to work to save your life. I am an Irishman and I was a Protestant until Mons. But their religion is the religion for me, and I have put my name down to be a Catholic."

The soldiers' letters are full of praise of the priests and nuns. One of them, written by an English private in a line regiment, tells of the impression made upon him by what he saw in a French village. He tells how at one end of it there was a little convent and the nuns "in a gray uniform," stood by the door giving fruit and refreshing light wine to the tired men as they tramped past. "To my dying day," he says, "I shall never forget those nuns; they looked so beautiful and holy and pure." And the writer is a Protestant.

But I am getting away from London. Of the war in France I shall say nothing. The expeditionary force slipped away from the country in utter silence in the mid-August days. Since then it has been characteristic of the people that no news has been black enough to depress them, though the tidings were at first disappointing enough. The less worthy class of newspaper writers have been fanning the flame of hate against the Germans, and working up a spy scare. The scare has the slenderest foundation in fact, but it has had some unpleasant results, notably a riot in South London and a good deal of harrying out of their situations of men with German names. But this has been the only scare.

You will say, what about the Zeppelin scare? Well, there has been very little excitement and no panic on that head. We all know by the experience of Paris, Namur and Antwerp that bomb throwing from the sky is likely to come. London is a big target, and has its arsenals, magazines, wireless installations and the like which a daring German raider might try to damage. Or there may be mere reckless scattering of explosives and incendiary bombs. Perhaps when the attempt is made there may be some local panic, but I doubt it. Meanwhile London submits with patience to the precautions imposed by the authorities, with a view to making it difficult for the raider to choose his targets. London is gloomy enough at night; no lights in shop fronts, dim lighting of streets, a faint glimmer in the street cars that makes it impossible to read. It is a bit of a nuisance, but it is a very minor "horror of war." Aerial scouts cruise about, high-angle guns are mounted, searchlights sweep the sky. But every one I have spoken to looks on the whole business with more of interested curiosity than alarm. Property is being insured against damage, but rates are low, two shillings and sixpence per cent. per annum is the ruling rate now, and a shilling more if one lives too near a Government establishment. The rate covers all kinds of incidental losses also.

Taking it all round, the war has not caused one-tenth of the trouble that was expected. We have got used to the new conditions and are keeping "business as usual." The long battle in France has come to something like a deadlock. We are getting used even to the dearth of news. For the moment we are chiefly interested in looking after our Belgian guests, and waiting with a mild curiosity for what Count Zeppelin and his colleagues may do. For the rest we are all pulling together and trying to help each other, but there is less poverty than one usually has to deal with in London as autumn comes on. Things may be more difficult when winter is upon us, and when the November session of Parliament brings heavier war taxes. But we do not worry about what is coming. The quiet patience of every one, their cheerful patience, is wonderful. There are few households, perhaps there are none, that have not relatives or friends either at the front or awaiting orders. But every one accepts the changed condition of things and all its anxious possibilities in a quiet, matter of fact way. There was far more nervous excitement over the South African War. There is not a trace of the flag wagging, mafficking and other absurdities of that period. Yet the South African War was a trifle compared with our present business.

London. A. HILLIARD ATTERRIDGE.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

The Abolition of the Greek-Catholic Church by Russia

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Two weeks ago a European news dispatch was published to the effect that Count Andreas Szeptycki, Greek Catholic Archbishop and Metropolitan of Lemberg, Galicia, was made a prisoner of war by the Russians and had been carried off to the interior of Russia. In connection with this outrage the following may be of interest to the readers of your journal. In a recent issue of the Utro Rossi, a Petrograd daily, we read the following item:

> The Holy Synod is in receipt of a telegram, announcing the arrival, at Lemberg, of the Orthodox Archbishop Eulogius, who is to deliver a memorial sermon in one of the Greek-Catholic churches. High Mass is to be celebrated by him there on September 27th. The Orthodox Rite has been declared the dominating religion in Galicia. The Holy Synod sent its blessing to such Greek Catholics as are prepared to embrace the Orthodox faith.

Archbishop Eulogius, referred to in the above telegraphic message, is the typical representative of the Russian State Church, which took part in the plot to seize Galicia. The Nowa Reforma, a prominent Cracovian paper, in commenting upon this message, says:

> The Metropolitan, Count Szeptycki, was made a prisoner of war and removed from the city of Lemberg, with the obvious object of preventing him from protesting against the dissolution of the union between the Greek Catholic Church and Rome. It is of interest that Archbishop Eulogius deemed it proper to celebrate Mass in the Greek Catholic church, although the city of Lemberg harbors a newly-erected and spacious Orthodox church. By so doing the archbishop desired to make it clear to all that the Russian Government decided to change the Greek Catholic into an Orthodox church. To this unheard-of suppression of the conscience and religious sentiments of Greek Catholics the attention of the whole civilized world should be drawn. The justification of the Greek Catholic Rite is based upon its union with the Vatican. Not only Ruthenians, but many Poles are members of this Church. The purpose of official Russia in destroying this union and in declaring the Orthodox Church the dominant religion in Galicia, is to strengthen the political foundation laid by Russian machinations before the outbreak of the war, and thus to continue their ruinous influence even in case Russia should be forced to evacuate or give up Galicia.

In conclusion it may not be out of place to add that the recognized leaders of the Ruthenians in the Austrian Parliament, Dr. Lewicki, Professor Romanczuk and Dr. Olesnycki, have also solemnly protested against this infamous crime committed by Russia upon the most sacred ideals and sentiments of the Ruthenian people.

ALEX. VON NUBER,
Austro-Hungarian Consul-General.

New York.

One Vote Lost

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am a convert to the Faith, and can not but marvel at the passivity of the millions of Catholics in the United States under the manner in which the President and his appointees ignore their appeals in behalf of decency and humanity. I have always been a Democrat. My ancestors have been Virginia Democrats since the foundation of the party, but I will vote the Republican or Progressive ticket before I will again support an administration that ignores the appeals of millions of my coreligionists. I believe that every Catholic worthy the name holds, or should hold, the same view of the matter; and if Catholic voters would voice this opinion broadcast in the Catholic press throughout the land, the present Administration would feel that it could no longer afford to ignore their appeals.

Sligo, Texas. W. P. LUPTON.

The Italian Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My article on "Religious Conditions in Italy," published in AMERICA a few weeks ago, has found opponents. It seems that in certain quarters there is a disposition to believe that the bulk of the Italian people are not good Catholics; the reason assigned being the character of the Italians in this country. Is this a good reason? No. Circumstances here are so different from those that obtain in Italy that a man who should judge Italians in Italy by those in the United States, would certainly be misled. First of all, what of the Italians who come to this country? As a rule they are from the poorest and lowest class. Obliged to fight for their very living almost from the first day of their arrival, they are lucky if they can get anything at all to do in our cities. Many of them, moreover, come from country places where the fatherly solicitude of the parish priest was sufficient to keep them away from evil, they come by thousands from a country abounding in Catholic traditions and pious practices to the worst quarters of our large cities, to tenements where they are crowded together because of the high cost of living. Besides, among them are to be found a certain number who in Italy would hardly be allowed by the police to go about freely. Compared with the others, although much in the minority, they are far more conspicuous. They are bad people such as are found in the lower strata of every community. Secondly, our immigrants come to a country where an unknown and difficult language is spoken, where the ideas and the ways of the people are widely different from those to which from their childhood they have been accustomed. They live among people who but too frequently despise them. The Italian immigrant hears himself called opprobrious names by persons whom he has never offended and toward whom he feels inclined to be kind in spite of all the injuries heaped upon him. As Archbishop Glennon says: "He is greeted with terms of contempt and forced to seek shelter with his countrymen in the poorest quarters. He does not speak the language of America, therefore, he is uneducated; he is rude of appearance, therefore he must be an anarchist."

The Italian immigrant, moreover, comes among people full of life and energy, and he thinks his best recommendation to them is a fair knowledge of the English language and a large amount of the "mighty dollar." He comes to a country that prides itself on its freedom and on its progressive principles, a kind of freedom and a code of principles he may have heard often condemned at home. He comes without a priest; not rarely he has not a church in which to worship God. He has not the means of building one and, besides, in a short time he will return to Italy where the friendly parish priest to whom he has promised a sum of money for a statue or for an altar or, maybe, for a charitable institution, is already anxiously awaiting him. For the Italian immigrant does not as a rule intend to make his home in the United States. His object is merely to work for a time in order that the higher wages he earns in this country may enable him to pay off his debts or to give a dowry to his daughters, or to make his future life in his dear old place comfortable and happy. Such being their ideas, such their desire for money, and such their resolution, often carried out, of leaving the country as soon as possible, can the immigrants welcome the priest, even if they find one to take care of them, who needs and requests money for the Church, for the school, for the rectory, for the club, especially as they are unaccustomed to support the Church? Often, however, and this happened especially in the first decades of the Italian immigration, they do not find any priest to work among them. As a consequence, influenced by their surroundings, misunderstanding the spirit of the country where they live, they begin to feel a certain freedom in religious practices even though they may keep the Faith in their hearts. History repeats itself, they say: many of other nationalities have lost the Catholic Faith in the first or second generation for want of priests, and the Italians are not an exception to the rule.

Since these are the conditions of Italians in this country, do AMERICA's readers think it fair to make them a basis of judgment for the 35,000,000 Italians in Italy? What would the honest, industrious Americans think if they saw themselves despised and hated, as they are, in some Latin American republics, because they are judged there according to the standard set by a comparatively few insolent Americans, who would hardly be tolerated in this country and who disgrace their fellow-citizens abroad and at home? It is the same with the Italians except to a stronger degree. A comparatively limited number of them are bad, the rest are good, honest, law-abiding citizens, who are laboring under extremely hard circumstances. The names of the bad ones travel all over the country, the others are ignored or confused with the former; and so they are entirely misunderstood, they are trodden down even by people who should rather extend to them a helping hand and make life easier for them by drying their tears, by making them feel at home in this grand country, among men of all races and creeds and especially among their fellow Catholics. And yet in spite of the odds that the Italians have to face in this country, only a few of which I have pointed out, are they after all as bad as my opponents make them out to be, and perhaps many people are inclined to believe them? I reserve my answer to this question for another letter.

Woodstock, Md. JOSEPH M. SORRENTINO, S.J.

Filling the Gap

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In this, your hour of dire distress and pitiable need, allow me to hasten to fill up the gap in your subscription list about to be made by Francis Emmerich. I presume that he is a competent judge of his own powers of discernment, but if he can see no difference between AMERICA and the Menace he is pretty badly off. Perhaps it will be some consolation to him to know that I am jumping into the breach and taking his place.

Monmouth, Ill. JOHN J. RYAN.

Help for Mexico

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In response to your recent appeal for help for the priests and nuns who are suffering from the effects of the war in Mexico, I wish to ask if it would not be possible to raise a subscription through your columns, and to ask you to act as treasurer. If you approve of this suggestion, I take great pleasure in sending you ten dollars to start the subscription, and I offer it with an earnest prayer that it may be accepted for this purpose, and that many may respond to your appeal. It is natural that the whole world should turn at present to the terrible need in Europe; but there is danger of our forgetting in America that an equally unholy war in the suffering country so near us, has left great need in its train. While answering the cry that comes to us across the sea, we may not be able to do all that we wish for those at home, but can not each one of us do a little?

Windsor, Vt. A. S. EVARTS.

Indifference is Impossible

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your recent number of the Catholic Mind on the Mexican atrocities has just come to me. Is it possible that such inhuman barbarities can be perpetrated on Catholic Sisters at our very doors and Catholics remain indifferent? I am going to ask you to send at my expense a copy of this pamphlet to every priest of our diocese of Boston. If Boston, true to her traditions, feels it a duty to protest against such persecutions as have been practised on the Jews of Russia, surely the Catholics of this city under their watchful and public-spirited leaders will find a voice to cry out against these heinous cruelties perpetrated on the defenceless women who have so completely consecrated their lives to the love of God and their neighbor. And if they do not cry out, who will? As Joseph Smith, a non-Catholic writer, commenting on the disgraceful supineness of Catholics in the face of the filthy Menace situation, says in a Boston paper with more force than elegance, the Catholics with their millions in number in this country ought to be able to enforce respect and fair play, provided they have spines under their shirts and not rubber tubes. And so it is to be hoped that our Boston Catholics will be able to cry out so as to be heard by all their fellow-citizens who hate injustice, not excluding such papers as the Globe and Post which do not refuse Catholic patronage. And may I ask you to send a copy also to our President and every member of his non-Catholic Cabinet? Ignorance may be the reason for their support of these perpetrators of barbarities; it is difficult to see other excuse. I take it AMERICA is ready to stand behind all charges contained in this pamphlet. And may I offer a suggestion? As it is sometimes asserted that partisan politics on the part of Catholics is the cause of their being persecuted by the Carranza-Villa cabal, open your columns to the American representative of that régime and challenge them to prove it.

BOSTONIAN.

Reparation for the Outrages in Mexico

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been thinking of the horrible sacrileges committed in Mexico against the Blessed Sacrament, and of our share in the matter, and it has occurred to me that we Catholics of the United States ought to make public atonement by a public Communion of Reparation and Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. If we are powerless to do more, let us at least make amends as best we can.

Sparta, Wis. A PASTOR.

"Lest We Forget!"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The news received in our country all passes through England, and much of it comes from official France. Never, I think, in all the history of the world have such hideous calumnies been repeated and credited as the falsehoods told by French atheists in order to inflame not only their own nation, but every other nation on earth with hatred and frenzy against Germany. These men who deny God and His commandments, who make light of affronting Him, of bearing false witness, recently appalled the whole world by announcing that their Cathedral of Reims had been deliberately destroyed by the German "Huns," and lay prostrate, "a heap of smoking ashes." The injury to the cathedral has since been fully explained, and is reparable. The defacement of this same cathedral by the enemies of God during and after the French Revolution has been for years undergoing repairs, and has been evident to all travelers, as well as to the French people, who have gazed at the sacred places. Every other beautiful church in France, was more or less mutilated, not by the fortunes of war, but by blind hatred of God, the same mainspring of evil action which animates Poincaré and Viviani to-day, and all the rest who have hacked and mutilated the school books of French children, erasing every mention of God and prayer. Curiously enough, too, in this connection, I may mention that Bruno's history of France for children, in use in the French schools for more than thirty years, was "revised" in 1905, and not only every allusion to religion eliminated, but a full-page illustration of the Cathedral of Reims was suppressed—a map being substituted—and, also of course, all allusion to it and to the Catholic kings of France.

The atheists try to keep from the eyes of little children even a picture of a church of Christ, of a temple of God. And yet these same men are calling the world to witness the "vandalism" of Germany, and its malicious and "systematic" destruction of a "sacred edifice"! Let us remember that neither in the Cathedral of Reims nor in any other church, whether it be magnificent or humble as the stable of Bethlehem, have French officers been allowed to attend Mass:

nor have other functionaries of the Government, under pain of disgrace or dismissal. All these and other infamous laws seem to have fallen silent during the war frenzy which appears to have animated even French Catholics, to judge from the awful things that they say and write against the Germans, and the Emperor, with more hatred of their neighbors Catholic and Protestant than love of God. They actually call the French army the "Army of Christendom"; that army into which the French "Grand Orient" has invited all the Freemasons of Italy, if they fail in an attempt to overcome Italian neutrality. From a Catholic point of view France seems to be in a very pandemonium. All the persecutions and tyranny, the exile and death of innocent nuns, the killing of faith in the souls of children, seem to be forgotten. French Catholics who never united (as Leo XIII counselled wisely) to prevent the Republic from committing such outrages, have now arisen as one man to crush Germany and recapture Alsace, which would mean practically to put that province under the tyranny of a government which would immediately exile the religious Orders, steal the churches and establish godless schools.

To an outsider watching events and knowing facts, such a frenzy of race-hatred seems incredible, and the clever infidels are playing their game, exciting evil passions by calumnies and manifold devices of Satan, laughing in their sleeves all the while at having cunningly brought the French Catholics "to heel," and forced priests to kill their neighbors, but never once swerving from their own fixed purpose to "kill God"!

The Government allowed some Catholics to sing and pray last month before Notre Dame (the Matin called it "a lot of old women brandishing the cross"), but two weeks ago, when a paper was presented to Viviani, signed by 180,000 Catholics, asking for a day of national prayer to be appointed for France by the Government, he scoffingly denied the request, saying that it would affront French "public opinion"! Years ago Bishop Bougaud, of Laval, in his remarkable book, "L'Église et le siècle," deplored the fact that "France is the only great nation that does not pray"! What will be the outcome of these horrors? God only knows, and the future is safe in His hands. All Catholics everywhere must pray for the Catholic Church in France, not for the French Church, l'Église Gallicane, that it may become as it was in the past, the Church which produced saints, it mattered not of what rank; kings, noblemen, peasants, all were equal before God; all were united in one Lord, one faith, one baptism. This splendid faith caused France to be justly called the fille ainée de l'Église. May she come back as a nation to her Mother, whether it be through defeat or through victory, through happiness or through adversity! Catholics of every race can unite with her, praying to God, "Thy Kingdom come," hoping for the triumph of the Holy Catholic Church throughout the world, that great and undivided army with one Divine Leader, and ardently desiring the downfall and confusion of the enemies of God in every land.

Lucerne, Oct. 9. A CATHOLIC AMERICAN.

Dispassionate Readers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am very much surprised that any of your readers should take umbrage at anything contained in your "Chronicle," concerning the present war in Europe. I have been intensely interested in the conflict, have read AMERICA faithfully, and was quite unaware that you displayed any bias in what you printed. It never entered my mind that you were striving to set yourself up as the first or the last authority on things relating to this European struggle or that you aimed to convert anybody to the point of view of the "Chronicle." In fact the point of view was so often in the plural number that I can not conceive how any one should imagine you to be making or trying to make a single point to the exclusion of others. All I expect of you is that you will continue to give the "Chronicle" as heretofore and let your readers draw conclusions to suit themselves. Dispassionate readers know full well that though you endeavor to be all things to all men, you can scarcely hope to be anything to some men. If you succeed in pleasing the majority of your subscribers, you will be eminently fortunate. At any rate, state matters as they appear to you and I have no doubt that you will give satisfaction to the unbiased portion of your clients.

Hopkinsville, Ky. J. P. W.

Germany's Bearing in the War

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have just read an article by H. C. Watts, in your issue of October 31, in which the Protestant Reformation and the philosophy of Kant are blamed for the cruel arrogance and cynical brutality of the German Government in this war. What of Austria? Austria is the only great power left in Europe that is wedded, body and soul, to the Roman Church. And it was Austria that precipitated this deluge of blood. The name Austria does not appear in your writer's contribution.

I do not know who Mr. Watts is; but I have followed AMERICA for some time, and believe your effort is to be fair. Here is your chance.

Philadelphia, Pa. A. L. H.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am not quite clear as to what your correspondent means. If he is of German nationality and resents any implication of "brutality and arrogance" being made against his Fatherland, that is quite proper—from his point of view. If, on the other hand, he thinks Catholic Austria is shielded at the expense of "Protestant" Germany, he is a bit wide of the mark. So far as I am aware, Austria has not made the claim to world-power that Germany has, and Germany, if Trietschke, Bernhardi and others are to be considered spokesmen, bases her greatness on the Protestant Reformation and the philosophy of Kant. It is the former of these who says:

> Thus the new poetry and science became for many decades the most effectual bond of union for this dismembered people, and decided the victory of Protestantism in German life.

And continuing the same topic he says:

> Germany was raised to be the home of heresy, since she developed the root-idea of the Reformation into the right of unrestricted and unprejudiced inquiry.

The effect of the Reformation has been to destroy authority in matters of religion, and to magnify private judgment. When, in addition to this, Kant's philosophy eventually and logically ended in destroying belief in things not apprehended by the senses. such as God and the supernatural, the whole centre of spiritual gravity was shifted from God to man. The very natural consequence followed that there is nothing great in the universe save man, and nothing great in man save himself; the supreme glorification of egotism. And whereas, ordinary simple man, even with the assistance of sanctifying grace, falls a long way below his Pattern; it is evident that without that grace, and denying its source or even its existence, he would be still more unlike the image in which he was made and created. The ethics of Jesus Christ, promulgated by His Church, have nothing in common with the ethics of Kant. The one is supernatural, and finds its source in a Living and Personal God: the other is intellectual, and depends upon the validity of a syllogism.

H. C. WATTS.

Delirious Gallomania

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Enclosed, please, find a little sedative for your delirious gallomania and kindred maladies. If your editorial staff must engage a linguist to translate the German article for them—risum teneatis amici—I will bear all the expenses. Your editors seem to be deplorably ignorant of everything that pertains to the great Teutonic race, the torch-bearer of civilization.

Urbana, Ill. DR. HAROLD MCCARTHY.

[German news in AMERICA is in charge of a man who knows German thoroughly. However, this should not quench the Doctor's charity. The Belgian Relief Committee would gladly accept the money.—Editor AMERICA.]

Religious Conditions of the Italians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In response to Father Corbett's question I beg to say that my work has brought me for the last ten years in contact with a large number of priests from Maine to Savannah and as far west as Pittsburgh. The statements in my letter, for which proof has been called by Father Corbett, are the outcome of my own observation and of repeated discussion of the Italian question with priests and also bishops who were in touch with the work. I may say without exaggeration that my statements have been borne out by their almost universal testimony. I do not, however, use 99 per cent. in the exact numerical sense. What I meant and what I mean now is that the majority of Italians, especially men, are not practical, good Catholics, but are woefully deficient in the practice of their religion.

New York. HERBERT HADLEY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"The quality of mercy is not strained," says Shakespeare. Evidently Mr. Herbert Hadley, your correspondent in last week's AMERICA, must have thought that he would have strained mercy to the breaking point had he been a wee bit more indulgent toward the much-misunderstood and much-maligned Italians. Certainly Mr. Hadley is acting neither nobly nor squarely when he rivets his eye on the evil and entirely overlooks the good; when he looks at our "festas," our "prostrations before the statue of the Madonna, our processions in honor of our Patron Saints" as anything but expressions of piety. Besides, what authority can Mr. Hadley's word have when compared with that of Father Sorrentino, who, as it appears from his article, has lived in Italy, and so is an eye-witness of what he asserts? Moreover, I wonder what statistics Mr. Hadley consulted before he committed himself to all those hard statements about the religious conditions of the Italians. He says that "99 per cent. of them stay away from Mass when they come to this country." Is this possible? No. Numbers will show that this is entirely false.

Let us consider three of the States where Italians are in very large numbers: New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. According to statistics given in the "Catholic Encyclopedia" there are in the State of New York about 700,000 Italians. If 99 per cent. of these stay away from Mass, and only 1 per cent. go, in actual figures it means that 693,000 Italians miss Mass, while 7,000 attend. According to the same encyclopedia there are in the State of New York fifty-three Italian churches. Hence, if what Mr. Hadley says is true, it follows that each church has an average attendance of 132 members. A ridiculous number indeed for all who witness the large crowds of Italians at the many Masses in New York. During my stay in this country I have had the good fortune, or shall I call it bad fortune in this case, of having always gone to one of these churches. Not counting the children's Mass, we had five Masses for the people, all Italians. And I must confess that there were certainly far more than 132 present at each Mass. Evidently, then, Mr. Hadley did not consider the Italians of my parish when he wrote that letter. But what about the other fifty-two churches? Are they as well attended? Really I do not know from personal experience, but from what others tell me they are doing nobly. Moreover it should be remembered that many an Italian goes to the church nearest his own house to hear Mass, whether it be an Italian church or not. So much for New York. What about the other two States? There are about 300,000 Italians in Pennsylvania. If only 1 per cent. are church-goers, it means that the number of faithful Italians there is 3,000, while the rest are breakers of the Sabbath. In the same State there are forty-seven churches for the Italians. If only 3,000 go to church, it follows that each can count on only sixty-four Italian members. A miserable number indeed. Surely Mr. Hadley must have spoken a little too fast when he said that 99 per cent. stay away from Mass. I know that statistics do not make the pleasantest of reading, and I am loath to tire the patience of my readers by placing before their eyes a long list of numbers. But I am sure that they will not refuse to visit our Italians in New Jersey. We are 250,000 there. Of these, if we have to take Mr. Hadley's word, only 2,500 are practical Catholics. For these 2,500 Italians thirty-one churches have been built. What a prodigality for this money-loving country of ours. For it would mean about eighty-one members for each church. Of course, my data is a few years old, and the number of Italians has increased since then, but the number of churches has also increased as can be seen from the "Catholic Directory" for 1914. And so I am afraid that Mr. Hadley has been guilty of a little exaggeration. Hard saying number one.

Mr. Hadley makes another sweeping assertion. He says: "The Italian . . . falls an easy victim to the Protestant proselytizer." Proselytizing the Italians is a job that does not pay well at all. People say, and with good reason, that the Italian has the faith so deeply rooted in his heart, that he may become an indifferent Catholic, but a Protestant never. There are, however, proselytizing societies that try to wrest the faith from the Italian. But what success have they? With the old folk, none. With the young, very, very little. Let Mr. Hadley read Father Lynch's article on "The Religious Conditions of Italians in New York" (AMERICA, March 21, 1914, p. 558), and he will see that the statement that "the Italian . . . falls an easy victim to the Protestant proselytizer," can stand a great deal of amendment. Hard saying number two.

There are many more hard, very hard sayings in Mr. Hadley's letter. I might take them up one by one, and show that a more sane view can and should be taken of the religious conditions of the Italians. It is true, things might be much better. But of what nation can not the same be said? He casts a slur on our devotion to the Madonna, on our heavy candles, on our processions in honor of our patron saints. He asserts that thousands upon thousands of our boys and girls know nothing of their prayers; and that parents send their children by preference to the public schools. A great deal might be said about all these hard sayings which might tip the balance of prejudice a little more in our favor. I hope Mr. Hadley is in good faith. But I think I have said enough to show that he is grievously mistaken about the religious conditions of the Italians.

Baltimore, Md. G. REALMUTO.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Patriots to a Patriot

In far away Magnolia, Arkansas, there is an anti-Catholic paper called the Liberator. Not long since it published the following letter:

Alamo Court No. 1, Guardians of Liberty of Texas, a patriotic organization of American citizens, with Courts throughout the entire United States, which has for its purpose the maintaining of the United States Constitution, and the complete separation of church and state, desires to express to you, and other patriotic Mexicans our hearty approval of your actions and the great good and service you have and are rendering the people and the country.

We would especially commend your actions in ridding your country of the basest of human vultures, the Catholic priesthood. Whenever women are forced to secretly confess to a man who has never married and knows nothing of the sacredness of woman or of home, it is but natural for immorality to exist, and until this practice is stopped it is impossible to raise up a liberty-loving, intelligent, patriotic, moral generation.

Again assuring you of our appreciation of your invaluable worth to your country, and trusting that you may continue your good work until the people of your country are freed, indeed, from the root of the trouble, the Roman Catholic Church, in the language of the patriot, we would exclaim, "Viva Mexico by Villa."

This is interesting for two reasons. In the first place it contains almost the exact words of the wife of one of our accredited agents to Mexico. How did the "Guardians" get so accurate a version of the lady's opinion? In the second place it reveals better than anything else the ideals and moral standards of the illustrious writers. They congratulate the Mexican Constitutionalists through Villa, their leader. Good! The thoughts of the illustrious Guardians run this way then: the Constitutionalists brutally murdered some twenty priests: we, the Guardians of Liberty, rejoice in the deed of blood and congratulate Villa on it; the Constitutionalists tortured priests in most savage style: we, the Guardians of Liberty, are glad of it, and bespeak our joy to Villa; the Constitutionalists profaned and pillaged churches, desecrated altars and sacred vessels, indulged in unspeakable orgies in chapels and convents: we, the Guardians of Liberty, find pleasure in this and would have Villa know it; the Constitutionalists ravished nuns, drove some mad by their brutality, pursued others across housetops, whence the poor creatures flung themselves to the streets below to escape shame: we, the Guardians of Liberty, approve of it, our hearts leap with joy over it, we hail Villa for it; the Constitutionalists blasphemed God, in one instance publicly and brutally denying His very existence: we, the Guardians of Liberty, find pleasure in this, and salute Villa for it; the Constitutionalists in a frenzy of hatred and lust, violated laws human and divine: we, the Guardians of Liberty, approve of it. Why not? It is a blow at the Catholic Church. Such is the attitude of our illustrious patriots, citizens of a land discovered and largely colonized by Catholics. Their program is not yet complete. They have yet to invite Villa into their noble company. He may refuse to make the descent.

Then there will be one other creature left to receive the congratulations of the Guardians. His name is Satan: his home is hell. But perhaps later on Satan, in virtue of his office, will greet the Guardians.

Delicacy of Conscience

A good conscience is an inestimable treasure, a pearl without price. It is easy to stain it and almost as easy to spoil it. For, deny it as we may, every faculty of the soul takes color from environment and deteriorates under abuse.

These are the reasons that send men of letters back to ancient Greece and artists back to medieval Rome. Those who love art and letters cross the centuries to sit at the feet of the masters; they will not take their standards from the little men about them, they will not drink except from the wells that are undefiled.

Why should it be otherwise with Catholics in the matter of delicacy of conscience? Why should they be willing to accept their standard of morality from a godless world? Have they no Masters in Israel to whom they may have recourse in order to keep their judgment sound on matters that are vital for their supernatural life? Are they less concerned about moral principles than the painter about color schemes, perspective and light and shade? Or do they think that they are exempt from the tendency of all life to yield, to conform, to take up with the ways that suit a particular environment and make life easy? Surely better is expected of them. It cost Christ so much to teach us the truth that we should be jealous of its purity. It cost our forbears so much to keep it intact, that we should be watchful lest we lose even the slightest portion of it. It is a precious heritage that has been vouchsafed us, this seeing the things that others have longed to see and have not seen. Much has been revealed to us that has been hidden from the worldly wise. Are we viewing things in the white light of divine revelation, or are we forming our judgments according to the tenets of the world, the world, that is, in our Lord's sense of the word, whose teacher is the father of lies? Is our general Catholic conscience losing tone? Its purity is in the keeping of the individual. Are we safeguarding it?

Votes for Women

Ten States and one Territory have extended the franchise to women. It is quite possible that within the next quarter century the franchise will be universal. What is woman going to do with her vote? The professional promoters have a ready answer. Her entrance into public life is to effect, by degrees, the moral and social renewal of the face of the earth. Politicians will yield to statesmen; politics, to political economy. The poor will no longer be with us, and vice shall hang its ugly head. Rapine and war will cease, and you and I will find ourselves in a world where all the men are chivalrous, and all the women, good. It is very beautiful, this prophecy; beautiful as a dream. It is a dream. A transformation so radical is not within the power of ballots. Votes can elect good men, but they can not make men good. The suffragists in public conventions have grown eloquent, pathetic, on the evil effects of physical dirt, in streets, factories, homes. They have had nothing to say on the moral dirt of divorce. Race-suicide is a viler menace to home and country than child-labor. We have heard much of the latter; not a word in condemnation of a practice that is worse than murder. Not the right to vote, but the willing fulfillment of our duties to God, to one another, and to ourselves, makes homes possible, men happy, and nations great. As a political measure, the extended franchise, may or may not prove a blessing to the State. But as a means of reformation, public or private, it is at best but a poor substitute for personal religion.

China and Chicago

From China, a missionary writes an appeal for cancelled stamps. For a pound of these old stamps, he can buy a baby, sometimes two or three babies, from parents who otherwise would throw the children in the street to die. From Chicago, a fashion-editor pleads for our babies, exposed by parents equally unnatural. "Is it not possible," she asks, in her "Fashions from Paris" column, "that we mothers can dress our children decently, as well as becomingly? On the continent last year, I saw frocks so extreme, that I was hoping they would gain no popularity. But I hoped in vain." Unfortunately, old stamps can not buy our babies from these pagan parents. Style covers all sin. The plain word, "immorality," applied to dress, is a joke. A cartoonist is making a living, selling his illustrated witticisms on the improprieties of fashion to a Sunday magazine syndicate. One recalls with a shiver, that even the pagan satirists, in the worst days of Roman corruption, were too deeply religious to consider this a "joke." They saw in it another indication of a nation rushing to destruction. Adult immorality in the matter of dress is sufficiently deplorable. Can its spread be checked if the children are taught to continue it? He is far worse than a pagan, who forgets the fine old pagan saying, that the deepest reverence is due to a child. Of the traitor Judas, Christ said that it were better had he never been born. He passed the same terrible sentence upon those who scandalize His little ones whose Angels ever look upon the face of God.

Current "Literature"

"America's greatest magazine" is the modest way that a certain monthly of wide circulation describes itself. Such a claim is a challenge, so let us see in what this greatness consists. Here is what those found who scanned the November issue of the magazine in question: three serial stories by authors whose fame chiefly rests on the numerous salacious novels they have written; four short-stories of which the central characters are thieves, wantons or profligates; a "theatrical" department with its usual display of women; a short paper on Egypt; a bit of prose about the war and some "ethical" verses. The last three articles described, which do not fill four of the magazine's 111 pages of reading matter and illustrations, are of some literary value, but the rest of the number's contents is either worthless or immoral. Indeed, there are several stories in the magazine that can not fail to defile, permanently, the minds and hearts of thousands of those who read it. Yet "America's greatest magazine" is probably little better or worse in this respect than a dozen other cheap monthlies of which the combined circulation runs up into the millions.

Who are the readers of all this pernicious trash? Is it possible that Catholics are numerously represented among them? Quite possible. In fact the publishers would doubtless have to record a very marked falling off in their sales, if all the Catholics in this country should suddenly stop buying and reading "America's greatest magazine" and all its near relatives. It must be owned, also, that even in Catholic circles there are men and women belonging to the class thus sketched by the reviewer of a recent "best-seller":

> Clearly there is a large public which likes to open a book full of lips and bosoms, embraces that hurt, beautiful dark faces of ardent males and marvelous deep eyes of women. Also they like these things to be larded with contemptuous references to people who "trot along the worn little path of strict conventionality like a flock of herded sheep." This sort of book is received as very lawless and dashing by a large class of readers, who thereby contrive to enjoy the sensations of being wicked without any of the bother. The vicarious profligacy of respectable people who buy this sort of fiction is not a little touching. . . . These books, however, are by no means only sinful and dashing. They are also illiterate and silly. They stupefy the mind and help in thousands of readers to degrade and blunt all sense of life's reality, all sense of the dignity and usefulness of things and words. These books are also ugly. . . . It is the hopeless vulgarity of conduct and taste which makes of this literature a power to enervate and destroy. Nothing in these books is real—not the virtue; not the wickedness; not even the "desire." It is the easy, fluid perfunctoriness of the whole thing, its vulgarity of idea, its utter lack of style, dignity, reality, and sense of real value that makes a book like this a power for mischief.

Is it at all surprising then that Catholics whose reading chiefly consists of books like those just described, and such periodicals as "America's greatest magazine," should find literary works insupportably "high-brow," biography and history "deadly dull," and Catholic books and papers lamentably lacking in "interest"?

Talking to Oneself

An ordinary man looks around and makes sure no one is present before he begins to talk to himself. He knows that talking to oneself is considered a sign of a weak mind. Yet, why should the soliloquy be excluded from the public? You may sing, you may whistle, you may tap your fingers idly or impatiently, you may play a musical instrument, but you may not let your thoughts rise above their very subdued whisper unless you are in complete privacy. "I beg pardon, did you say anything?" we may perhaps hear, and with a blush of shame at being caught talking aloud to ourselves, we hastily reply, "Nothing at all." We are afraid of being classed with the weak-minded. Why, to-day, they are excluding the soliloquy even from the stage, and when dictographs become cheaper, a man will not dare to swear even in private. The speaker will not address the sides of his taxicab with the splendid retort, the brilliant epigram and crushing argument which unhappily did not come half an hour before. The man who bumps his toe in the dark will choke his rebellious thoughts to silence. That business plan which is going to overwhelm your rivals, that anticipated exultation in the joys of the new honor you are ambitioning, can be given no expression. You may gesticulate and move your lips with the explosive vehemence of a character talking in a moving-picture but may not speak aloud, or the dictograph "will get you."

There is no special reason for sorrow over the fact that the art of speaking to oneself is disappearing. It may even be a thing to be thankful for that many a ridiculous fury kindled to vehemence by personal and private eloquence will be quenched through lack of verbal fuel. The triumphant answers to pet enemies may be less frequent because their authors have ceased rehearsing them to themselves. It is very hard to refrain from uttering to other audiences what has been so often applauded by enthusiastic self. The thought which has been allowed to utter itself in sound is not far from launching itself in act. If wickedness loses its voice, it may be so weakened as to lose the power of thinking.

Anger and fear indulge, more than contentment does, in talking to self. It is naturally hard to know the vocabulary of a language which is spoken only to one, but if we may judge by personal tendencies ninety-nine per cent. of the words uttered to oneself are not fit for polite society. The caddy who said that a golfer on a certain trying occasion had recourse to the most profane silence he ever witnessed, fortunately prevented by his presence some interesting additions to the language of intense emotion. A private explosion may indeed relieve the overcharged heart, but it may also stir up a languishing resentment to more vigorous action. Put your finger on the lips of fear when it would talk to you in private and you will probably spare yourself the painful toil of traveling over various bridges which in reality you shall never cross. Indulge in the silent satisfaction of calm and peaceful joy.

When the pagans were alone, they talked to the trees or the springs or the waves, in all of which they believed guardian spirits existed. When the poets are alone, they talk a great deal to inanimate nature, if we may believe what they put into print. Those of us who are not pagans or poets have a more consoling and comforting practice when alone, and it is guaranteed to do away with all need of talking to oneself. "Enter into thy chamber and having shut the door; pray to thy Father in secret and thy Father Who seeth in secret will repay thee."

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry

III

KATHARINE TYNAN-HINKSON.*

In most ways that count, Katharine Tynan-Hinkson is the very antithesis of Alice Meynell. Perhaps therein lies one secret of their long friendship. In any case, while the reticent, lily-like Englishwoman stands out as a triumph of the "artistic temperament" in spite of much domesticity, her Irish sister will be found quite incorrigibly and engagingly domestic in spite of the often-abused "temperament" just mentioned. Mrs. Hinkson has given us some ten or twelve volumes of verse, along with uncounted prose on all manner of subjects; and she has remained first, last and always, a woman and a mother. The touch of a glorified, an impassioned domesticity is upon all her pages.

> I sing of children and of folks on wings,
> Of faith, of love, of quiet country things;
> Of death that is but lying down at night
> And waking with the birds at morning light;
> And of the Love of God encompassing—

So rang the sunny Introduction to her "Innocencies"; and it might well stand as apologia for her entire poetic work.

Katharine Tynan started life in a little Irish village of the County Dublin, and she has kept always her love of Ireland and of the green fields. But, like most people who praise and sing of country joys, she wandered off early to the big gray city where, for better or worse, the business of living has been concentrated. Her first little volume of poems, "Louise de la Vallière," full of triste and tender dreaming, was published in London back in 1885. Ever since she has gone on finding herself and finding life, and never losing hold upon literature.

*The third of a series of literary papers by the author of "The Poets' Chantry."

In 1893 Katharine Tynan was married to Henry Albert Hinkson, an Irish author and barrister. The story of this happy union has very definitely colored her subsequent work. The "Lover's Breast-Knot" was confessedly its fruit, as are the child-poems which dance, and sometimes weep, in and out of the other volumes. There is a rather unusual note of tranquillity in Mrs. Hinkson's love poems, an absence of storm and stress, of passion and of mystery. They are as domestic as possible: songs of a peaceful love sitting by its own fireside, a love fulfilled and motherly, purified but not dimmed by long service, close to earth yet holding fast to the sacramental seal of heaven. "The True Marriage" might worthily have found place in Patmore's "Angel in the House"; but it needed a woman to write that tense, recent poem, "Any Wife":

> Nobody knows but you and I, my dear,
> And the stars, the spies of God that lean and peer,
> Those nights when you and I in a narrow strait
> Were under the whips of God and desolate.
> In extreme pain, in uttermost agony,
> We bore the cross for each other, you and I.

Even more vividly poignant, if possible, are Katharine Tynan's poems of motherhood: the "gripping" and much-discussed "Maternity," "Love Comfortless," and all the lyrics centering about the little dead son, Godfrey. The thought of the return of the dead was an early motif in Mrs. Hinkson's work. Sometimes it was the loving mother, "a little ghost in white," stealing back quietly "to rock a tiny cradle all in the hushed moonlight"; again, it was the child, come back joyously to the dark nursery and darker hearts left behind, with messages from "the dear God's House in the glittering air."

But in all this wistfulness there is no morbidity. Indeed, there is a peculiar nobility in Mrs. Hinkson's treatment of "our sister, the death of the body"; a quite unaffected courage and a smile all the more convincing for its unforgotten frost of tears. We need look no further than to a little lyric out of "Experiences" for illustration. It is an elemental fragment, peasant in its simplicity and directness, a song of Christian immortality with all the humanness of people living close to Mother Earth. "Planting Bulbs" she has called it:

> Turning the sods and the clay,
> I think on the poor, sad people
> Hiding their dead away
> In the churchyard, under the steeple.
> All poor women and men,
> Broken-hearted and weeping,
> Their dead they call on in vain,
> Quietly smiling and sleeping.
>
> Friends, now listen and hear,
> Give over crying and grieving,
> There shall come a day and a year
> When the dead shall be as the living.
> There shall come a call, a footfall,
> And the golden trumpeters blowing
> Shall stir the dead with their call,
> Bid them be rising and going.
>
> Then in the daffodil weather
> Lover shall run to lover;
> Friends all trooping together;
> Death and Winter be over.
> Laying my bulbs in the dark,
> Visions have I of hereafter.
> Lip to lip, breast to breast, hark!
> No more weeping, but laughter!

All along, it has been Mrs. Hinkson's gift to transmute and transfuse what ordinary people think of as ordinary things. Fain she is not of the far pilgrimage, nor the dream princess, nor the flower of the air. But looking upon the humble, universal things of life, "Sweet scents and sounds, sweet shade and sun," the travail of the "little ass of Christ," the death and birth and love and life of man, she finds all, as in Eden, "very good." And in spite of the many outside influences that have touched her sympathetic verse, in spite of the fact that her quick and constant productiveness has sometimes been betrayed into reminiscence both of herself and others, Katharine Tynan is in all her best work quite strikingly original. She has achieved a note of delicious naïveté: a tender, colloquial human note, and in the devotional pieces a note with something in it of the old medieval intimacy. This tranquil yet wondering simplicity is not a very common grace in our complex modern life. It is, withal, a very Catholic quality; the treasure of shepherds and kings, in the late Monsignor Benson's discerning words:

> Before I tell of Thee, God's Son,
> And all the sweet salvation
> That Thy birth brought to laboring men,
> Make me Thy little child again.
> Bid me put off the years, and be
> Once more in meek humility
> Thy little one and wondering-eyed.
> Give me their faith who stood beside
> The manger that Thy cradle was.
> . . . . . .
> Yea, give me their humility!

This is the poet's prayer at the beginning of her exquisite volume of "Miracle Plays," a prayer fulfilled to the letter and the spirit as well throughout its gracious pages. The whole series is in her best manner; steeped in the mysterious light, the "aching joy," the prophetic pathos which for all time to come have enveloped the years of our Lord's infancy and childhood. Katharine Tynan is no lover of abstractions in divine or human things. Her vision is translated instantly into terms of the simple and concrete. This, doubtless, is the secret of the dramatic realism and the gentle familiarity with which she invests spirtual themes. Who but herself could have given us that unique and delectable song of St. Joseph, "The Man of the House":

> Joseph, honored from sea to sea,
> This is your name that pleases me,
> "Man of the House."
> I see you rise at the dawn, and light
> The fire and blow till the flame is bright.
> I see you take the pitcher and carry
> The deep well-water for Jesus and Mary.
> . . . . . .
> There are little feet that are soft and slow,
> Follow you whithersoever you go.
> There's a little face at the workshop door,
> A little One sits down on your floor:
> Holds His hands for the shavings curled,
> The soft little hands that have made the world.
> Mary calls you: the meal is ready;
> You swing the Child to your shoulder steady.
> I see your quiet smile as you sit
> And watch the little Son thrive and eat.
> . . . . . .
> Joseph, honored from sea to sea,
> Guard me mine own and my own roof-tree,
> Man of the House!

A glorified domesticity: we end where we started, having rounded the circle. This is the note for which Mrs. Hinkson's poetry will be remembered, whether they be poems of nature, or of childhood, of man or of the good God. After all, it is not so difficult a thing for human love, having raised a mortal to the skies, to draw an angel down!

KATHERINE BRÉGY.

REVIEWS

Oddsfish! By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.35.

Monsignor Benson has already filled a long historical gallery with the portraits of Henry and Elizabeth and the Marys of Scotland and of E gland and a multitude of types and personages of their court and day. The present, and unfortunately the last of his great tableaux adds a notable extension to make room for the more difficult figures of Charles II and his luckless brother and successor and many another about whom the variations of Protestant annalists have sorely perplexed historians. In "Oddsfish!", a title suggested by the favorite expletive of Charles II, there is no perplexity. Charles and James and their moods and modes and policies, and the springs and courses and consequences of the anti-Catholic plots and the hundred moot points that vex the students of the period, are set forth in clear and persuasive sequence by Roger Mallock, an ex-Benedictine novice of gentle blood and many tongues, whom Pope Innocent XI selects to stimulate the pro-Catholic tendencies of Charles and moderate the headlong zeal of James. How, with all his cleverness and fidelity, he fails in both, and how, notwithstanding Charles' sworn pledge Titus Oates and his fellow-perjurers do to death five Jesuits and other innocent victims; and how, despite the King's sensualities and infidelities, Roger is won by Charles' charm and fundamental honesty and gains him to final penitence and reconciliation with the Church; and how he loves and loses the wilful but winsome Dorothy Jermyn and regains his Benedictine monastery in Rome, is all told, with much besides, in 460 closely printed pages that are still closer in enthralling interest.

"Oddsfish!" is a well-woven and self-sustained story that achieves its purpose by hiding it in the narrative, and also throws a new and often convincing light on historical puzzles of fascinating interest. Mgr. Benson's theme is a dark and worldly age brightened here and there by heroism. Dorothy, very human in love and loyalty, takes her place rather with Mary Corbet and Beatrice Atherton than on the high spiritual plane of Marjorie Manners and Isabel Norris, and Charles II was an unpromising choice for a hero; yet hero he is with all his sordidness, and the aged Benedictine narrator carries the reader with him in his unchanging love "of Dorothy Mary Jermyn, the least of sinners, and of Charles Stuart, the greatest of all sinners, yet a penitent one." His view of Jesuit influences on James may be questioned, but his fine delineations of the Jesuit marytrs and Jesuit character, his minute and vivid portraits of Charles and James and Oates and Stafford and many others noted and notorious, but above all the interwoven picture of the doomed and dying Church snatching victory from defeat and death and thrilling to resurgent life even in the citadel of her foes, render this book, which he just lived to finish, an enduring and most satisfying memorial of the gifted author. M. K.

Ancient Greece. By H. B. COTTERILL. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $2.50.

To treat within a volume of less than 500 pages of "Ancient Greece" from its early civilization to the rise of Macedon and to fit within this space accounts of the many-sided activities of the nation in the arts, literature and philosophy call for whatever skill an author may have in selecting and combining his materials. Mr. Cotterill, however, has acquitted himself worthily of the task he essayed. In actual amount of matter, Bury's one-volume history, while no larger, has, owing to the use of smaller type and thinner paper, double the matter in this book. Yet Mr. Cotterill's work will give the general reader to whom it makes its appeal, a definite and by no means meagre account of "Ancient Greece."

In the discussion of the early Achæan and Cretan civilization, to which in a new work one turns expectantly, owing to the constantly increasing finds of the excavators who have followed in the footsteps of Schliemann, and among whom Sir Arthur Evans is so brilliant a figure, the author is not only full, but extremely interesting and informing. The numerous illustrations, some in color, are executed with a finish that is not the least of the volume's merits. "Ancient Greece" presents in an attractive way and in a surprisingly brief compass an adequate account of a historical period of which it is a calamity to be in ignorance, even if many have sustained that deprivation without a notable loss of health and prosperity. At the end of the volume are useful tables to assist the treacherous memory. A. P. M.

Poems. By EDWARD SANDFORD MARTIN. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

Mr. Martin's poems have the Horatian spirit and they aim at the Horatian flavor. Their outlook is urban with just a touch of the suburban like Flaccus's. The workmanship is considerably less perfect, and the humor more ephemeral and more hasty—incidentally also more decent—than the Roman's. In other words, Mr. Martin, as we might expect, is more American than Q. H. F. He knows his Park Row and Riverside Drive and Fourteenth Street, and is familiar with Boston and Philadelphia, and life at intermediate points, and he cultivates the quizzical, good-natured attitude toward the ups and downs, the vanities and ambitions of life where men are thickest. His fun is always good, healthy fun, and generally succeeds. The humorist has too much good taste to be irreverent. He derides hell as an ancient joke, though One, Whom Mr. Martin evidently reveres most profoundly, did not look upon it in that light. Isn't it strange that death and hell are so frequently attractive subjects for humorists? What is the psychology of it? "Has the fellow no feeling of his business that he sings at grave-making?" asks Hamlet. And Horatio replies, "Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness." Perhaps humorists feel the seriousness of these things so much that they laugh to conceal their concern. Or haply they meditate so much on death that they come to be on easy terms with it. One of the most amusing poems in this volume is that in which the poet tries to contemplate himself in the early stages of that final state in which poor Yorick is addressed by Hamlet. Here is one stanza:

> I think that when the greedy worm
> Began upon my brains,
> I'd wish him luck, and hope he'd get
> His dinner for his pains.
> I'd warn him that they would be apt
> With him to disagree,
> For, if they fed him well, 'twere what
> They seldom did for me.

The title of this very original poem is "A Mortifying Subject." On the whole this book of light verse is quite enjoyable. It is witty and deftly done, and reflects a cheerful as well as a thoughtful temper. J. J. D.

Gideon's Band. By GEORGE W. CABLE. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.35.

This tale of the Mississippi has some historical value, as its author is an authority on the life and manners of the Southern States before the war. Not without interest for the reader will be the studies of conditions in the cities, some old and some just beginning, that lie along the great river's banks. Then too there are some good pages on the rivalry of boats, their owners, crews and motley human freight. The story has to do with the first trip of the Votaress from New Orleans in the year 1852. The decks are crowded, and yet the author introduces all on board, and for five-hundred pages gives a wordy panorama of too many miles of shore and chute, island and eddy. Through it all is spun the thread of the romance of the owner's son and his rival's daughter. It is knotted, of course, and tangled, but unravelled successfully at the end. The plot, it must be confessed, is not very probable, and the characters are somewhat overdrawn. It is quite unreal that love-making and merry-making should go on while the cholera is raging and claiming victims from immigrant's deck to captain's chair, and many stops have to be made to fill shallow graves along the river. It is far more probable that panic would have ensued, putting an end to feuds, emptying decks and silencing bell and engine. "Gideon's Band" is doubtless placed first on the list of its author's works, only because it is his latest book, not his best.

J. T. B. F.

The Story of Greece. Told to Boys and Girls. By MARY MACGREGOR. With Nineteen Plates in Color by WALTER CRANE. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $2.50.

Good Stories for Great Holidays. Arranged by FRANCES JENKINS OLCOTT. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $2.00.

The Seven Champions of Christendom. Edited by F. J. HARVEY DARTON. Illustrated by NORMAN AULT. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.35.

Now that Christmas is not so far away, intending purchasers of books for children should keep in mind these three beautifully illustrated story-books. In the first Mary MacGregor has written for little readers 103 tales, mythical and authentic, from the history of Greece. She begins with stories of Pan, Persephone, Perseus, etc., and ends with the conquests of Alexander the Great. Boys and girls who open this book will hardly stop reading till they have unconsciously stored up a vast deal of useful lore about ancient Greece.

The second volume named above is a collection of stories suitable for children to hear or read on fifteen holidays ranging from New Year's Day to "Bird Day"—whatever that may be. The compiler has gathered together some 125 tales or anecdotes which teachers, parents or the children themselves can turn to when they are seeking appropriate matter for holiday observances.

How many of our readers can name "The Seven Champions of Christendom"? To most it will doubtless be news to hear that they are St. George of England, St. Denis of France, St. James of Spain, St. Anthony of Italy, St. Andrew of Scotland and St. Patrick of Ireland. These valiant knights, needless to say, have no connection whatever with the saints whose names they bear. For "St." read "Sir," and for "Christendom," "Chivalry." Richard Johnson at the end of the sixteenth century collected, wrote down and published what had long been related as stories at village firesides. Mr. Darton has now excellently adapted them for boys and girls of to-day who delight in reading about slain dragons, rescued maidens, vanquished Paynims and malignant wizards shorn of their power.

W. D.

The Home Book of Great Paintings. By ESTELLE M. HURLL. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $3.50.

It is a fact pregnant with meaning that the "great paintings" should be the work of Catholic artists exclusively, and have, for the most part, an exclusively Catholic message. This fine quarto encloses in some 800 pages fifteen pictures each of Michael Angelo, Titian, Raphael, Correggio, Van Dyck, Rembrandt and Murillo, with descriptive and biographical details of their works and lives. The paintings, with one exception, are well chosen, and are excellently produced, and the explanatory matter, written in simple and untechnical language by one who understands technique, supplies a full and interesting story of the purpose and character of the artists and the meaning of their works. As the majority of these are altogether Catholic in inspiration, it is creditable to the writer that she has been able on the whole to enter sympathetically into the spirit of a religion to which she does not belong. Certain significant omissions in the story of the Annunciation, and occasional expressions such as "in the Middle Ages the Christian religion was a religion of fear rather than of love," betray a lack of that knowledge which gives sympathy its due proportion, especially in relation to pictures that require the understanding of faith as well as intelligence for adequate appraisement. Nevertheless the combination of story and pictures is one of the best and most inviting of the many books that unconsciously spread and popularize the wholesome message of Catholic art.

M. K.

Little Women Letters from the House of Alcott. Selected by JESSIE BOUSTELLE and MARION DE FOREST. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.25.

This is a chatty little book of letters and poems and diary extracts from the hitherto jealously guarded treasures of the Alcott Home. Like a breezy and yet quaint series of genre films they make the reader intimate with Bronson Alcott, the idealist teacher and philosopher of Concord, and with his idyllic family life. His system of psychological child-study and training was quite original. The four clever daughters who owe their literary fame so largely to the careful application of their father's educational system, are brought in these letters very close to our human sympathies. Bronson Alcott's ideas on child-training are so full of common-sense that "Little Women Letters" will doubtless do their share in inoculating moderns with his old-fashioned "Orchard House" principles.

P. G. R.

Statuta Dioecesis Oklahomensis. Oklahoma City, Okla.: Printing Department of St. Joseph's Orphanage. $7.00.

These statutes were promulgated for the diocese of Oklahoma on August 21, 1913, in the first synod held by the Right Rev. Bishop Meerschaert since the erection of that diocese. From the term "Diocesan Statutes" it would be wrong to infer that they contain only such enactments as are applicable in the diocese for which they were issued. Diocesan synods afford to bishops one of the best opportunities of securing the observance of the universal laws of the Church. Hence it is not uncommon for the ordinaries to embody in their diocesan statutes the most important among the ecclesiastical laws, especially those of recent date, and to add to them enactments providing for a prompt fulfilment of the aforesaid laws. It was with this object in view that the Right Rev. Bishop of Oklahoma drew up his diocesan statutes, as is shown by the sections on Incardination, Sacred Music, Frequent Communion, etc. These statutes, followed by several appendices and an elaborate alphabetical index, form a neatly printed volume of about 150 pages.

H. P.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Among recent books of fiction deserving of commendation are "Lord Clandonnell," by S. M. Christina (Benziger, $0.60), the story of the passing of beautiful Castle Dysart from the hands of the bigoted Protestant Lord Clandonnell, to a Lord Clandonnell who is a Catholic priest, the whole tale involving and evolving a mystery that keeps the reader in suspense till the last page.——With "The Prophet's Wife" (Benziger, $1.25), there is ushered into the large field of story-writers a new author, in the person of Anna C. Browne. The adoption of orphan boys and the founding of homes for unfortunate women are some of the themes that come in for interesting treatment.——Homer Greene's book, "Handicapped, the Story of a White-Haired Boy" (Houghton, $1.25), holds instruction, interest and a lesson for every one that reads its pages. Paul Bolton's case has parallels in the lives of many of our boys, and the account of his rapid forging ahead, despite many drawbacks, should have a wide appeal. It is a first-rate story.——"The Doers" (Houghton, $1.00), by William John Hopkins, and "Five Birds in a Nest" (Benziger, $0.60), by Henriette E. Delamare, are books for little folk. The first tells how a five-year-old boy watched the mason, the carpenter and other artisans working, and the second relates the adventures of a family of children whose home was on the Rhone.——"Shipmates" (Benziger, $0.60), is the latest of Mary T. Waggam n's nice little books for Catholic boys and girls. It is the story of how "Roving Rob" was reclaimed by "Pip."

Those who have been reading with profit and pleasure during the past five months the final editorial in each number of AMERICA will be glad to learn that the writer, Father Francis P. Donnelly, S.J., has gathered them into a book called "Mustard Seed," which Kenedy will soon publish.

Catholic Mind for November 8 should be of particular interest to sociologists. The paper Father Richard H. Tierney read a few weeks ago at a meeting of the Illinois State Charity Organization on "The Needy Family and Institutions" begins the number. Father Blakely's articles on "Safeguarding Jim" and on "Catholic Social Workers' are reprinted from AMERICA and so is Father Woods' paper on "The Workingman's Home." The letter Pope Benedict XV addressed to the world concerning the great war concludes this issue of Catholic Mind.

For the setting of her latest novel, "The Witch" (Houghton. $1.40), Mary Johnston has gone to the England of James I. It is a sombre tale with a tragic ending, both hero and heroine being unjustly condemned for practising witchcraft. The author has been successful in bringing vividly before us the early seventeenth century with its wide-spread belief in witches. Of course it was chiefly in Protestant countries that the delusions throve. We seldom hear of witches in Spain. The wonderings of Joan and Aderhold bring them to America, where hospitable Indians give them a home. but England is the scene of "the witch's" doom. Miss Johnston has written books that are pleasanter reading than this.

The Fathers of the English Dominican Province are successfully continuing their translation of St. Thomas Aquinas's "Summa Theologica" (Benziger, $2.00). The third number of Part III, embracing Questions LX-LXXXIII, is now ready. In this new volume can be read the Angelical's masterly treatises on the Sacraments in general and on Baptism, Confirmation and the Holy Eucharist in particular. The 200 pages devoted to the Blessed Sacrament show us the great Doctor at his best. No one has written on that lofty theme with more learning and lucidity. Those to whom the Latin "Summa" is a closed book may here read this beautiful treatise in English.

Regarding the statement in our review of "The True Ulysses S. Grant" three weeks ago, that the author was a Westerner and volunteer and showed slight regard for Eastern generals, and "the perfect West Pointer," a correspondent correctly states that General King is a native of New York, a graduate of the United States Military Academy, and served in the regular army, 1866-1879. His services, however, was chiefly in the West, where, after his retirement from the regular army, he became Instructor and Brigadier-General of Wisconsin Volunteers, 1882-1899, and Superintendent of the Michigan Military Academy, 1901. Whether this influenced him or not, the proclivities noted are manifest in his otherwise excellent biography.

The fortune of a good magazine, especially a Catholic one, lies in the taste and capacity of its readers; and we fear that in this respect Studies, an Irish Quarterly Review of Letters, Philosophy and Science (Educational Company of Ireland, Dublin, $3.00 yearly) has not had so far the good fortune it deserves. Besides literary and historic articles in the present number by Dr. Barry and Professors O'Neill and Boylan, each an expert in his sphere, and accounts of Louvain, Catholic reform in German theatres, Belgian primary education, the electron theory of matter, and the varied output of current thought in some fifty pages of reviews, there are remarkable articles by Sir Bertram Windle on the age of man as attested by geology; by Father Connolly, on Carl Lueger; by Professor Rahilly, who throws a new light on Roger Bacon, and several fine poems, notably by Rev. R. Kane, S.J., and Katharine Tynan. Studies is an "up-to-date" record of Catholic literary and scientific achievement and a convincing corrective of what is heterodox in every department of modern thought.

Cecil Chesterton, G. K. Chesterton's younger brother, who, unlike G. K. C. (who still remains entangled in the meshes of some brand of the "Higher Anglicanism"), became a Catholic some two or three years ago, is coming to America to lecture early next January under the management of William J. Feakins. Mr. Chesterton is at present the editor of the New Witness, a weekly paper originally started by Hillaire Belloc for the purpose of attacking modern fads and fancies such as Socialism, eugenics, vegetarianism, etc. He was the co-author with Hiliare Belloc of the famous "Party System," a book on English political life which attracted so much attention in Great Britain two years ago. Mr. Chesterton is now writing a volume on the war which will appear shortly in this country under the title: "The Prussian Hath Said in His Heart." He will lecture on: "Catholicism and Democracy," "Socialism and the Servile State." "Woman Suffrage and the Family," "The Return to Medievalism," "George Bernard Shaw, Heretic," "Dickens and the English Democracy," "Byron, Shelley and the Revolution," "New Forces in English Literature," "The Decline of the English Parliament," "The Jewish Problem," etc., etc.

Miss Katherine Brégy, whose discerning papers on "The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry" our readers are enjoying, contributes to the current Catholic World an excellent "Interpretation" of Ernest Dowson. She thus assigns him his place in English literature:

> In the eternal justice of things, Dowson must go down to history as a literary decadent. Never as a literary degenerate—that would be a cruel and false arraignment! Decadent art is not yet corrupt or corrupting. It is a tired art, pale or feverish: too tired to work its fine dreams into any approach toward a fine reality; too tired to fight, to reconcile inconsistencies, to pierce through the obvious smoke of conflict that it may, in Francis Thompson's fine words, "see and restore the divine idea of things." But none the less, it has its moods of beauty. If it be art at all, it captures something of the multitudinous vision and experience of man! In Ernest Dowson's work the memorable moods, the moods most perfectly and poignantly expressed, are delicacy and disenchantment. They are not the robust or heroic virtues of literature: none the less we take them for such as they are.

Another noteworthy paper in the November Catholic World is Father R. A. Maher's account of the failure of "Protestantism in Cuba."

BOOKS RECEIVED

D. Appleton Co., New York:
The Hidden Children. By Robert W. Chambers. $1.40.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The Wonderful Romance. By Pierre de Coulevain. $1.35; The Charm of Ireland. By Burton E. Stevenson. $2.50.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
From Dublin to Chicago. By G. A. Birmingham. $1.50.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:
Early American Churches. By Aymar Embury. $2.80; The Pastor's Wife. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." $1.35; Freckles. By Gene Stratton-Porter. $1.50.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
The Sunny Side of Diplomatic Life. By L. de Hegermann-Lindencrone. $2.00.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Belshazzar Court. By Simeon Strunsky. $1.25; The Changing Drama. By Archibald Henderson. $1.50.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Meditations on Votes for Women. By Samuel McChord Crothers. $1.00; Good Stories for Great Holidays. By Frances Jenkins Olcott. $2.00; Vocations for Girls. By Mary A. Leslie and Katherine Wiley. $0.85.

Mitchell Kennerley, New York:
The Great War. By Frank H. Simonds. $1.25.

John Lane Co., New York:
The Need of Change. By Julian Street. $0.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
A Woman's Career. By Myrtle Reed. $0.75.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Half Hours. By J. M. Barrie. $1.25.

EDUCATION

Salvation by Knowledge

It is an interesting phenomenon in the history of the human intellect to observe how one age resembles another. History repeats itself, not indeed in incidental details, but in its great outline, and in its tendency and direction. Certain basic facts may be noticed from century to century, which make us realize the force of the ancient adage that there is nothing ever new.

Take but one instance of many that might be adduced to substantiate this statement. Gnosticism was the name given to a sect of heretics in the early ages of the Church. The name itself is derived from the Greek gnosis, which means knowledge, and it gives the keynote of their fallacy. They claimed that salvation was insured by their superior knowledge; the more they knew, the easier and the more certain their salvation. Hence salvation was impossible for the ignorant. There were many by-paths to their heresy, but taking it in the large, such was the substratum of their doctrine.

THE NEW GNOSTICISM

If we leap in thought over the intervening centuries to the present day, we shall be amazed at the evidence of Gnosticism we see all about us. Look, for example, at the modern craze for education. Every city, town, village and hamlet must have its public library. It does not matter much what kind of books are crowded within its walls. So long as they are books, they are supposed to be the instruments of knowledge, and knowledge is the one supreme blessing for the world. Quantity is required, not quality. Read, read, read, and you will become educated, is the twentieth century watchword. Salvation cometh by education. That the population of our cities spends its time reading the "six best-sellers," dealing largely with matters of sex, excites no fears in the heads of the managers of our large public libraries; neither does the fact that their shelves are groaning under the weight of hundreds of thousands of books that should never have seen the light of day. But the people must be saved, and salvation comes by reading, and reading great quantities of books is nowadays looked upon as education. We have a supreme contempt for the so-called Dark Ages. How could any one be educated in the thirteenth century, for instance, when there were no steel, fire-proof book-stacks, and the linotype had not yet been invented?

But this is not all. So great a thing is salvation, that whole populations much be saved, even in spite of themselves. Children must be hurried into school, even at a tender age, to prepare for salvation. Hence our Kindergartens, and our Montessori Houses of Childhood. And then they must, by force of law, remain in school for a stated number of days, weeks and years, for a stern officer of the State seeks out truants, and forces salvation into the recalcitrant brains of stragglers. All men must be saved; salvation comes by education; therefore all men must be educated. This is the syllogism of the rising generation, and the entire population must go through the processes of what is to-day fondly looked upon as genuine education. Nor is there to be any escape. There must be free books, and free lunches, and free transportation to and from school, and, some day, free clothes. Shall not salvation be free?

IGNORANCE THE ONLY CRIME

Hence the contempt now everywhere manifested for ignorance and the ignorant; hence our vacation schools, our continuation schools, our evening schools, our University Extension lectures, our schools for everything under the sun. Thus, too, our insatiable desire to learn everything at once. In former ages, the human mind was allowed to grow and develop by degrees, along normal lines, just like a flower. But salvation must not be delayed. We must be educated over night, in twenty lessons without a master. We must be taught twenty different things, passively, joyously, without effort, by the aid of moving pictures, and our teachers must do the work for us, for we are fast losing the power to think for ourselves. Thus the crowded curriculum is overflowing with fads, interspersed with play, and dominated by ring-around-the-rosy methods, and scarcely half the day can be given over to the real work of mental training.

There can be no religion without a god. The god of the new gnosticism in education. For the One True God of our fathers there is no room in the modern educational institution. We worship at the shrine of education. We sacrifice fabulous sums year after year on the altar of knowledge, without a murmur of protest, because we are seeking salvation, and salvation is cheap at any price. Ignorance, consequently, is the only crime in the eyes of many modern educators. Only the illiterate and the uneducated are thieves and liars and adulterers; only the ignorant are corrupt and sinful. If people were only educated, they would ipso facto be good citizens, paragons of virtue.

Nor is this all. Just as the rising generation must be educated in order to be saved, so also the generation just risen must be saved. To carry on this grand work of regeneration, we have produced a new species known as the professional uplifter. Always unmarried is the uplifter, nearly always a woman, and invariably drawing a large salary at the expense of the city, county, State or nation, or of some heavily-endowed, self-constituted charitable agency, with an insatiable propensity for investigating.

GOVERNMENT BY "EXPERTS"

And then the thirst for salvation goes still further. Only the educated are competent to lead and guide and govern us, and a college or university degree is now required in many places in order to gain an entrance into public life. We are largely turning over the functions of government to "experts." This is the name which they assume. They dominate our school boards, our municipal activities, our charitable enterprises, our governmental energies. These experts all draw large salaries, and they manifest a monumental arrogance toward those whom they think are not as highly specialized as themselves. Does this seem exaggerated? If it does then your fortunate experience has been that you have never met a typical "expert."

Strong lights cast dark shadows. It is a question if we are really as highly educated in this twentieth century as we imagine we are. It is not such a far cry after all from the Gnostics of the third century to the Gnostics of the twentieth century. Let us have education, by all means. The more we have of it the better. That is what the human mind is made for. But let us have real education, not heresy sailing under an assumed name.

THOMAS F. COAKLEY, D.D.

SOCIOLOGY

The Modern School of Philanthropy

Seven miles to the north of the most congested sweatshop district in the world, in the academic quiet that hangs over Columbia University, Mrs. Florence Kelley is lecturing on the sociological aspects of modern trade and industry. She is telling her class that modern industry is a menace to the family, to public health, to education and to morality. She has no difficulty in proving her thesis. She has seen with her own eyes the things she tells of. She has lived with the workers, has striven to help them in their struggle against oppression, has noted the change that has come over their class in the last quarter century. The older ideal of home, she says, meant a breadwinner, the father, and a mother who was a homemaker. It connoted children, carefully trained at home, in school, and at church, for this world and the next. This ideal home is rapidly disappearing from our manufacturing centres, and society, apparently, does not count itself the poorer for the loss. Vast numbers of men never form families, because they fear the drain upon small incomes, made insecure by the precarious nature of their occupation. Women have entered, or have been forced into, industrial and commercial life, to engage, many of them, in a health-breaking toil which tends to unfit them for marriage and its responsibilities. We see no danger in the ominous fact that thousands of young girls are employed by night, in factories, in hotels, laundries, telegraph and telephone offices. These workers are free agents before the law, voluntarily contracting to sell their labor for a price. The freedom to make contracts, even though harm result to the general social welfare, must not be restricted. The law allows it and the court doth give it.

BREAKING UP THE HOME

The withdrawal from the home, not only of mothers and daughters, but of the children as well, is made possible by the resources and demands of modern industry. Literally millions of American children, growing boys and girls, are thus exposed to the physical and moral dangers of street-trades, and to the degrading environments of mill and factory life. New York city alone annually issues working papers to more than forty thousand children under sixteen years of age; and in comparison with the statutes which legalize child-slavery in many American communities, the labor laws of that city are the most perfect flowering of all that is desirable in social legislation. Mrs. Kelley suggests that our grandchildren will recall with horror that, because of political or incompetent school-boards, an almost incredible number of city children are at school on a part-time schedule. Possibly; but posterity's horror may well deepen when it recalls that in this year of grace, 1914, eighteen million children were growing up in schools in which the name of Jesus Christ, unless it were mentioned as the designation of an historical personage, like Socrates, Buddha or Confucius, was anathema to the law. Surely, this is not training children to those virtues which alone make home-life possible. In dangerous trades, and through industrial accidents, either preventable or unavoidable, which kill or cripple breadwinners, thousands of homes are annually broken up. The meagre income of these workers, barely allowing them to live, has precluded the possibility of leaving a penny for the support of the bereft family. The common result is, that the mother goes to work at some under-paid job. After a struggle, the children are parcelled out to State and private institutions. Of these refuges, about ten per cent. will endeavor to fit the child to make his way in the world, by reproducing, as far as possible, normal home conditions. The other ninety per cent., unwittingly perhaps, and unwillingly we gladly concede, help to form mere wrecks and fragments, mere flotsam and jetsam tossing on the waves of the social sea.

PROFESSIONAL PHILANTHROPY

What are we going to do about it? We have been besieged by commissions and reports, tabulations and statistics, flashlight photographs and social exhibits, until some of us have awakened to the truth that "something ought to be done" to prevent modern industrial conditions from becoming greater sources of danger to the physical and moral well-being of the community. Meeting the realization that the study of social maladies is quite as necessary as researches in cattle diseases, maintained by Government bureaus, the modern school of philanthropy has come into being.

The school of philanthropy is worthy of praise, first for the investigations which it has conducted, and next for its work in awakening public opinion to the gravity of evils connected with modern industries. Its suggestions for remedial measures have been incorporated, from time to time, in excellent laws. But nothing more can be said in commendation of the school of philanthropy, as it exists outside the influence of the Catholic Church. It is false in its underlying principle that man is not made for a supernatural end. It is false in its plan of social betterment, which excludes supernatural religion as the first means of improvement, without which all others are but temporary, superficial or pernicious. Men, women, children, made in God's own image, are, in its estimation, so many economic or social factors, with certain physical and psychic differentiations, but nothing more. Christianity may or may not be, according to circumstances, a factor of value in life. Normally, religion is an æsthetic, a spiritual, an uplifting influence, like a love for music or painting, or the refining atmosphere of a cultured home, or the strong motive which dominates a man bent on achieving material success. But it is nothing more. It is certainly nothing for which a man should sacrifice comfort, ease or life itself.

A MENACE, NOT A REMEDY

This materialistic philosophy identifies man's perfection with economic independence. It aims to make man happy and virtuous by making him healthy and wealthy. But it is foredoomed to failure even in the narrow sphere of activity to which it restricts itself. Ruling God out of His world and the hearts He has made, it is, in effect though not in purpose, a menace to right living. Picture the ideal order which it proposes to establish. Every man sits under his own fig tree, assured of a suitable income, secure in the thought that his family is provided for in case of his death. Not only are his reasonable wants supplied, but the changed face of the economic world allows him a modest degree of luxury. But there is nothing supernatural, either in his heart, or in the heart of the community. Social legislation, good fellowship, supply the place of religion.

Will content or virtue be affected by this ideal order in which material prosperity is assured to all?

The question is ridiculous. All philosophy, all literature, our own observation, combine to teach that man's wants increase in proportion to his possessions. Recent studies in the cost of living indicate that as the family income increases, the family finds new wants, hitherto deemed wholly unnecessary. A married man whose weekly wage is $8.00 does not dream of buying an automobile or a grand piano. Increase his stipend tenfold, and he begins to think the purchase feasible. Man's wants are as the daughters of the horse-leech. Furthermore, it is absolutely untrue that there exists a relation of cause and effect, or even of occasion, between material prosperity and good morals. In fact, it does not seem an exaggeration to say that, as a rule, the more prosperous man is in this world, the weaker is his desire for the better things of the world to come. His heart is with his treasure, and his treasure is the root of evil.

THE CATHOLIC VIEW

To the Catholic mind, the theory and practice of the modern school of philanthropy is nothing short of abominable. In their recent book on the juvenile court, Flexner and Baldwin furnish an excellent example in point. The authors complain of the tendency to consult for the welfare of the delinquent or neglected child on the primary ground of the child's membership in some religious sect. It is quite possible that in many Catholic families where poverty and dirt are supreme, the unfortunate child may never learn the excellence of a bath, or the value of knowing how to read and write. It may be undeniable, on the other hand, that in institutions from which the religion of Christ is absolutely barred, he will soon be taught to take his tub nicely, to read and write and cipher with precision and dispatch. But if we are forced to choose, we hold that it is infinitely better to deprive a child of his bath rather than of the Sacraments; better far that he remain forever blind to all that is beautiful in literature, art, and the refinements of society, than that he lose his passport to heaven, his Faith. We must take more care of our souls than of our bodies, the Catechism teaches. We must take care of our bodies, our minds, our material prospects; these are the only factors of right living which we know with certainty, says the modern school of philanthropy. Moreover, poverty, sickness, dirt and ignorance are a bar to joyousness in life. But they are no bar to the enjoyment of eternal life, Catholic philanthropy avers. "This is life eternal, that they know Thee, the one true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." If men can be taught to save their souls, all else, in comparison, is of no importance whatever.

Yet Catholic philanthropy is fully alive to the preventable evils which flourish in every form of human activity. It is ready to use all proper means to make the world a better place in which to live. It recognizes that man has a body as well as a soul, that poverty in itself is not a virtue, that dirt may be the result of sin, that joy and happiness, and reasonable comfort, far from hindering, may well help man to attain the end for which God made him. But it will have no part in any scheme for social betterment which refuses to recognize that God, and not material prosperity, is man's last end.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"We need more legislation to help the babies, and less to help the hogs," said Dr. J. N. Hurty at a recent state convention of nurses. Dr. Hurty asserts that 20 per cent. of all the babies born in America, die before they are one year old, and that twenty per cent. more do not live five years. If the little dears need more legislation to help them over life's hard places, by all means let each nursery in the country be equipped with a complete set of the Revised Statutes. But perhaps what is needed is not more legislation, but better legislation, and a large and generous reform at home. Senator Root says that we make altogether too many laws. From 1909 to 1913 inclusive, national and State legislatures passed 62,014 statutes. During the same period, 63,379 decisions of national and State courts of last resort were reported in 630 nicely-bound volumes. Plainly, it would seem to be wiser to give over passing foolish laws, and to begin to teach the children, even in the sacrosanct public schools, a little more religion.

Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew, "John Ayscough," with two other Catholic chaplains, has been "mentioned in the dispatches," by General French. The bravery and devotion of the clergy, chaplains, officers and privates, has been noted in every army now engaged at the front. A French colonel recently said the cheerfulness, ready obedience, and spirit of sacrifice, displayed by the priests in the ranks, more than doubled the strength of his command. Meanwhile Viviani and the skulkers at home, represented by such papers as the Paris Matin, continue unblushingly their measures of hostility against religion. One wonders if, in the days of peace, the Catholics of France can nerve themselves to send these rascals packing.

One may be sure that whatever ex-President Taft may say in public will be wisely said. He thus comments upon certain proposed radical changes in the country's fundamental law:

> It seems to me that what we need to-day is more reverence and respect for law and order, and less hysterical clamor for more law and a new order which leads no one knows where.

Well may Mr. Taft question the prevalent American tendency to use the agency of law to correct evils, springing from a source which the law can not reach. "Freak" laws only aggravate untoward conditions, and even the wisest ordinance is frustrated in a community where reverence for rightly constituted authority is a forgotten virtue.

"No one can despair of France," writes the Month, "with the 1913 figures of the Propagation of the Faith before his eyes." It is from France that the largest proportion of foreign missionaries is drawn, and out of her poverty the Church in France contributed last year over six hundred thousand dollars for the missions. Next in order, come the United States and Germany with Alsace-Lorraine, with respective alms of three hundred and eighty thousand and one hundred and ninety thousand dollars. One is rather surprised to note that between them, Catholic Italy and Spain contributed but ninety-four thousand dollars. England and Ireland could furnish but sixty thousand dollars, forty thousand of which were given by poverty-stricken Ireland. Commenting on England's small offering, the Month remarks that "our people have yet to learn as a matter of experience that one does not lose by lending to the Lord." This is doubtless true, but no one knows better than the Month the poverty of English Catholics, and the pressing calls for alms at home.

Through the medium of the daily press, a New York Episcopalian church offers a very attractive program to the tired church-goer. As this particular Protestant church does not countenance the Mass, the morning service will be a sermon by the minister. At 4 P. M. Gaul's "Holy City" will be rendered by a special choir, and at 8, there will be a "Symposium on the Ethical Aims of the Political Parties," conducted by a Democrat, a Republican, a Progressive and a Socialist. Not to be outdone by these followers of the establishment, a Methodist Church announces that "on Tuesday evening, election returns will be received." While waiting for tardy precincts, the "Music Makers will render a Sacred Program." A Baptist clergyman intends to preach on "What I Saw in Burma," and the Church of the Messiah is to hold a social service meeting, during which the pastor will discuss the war in Europe and its relations to the "Social Question in America." Finally, a gentleman who does not mention the Church of his allegiance, gives warning that he will preach on the topic, "Why is the Church Losing Her Hold?" It seems scarcely necessary to preach a sermon to find the answer. This may be had by perusing the weekly ecclesiastical advertising column in any New York newspaper.

John Barleycorn has fallen upon evil times. Russia's intention to abolish the sale of vodka, and France's restrictions on the manufacture and sale of absinthe have been known for some time. In the armies, both of the Germans and of the Allies, the use of alcoholic liquors has been banned. Throughout London, licensed premises, including clubs and restaurants, have been ordered to close at ten instead of eleven P. M. In garrison towns the closing hour is nine, and it has been recommended that public houses be forbidden to open before ten or eleven in the morning. "It is mistaken kindness on the part of civilians," says the London Times, "to offer drink to soldiers, as training is thereby impeded and discipline adversely affected." In America, corporations with large employee lists are endeavoring to affect what legal prescription can not do, by putting a premium upon total abstainers. A steel company in Illinois, is planning a "dry" campaign among its workers, because under the workingmen's compensation law, it can not afford to retain men who drink. Over the entrances to the plant, huge electric signs flash these and similar questions, "Did Booze Ever Help You to Get a Good Job?" "Did Booze Ever Make Your Family Happier?" The motives here suggested may not be the most sublime, but they may be exceedingly useful in lessening intemperate drinking.

According to statistics prepared for the Spectator by Mr. F. L. Hoffmann, the homicide rate of the United States is the highest of any civilized country in the world. Last year the number of murders approximated 6,500. This is probably much lower than the real figure. Because of their reluctance to establish a felonious crime, coroners' juries frequently call murders "accidents." The murder rate of New York is six times that of London, three times that of Berlin, and larger by sixty per cent. than that of Paris. The worst American city in this respect is Memphis, which has 68 murders per 100,000 of population. The best is Milwaukee, with an average of 3.4. The most appalling feature of this black record is that the average has been steadily rising. The Rochester Post-Express attributes this increase to laxity in enforcing the law, and to faulty court procedure. This explanation the Chicago Tribune rejects as superficial.

> Police laxness no doubt helps swell the list of homicides in this country. But there certainly must also be deep-seated sociological and pathological causes for our leadership in murder. The psychopathic laboratory in this city is now attempting a study of crime and criminals. But its work is limited. This country has need of a more effective and exacting system of getting and keeping crime data. We can not attempt to cure this sinister abnormality of our civilization without having made a thorough diagnosis of it first.

There is a good deal of nonsense in this learned prosing. None of the many commentators on Mr. Hoffmann's figures have noted that this increase in murder and other crimes of violence, coincides fairly well with the abandonment of religious teaching in the schools, and above all in the homes, of the American people. Bishops Candler and Williams, with other non-Catholic clergymen, are expressing their grave concern that several generations of Americans have grown up with no religious training whatever. Dr. J. H. Greenstone writes in the current "American Jewish Year Book" that the lack of religious education among Jewish children, is such as "should not be tolerated in a self-respecting community." It is not at all clear that our greatest need is a diagnosis made by psychopathic experimentation. The disease and its main causes are fairly well known. What is desired is a remedy, and the remedy is to be found, not in law or psychopathy, but in religion.

"It is at least comforting to think," comments the Month, "that France may take her present visitation as a salutary warning, not only against further legislative injustice, but against a suicidal social practice which is at once abominable in the sight of God, and ruinous to her temporal interests." It would seem that a similar warning is almost as necessary in the United States. Hare-brained enthusiasts, ignorant alike of morality, science and human nature, are striving to legalize practices scarcely less deplorable, on the plea that what the race needs is not quantity, but quality. What Dr. Flick wrote some months ago in the American Ecclesiastical Review has recently been stated even more strongly by Sir William Bateson, when he said that the efforts of so-called eugenists were making America a spectacle to the civilized world. While the highest forms of eugenism may not advocate, they at least have no hard words for the practices, which in the last forty years, have cut cruelly into the resources of France. Shortly before the outbreak of the war, certain French "sociologists" were at pains to explain, that the falling birth rate in France simply indicated that the race was gradually working toward ideals of perfection. What it really meant, is thus expressed by the Month:

> In 1871, the population of the new German Empire was forty-one millions odd, about five million more than that of France; now it is over sixty-five million, while France is still under forty. France, in other words, has increased by less than four millions in forty-three years, while Germany has grown by about twenty-five millions! It seems certain that on this occasion France, without the aid of Russia and England, would have proved as easy a victim to German arms as in 1870. Malthusianism is no less a foe to national greatness than it is to Christian life.

War is often the scourge in the hands of God, driving a people back to decency. So it was in the days of the Old Testament; so too, perhaps, in the wars that have devastated Europe more than once during the Christian era. Is the growth of this repulsive form of crime among the American people to bring upon them a similar punishment?

The Living Church for October 31, opens with a lyric of 164 verses on "The Summer of All Saints." This is really not so long when one considers that 11,066 Saints are immortalized in these imperishable verses. Brevity is consulted by devoting but a single line to the eleven thousand followers of Saint Ursula, and the space thus saved allows the poetess to commemorate in a line and a half, Saint Thomas à Kempis, lately raised to the altars by the See of Milwaukee. For the first time in history, very probably, the name of Saint Aloysius appears in the Living Church—tardy honor!—where for the sake of rhyme, and not from historical considerations, he is bracketed with Saints Jerome and Athanasius. By poetic license, doubtless, Saint Francis de Sales is assigned to the See of "Genoa," and the Apostle of the Indies, not without the sacrifice of melody, has his name changed to "Xaxier." The rhyme scheme of "The Summer of the Saints," seems borrowed from Gertrude Stein, the gifted singer of "Tender Buttons." "Holy and body," "how and flow," "loving and giving," "Antioch and Joan of Arc," "theology and humility," "Ursula and Bonaventura," "modesty and heart-pierced by," are possibilities which should not be overlooked by the next editor of Walker. It may be feared, however, that not a few members of the Protestant-Episcopal Church will like these Saints as little as they will like Miss Irving's verses. Three of them are Popes, and most of them are the merest of post-conciliar papists.

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases

Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

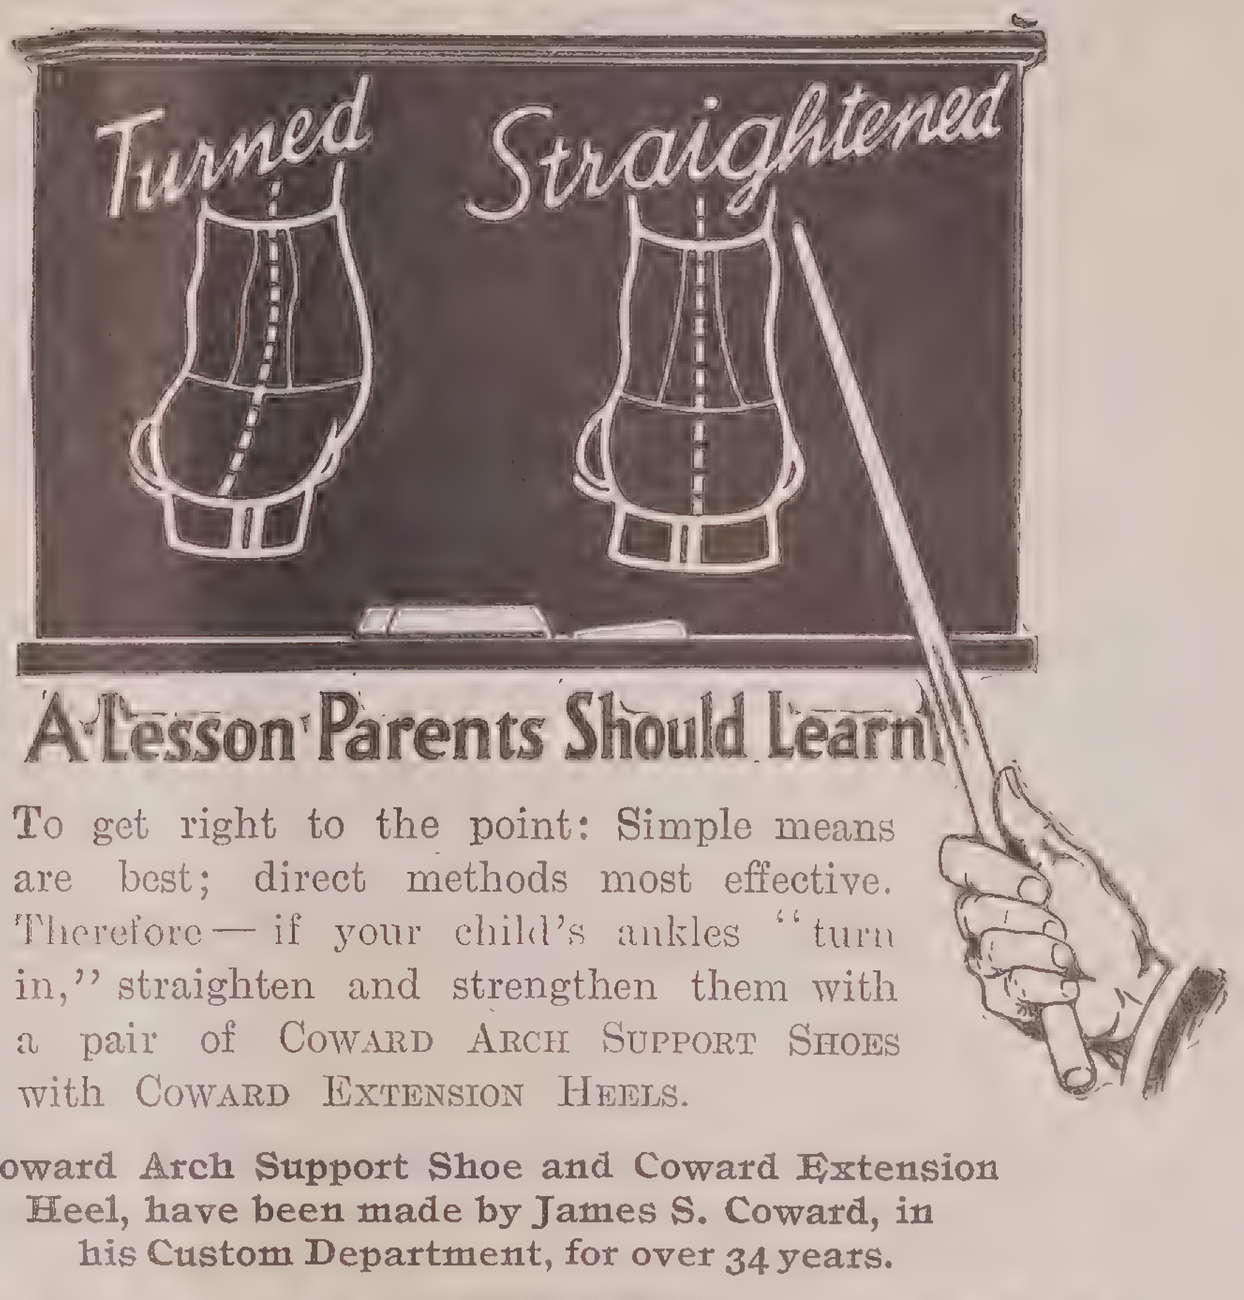
CHURCH CUSHIONS

Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort

Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished

GEO. M. MILLER

129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.



Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

The Coward Shoe

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

A Lesson Parents Should Learn

To get right to the point: Simple means are best; direct methods most effective. Therefore — if your child's ankles "turn in," straighten and strengthen them with a pair of COWARD ARCH SUPPORT SHOES with COWARD EXTENSION HEELS.

Coward Arch Support Shoe and Coward Extension Heel, have been made by James S. Coward, in his Custom Department, for over 34 years.

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

ARMY AUCTION BARGAINS

Saddles	$3.00 up	Army Revolvers	$1.65 up
Bridles	.90 "	" E-L Rifles	.98 "
Team Harness	21.85 "	" Swords	.35 "
Leggings, pair	.15 "	" 7 Shot Carbine	3.50 "
Tents	2.85 "	New Uniforms	1.50 "

Colts Cal. 45 Revolver $7.45. Ctgs. 1c each. 15 Acres Government Auction Bargains illustrated and described in 420 large pages wholesale and retail cyclopedia catalogue, mailed 25 cents East and 30 cents West of the Mississippi River.

Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York

CATHOLIC MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

Is prepared to furnish Parochial Schools, Convents, Hospitals, Asylums, Clubs, etc., at the LOWEST RATES and the MOST REASONABLE TERMS. Projecting Machines and strictly censored Films of Religious, Educational, Dramatic, Comic and other subjects.

THIS NEW WORLD WIDE FEATURE of Education and Amusement, PROVIDES a source of REVENUE, far beyond the cost of installing and maintenance.

Let me tell you more about it, also rates, terms, etc.

JOHN J. McGRANE, President,
505 Fifth Avenue, New York City

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains several articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, NOV. 8.

Four Papers on Catholic Sociology

"The Needy Family and Institutions"

BY THE REV. RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J.

"Safeguarding 'Jim,'" By the Rev. Paul L. Blakely, S.J.; "The Workingman's Home," By the Rev. Henry Woods, S.J.; "Catholic Social Workers," By the Rev. Paul L. Blakely, S.J. In this number too is the letter on the Great War that Pope Benedict XV addressed to the world. No one interested in Sociology can afford to miss the current CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1906

15. I. Object of Federation. Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D.
II. Divorce. Hon. Daniel J. Kenefick

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
12. Making of a Saint.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
20. The Mass and the Reformation. J. Canon Moyes
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet.
12. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. Charles D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocylonometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1913

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
18. The Index. Peter Finlay, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
20. New England Thought. Michael J. Mahony, S.J.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

TRY IT YOUR SELF FOR 10 DAYS WITHOUT DEPOSIT

If not satisfactory, return it and no questions asked. DAUS IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll, is the result of 25 years' experience and is used and endorsed by thousands of business houses and individuals. 10 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original--

Clear, Clean, Perfect. Complete Duplicator, Cap size (prints 8 3-4x13 inches), price - - - $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

---

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

FOR SALE:

A LIBRARY of approximately 4,000 volumes

Carefully indexed, about one-half English, one-half German, Catholic authors in the majority, but many standard works, history, travel, etc., well represented. Willing to sell either the German or English portion, preferably both. Price VERY reasonable. Would make an excellent foundation for a parish or private library. Address LIBRARY, AMERICA, 55 E. 83d St., New York.

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each
Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

We Have a Position

for a Catholic Man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote.

WRITE FOR DETAILS
Circulation Dept.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

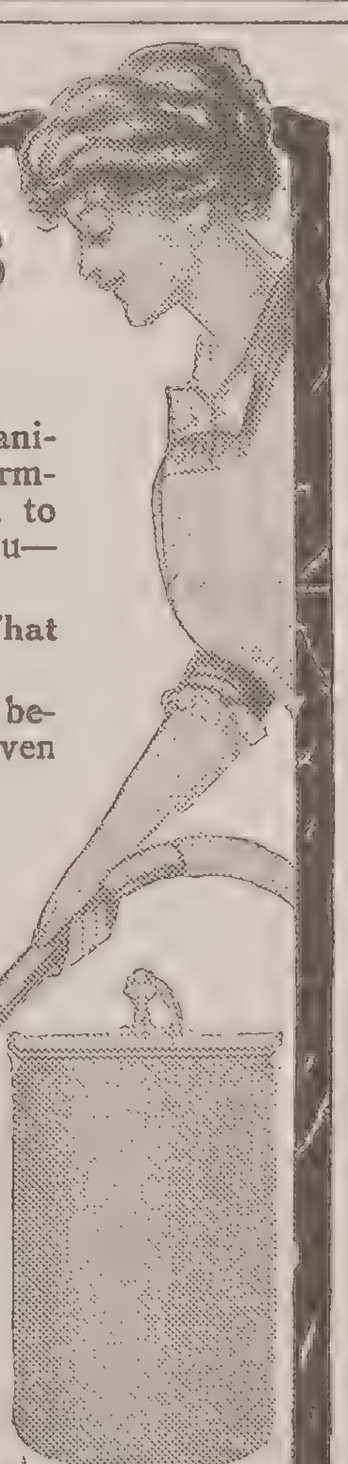
"A Child Can Fold Them"

AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable--easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy



These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

Own The Cleaner That Gives The Greatest Service

The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is the most sanitary because it gets everything, from microscopic, germ-laden dust that low-powered cleaners can not reach, to heavy refuse they can not lift. It runs lightly beside you—you don't have to drag it or push it on a stick.

"It's The Speed and Volume of Rushing Air That Count."

The Bissell has highest efficiency at the tool mouth, because it moves more air—at greater speed—than even built-in cleaners costing five and six times as much.

It is now giving complete satisfaction in many Churches, large Office Buildings, Hotels, Theatres, etc., as well as in private homes of all sizes.

No "extras" to buy for any sort of cleaning. We give FREE an Emery and a Buffing Wheel for sharpening knives, polishing silver, etc. Fittings for washing machines, bread mixers, light lathes, etc., furnished at low cost.

Let It Do Your Cleaning for a Month. We will pay the freight and let you test this wonderful Cleaner, and its handy 1/3 H. P. Motor, for one full month for a ridiculously small payment which you may apply on the machine. But there's no obligation.

Easy payments if you wish. Write to-day.

THE BISSELL MOTOR CO.

344 Huron Street
Toledo, Ohio

Note: The Bissell Electric Suction Cleaner is made and guaranteed by The F. Bissell Co. Toledo, Ohio, who have no connection with the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

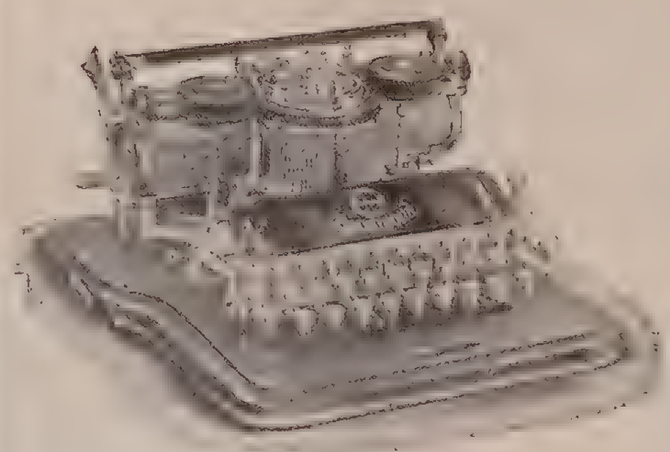
Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By Father Michael Kenny, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.



Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The MULTIPLEX HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

Important Multiplex Hammond Users

President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River New York, N. Y.

BIND YOUR COPIES OF
AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week

In Book Form For Future Reference

"BIG BEN" BINDER Is handsome and durable
Opens flat to any page

Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.
I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "BIG BEN" BINDER

*NAME*_____ *CITY*_____

*STREET*_____ *STATE*_____

The Greatest Book Offer Ever Made

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE

offer for a limited time to those interested in this practical and progressive movement for the spread of CATHOLIC TRUTH, the opportunity of securing a set of the Knights of Columbus Edition of

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

at extraordinary low prices—which the Committee have secured by the manufacture of a large edition.

It is ever ready to answer your questions immediately, clearly and practically, so that you may turn your information into most effective use.

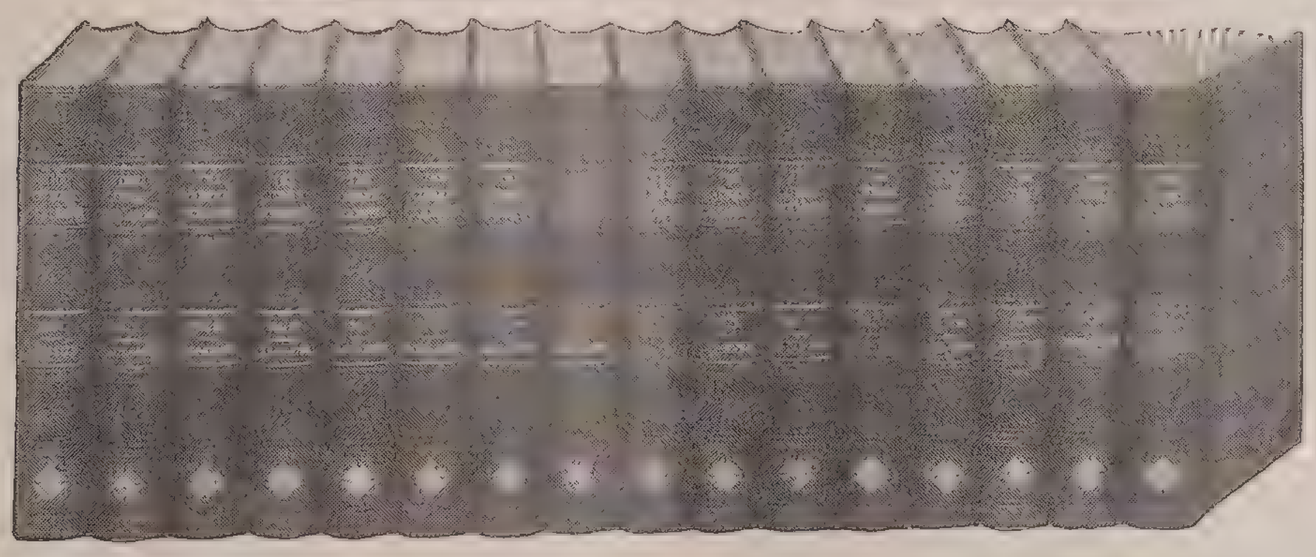
JAMES A. FLAHERTY,
Supreme Knight.

"The Typical Catholic Layman of America"

"An intelligent laity is the prime need of the Church to-day in America. The battle is opened. It is a flood of contradiction, of misrepresentations, of calumnies. History is perverted; Catholic doctrine is put into lying formulas, Catholic discipline is travestied. When the Church, as seen daily, cannot with safety be assailed, the appeal is to centuries of long ago, more unfamiliar to the reader—to remote lands whence no contradiction may come. The remedy is intelligence of all important matters concerning the Church at home and abroad, intelligence that Catholics be guarded from poisonous inoculation, and be, at the same time, in a position to influence public opinion in favor of truth and justice. The most ready arm is the press: hence the duty of the hour is to give generous support to the Catholic newspaper, to read it, to distribute it, supplementing it, as occasion permits, with magazine and book. One book, the summary of thousands, I especially recommend—The Catholic Encyclopedia."

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND

Catholic Progress and Education



The friends of progress and education will be pleased to learn that a special and cheap edition of THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA is about to be issued under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus. The reduced price and the influence of the Knights will put your "university in print" into the libraries of thousands of new owners, and that will mean an immense spread of enlightenment and increase of definite knowledge on all important subjects pertaining to Christianity. I heartily recommend the enterprise and wish it great success.

(Signed) ✠ REGIS CANEVIN.

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS EDITION

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

14,000 Pages
25,000,000 Words
15,000 Leading Articles
350,000 Subjects
1,543 Writers
153 Revisers, Indexers, and Editorial Assistants

15 Color Plates
356 Full Page Halftones and Engra i ng
68 Original Maps
2,277 Illustrations in the Text

Fifteen Volumes, Royal Octavo, and Analytical Index Volume, One Half Leather.
Gold tops and Stamping in Gold on back of each volume.

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA—Knights of Columbus Edition

EASY PAYMENT PLAN

For Cloth binding, the subscriber sends $3.00 with the order, and the sum of $2 each 30 days thereafter until the full sum of $35 is paid.

For the ½ leather binding, the subscriber sends $5 with the order, and the sum of $3 each 30 days thereafter until the full sum of $55 is paid for the complete set.

CASH DISCOUNT PLAN

For the Cloth binding, the subscriber will remit $29 with the order, or on receipt of books.

For the ½ leather binding, the subscriber will remit $49 with the order, or on receipt of books.

THE KNIGHTS of COLUMBUS CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE AM 10-14

16 East Fortieth Street, New York City

Please send me the new Knights of Columbus Edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 volumes, bound in .... for which I enclose payment of .....

Name..... City.....

Address..... State.....

TH ESE PRICES OFFERED ONLY FOR A LIMITED TIME

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS
FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING
BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Now Ready

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law — 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine — Fordham.

School of Pharmacy — Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest.

Mt. St. Mary's College and Academy

PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. College, Academic and Preparatory Courses. Exceptional advantages in Music, Art and Domestic Science.

Address Sister Directress.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty

One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

THE W J FEELEY COMPANY
PROVIDENCE RHODE ISLAND

DESIGNERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF CHURCH WARES
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS

Quilted Mattress Pads

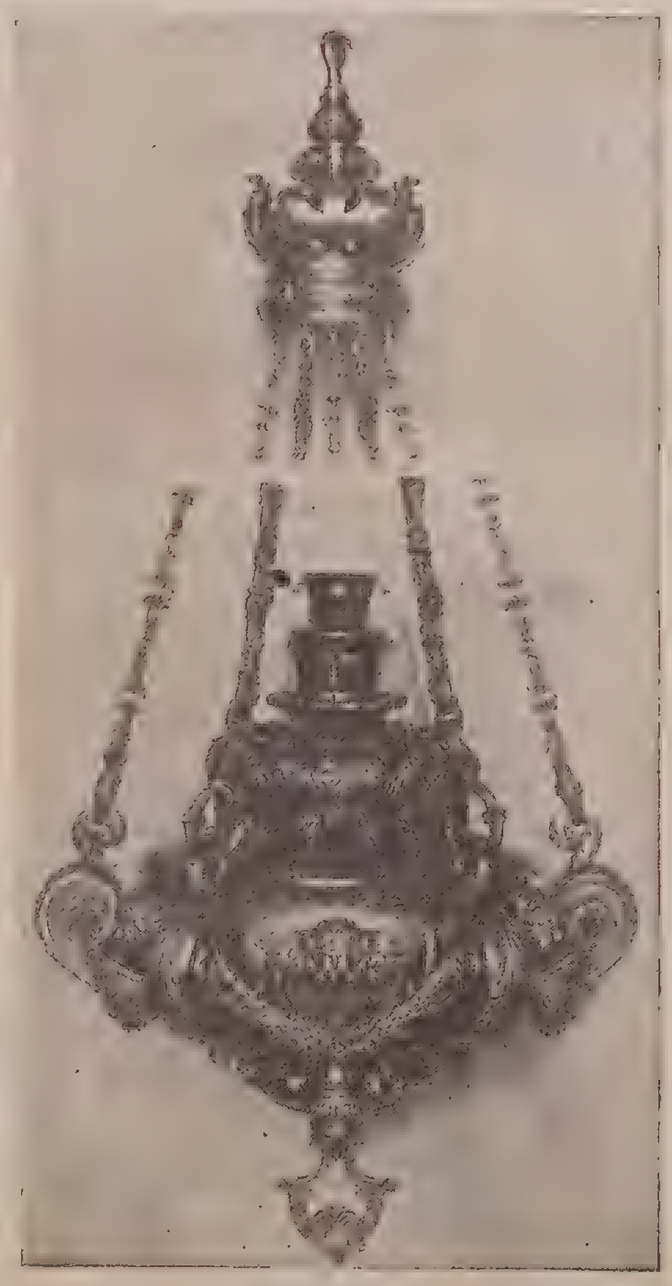
THREE SCORE and TEN is a long life, yet about one-third of it is spent in bed. Then why not make your own bed as comfortable as can be made.

Quilted Mattress Pads

will not only make it comfortable, but as they are spread over the mattress, they will protect it, and will keep your bed or baby's crib in a perfect sanitary condition.

MATTRESS PROTECTOR
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
EXCELSIOR
TRADE MARK
WASHABLE

"None genuine without Trade Mark"



Examine closely stitching on our pads and see that sizes correspond with size on tickets. Seconds, damaged, or "Just as good" pads are sold under other labels. Insist on

EXCELSIOR QUILTED MATTRESS PADS

See that our trade-mark is on each piece of goods you buy

EXCELSIOR QUILTING CO.

15 Laight Street, NEW YORK CITY

Made for the
NEW SAINT JOSEPH'S CHURCH
Brooklyn, N. Y.
REV. WILLIAM T. MCGUIRL, Pastor
MR. FRANCIS J. BERLENBACH, Architect.

BRONZE SANCTUARY LAMP

THE ILLUSTRATION SHOWS AN EXAMPLE OF THE PRODUCTIONS FROM OUR STUDIO. THIS LAMP, INCLUDING THE ARMS, MEASURES OVER 3 FEET IN DIAMETER.

BENZIGER BROTHERS CARRY IN STOCK AN EXTENSIVE SELECTION OF BRONZE CHURCH FURNISHINGS. MANY NEW DESIGNS ARE NOW ON VIEW IN OUR SALESROOMS.

BENZIGER BROTHERS

NEW YORK 36-38 BARCLAY STREET
CINCINNATI 343 MAIN STREET
CHICAGO 214-216 W. MONROE ST.

STUDIO AND WORKS: BROOKLYN, N.Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 6
WHOLE No. 293

NOVEMBER 21, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Nov. 10, p. m.-Nov. 17, a. m. —Deadlock in the West—A Lull in Poland—Austrian Reverses—The Audacious and Emden—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Triumphant in Death. France: A Ruined Cathedral. Germany: Militarism or Selfpreservation. Great Britain: War Speeches—Death of Lord Roberts. Ireland: Agriculture and Enlistment. Mexico: War and Affidavits — First Affidavit — Second Affidavit. Spain: Maura and Morocco.....133-136

TOPICS OF INTEREST
War Orphans—The Young Man and the Religious Life—Italy's Neutrality—The Church and Politics—The Awakening of Faith in France—An Early Transaction in Cotton.....137-143

COMMUNICATIONS
Helping the Belgian Orphans — The Italians Again—The Outrages in Mexico—Hint from a Rural Parish 143-145

EDITORIALS
Thanksgiving—Wary Reading—Children's "Social Betterment"—"Not Anti-clerical but Inhuman"—Wisdom from the East—Just As You Say..146-149

LITERATURE
The Catholic's Bookshelf.

REVIEWS: Germany and England—The Case of Belgium in the Present War—Who is Responsible?—The Facts About Belgium—The Real "Truth About Germany"—One American's Opinion of the European War—The German Enigma—Yourself and Your Neighbors—Mustard Seed—Venerable Philippine Duchesne.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "The Pastor's Wife"—The November Month — "Appearances" — "Rada" — Mgr. Benson's Hobby—"The Great War"—"Uncle Remus and His Friends"—"Letters and Addresses on Woman Suffrage."

BOOKS RECEIVED 149-153

EDUCATION
The Latest Apologist for the Carnegie Foundation 153, 154

SOCIOLOGY
The Bad Samaritan.....154, 155

NOTE AND COMMENT
Louvain's University — League of Catholic Women Undertakes War Relief Work—Sororities and Fraternities in Chicago High Schools—Methods of the World's Purity League—Public School Teachers' Labor Union—A Brave Priest—Protestant Episcopalian "Retreats"—Death of Franz Brandts 155, 156

CHRONICLE

The War.—The deadlock in France and Belgium has undergone no important modification. Bitter hand-to-hand fighting still goes on, with no sign of cessation on either side. The Allies have advanced a little further along the coast, and the Germans have made some progress in the vicinity of Ypres, but this is all; and in neither case has any very great advantage been gained. In Belgium the flooding of the canals, which so much impeded the Germans, is now interfering with the movements of the Allies. Further south, but still in Belgium, towns and vallages have been won and lost as often as several times a day. Official reports from Paris and Berlin repeat the same names on consecutive days in the dispatches which chronicle their victories; so that the best description of the conflict seems to be that the line is swinging back and forth and finds no stable resting place at any point. The Germans have not given up their strenuous offensive, but it would be a mistake to imagine that the Allies are content merely to withstand their attacks. In many places their resistance has been so active that they have not only held firm but have even driven the enemy back with great loss. The Germans have in no wise given up their intention to push on to Calais, indeed, near Ypres they have got within fifty miles of it; but it is safe to say that their prospect of attaining their desire is as remote as it was last week, and much more remote than it was in the days that immediately succeeded the fall of Antwerp.

Bulletin, Nov. 10, p. m.-Nov. 17, a. m.

Deadlock in the West

There has come a decided lull in the active operations in Poland, but everything points to a struggle in the near future that is likely to exceed all previous battles between Germany and Russia. Germany persists in denying that Russian troops have crossed the Silesian frontier at any point, and is particularly explicit in stating that Pleschen has never been occupied by them. Russia is silent on the subject. It is reported that the German army is massed in great numbers and in strong entrenchments from Kalisz to Czenstochowa, and is prepared to check any further advance by the Czar's army. Russia so far has not given battle. Two explanations are given for the delay, both of which have their share of probability. The rapid retirement of the Germans, especially in the centre after their defeat at Warsaw, had at least partially for its purpose to draw on the Russian centre ahead of the rest of their line and so expose it to the danger of being enveloped; this was clearly perceived, it is said, by the Russians, who refused to be led into the trap, and so have halted their victorious pursuit in Central Poland until they can make also good their advance on the left wing in Galicia and their right wing in East Prussia. The other reason is that they have not been yet able to bring up enough troops to ensure victory in another pitched battle. Their inability to do so has been occasioned by the fact that the Germans destroyed all the railroads, as they retreated from Warsaw. The movement of an immense army on foot is necessarily slow. On the other hand the railroad system in Silesia is not only intact but is very efficient. As the usual service has been temporarily discontinued, and all the trains are being employed in the transportation of troops, it is believed that heavy reenforcements have made the Germans once more superior in numbers. How long it will take the Russians to bring up their army it is hard to say, but it seems certain that the great battle of the east will begin at no distant date. Russia certainly is not likely to relinquish the fruits of her victory, and Germany realizes that another defeat would very seriously imperil Berlin itself. Meanwhile she is assuring the inhabitants of the threatened province, who last week were fleeing in terror, that there is no danger of an invasion. One of the ways in which she has undertaken the defence of Silesia is the resumption of the offensive in the north. This seems to have been successful. Moving from Thorn along the Vistula she has forced the Russians to fall back in the direction of Warsaw; and northwest of Plock she has gained a great victory, capturing many prisoners. The Russians, nevertheless, are in places fifteen miles within East Prussian territory, and by capturing Johannisburg they are said to have secured their foothold.

A Lull in Poland

Austrian Reverses

The situation in Galicia looks worse for the Austrians that at any time of the war. One Russian army is rapidly advancing in Poland along the Vistula, and is said to have already crossed the Schreviava river, and to be within fifteen miles of Cracow. It has even been asserted that various parts of the city are already in flames. Vigorous resistance is being offered to this Russian army, in the hope that it may be held where it is until the troops in Galicia have been able to fall back. This they are endeavoring to do, but are pressed by another Russian army which is sweeping west from the river San. Already this second army has captured Rzeszow, Tarnow, Jeslo and Krasno. It has, therefore, been brought to a point not more than fifty miles from Cracow and almost to the place where the victorious Russian advance came to a halt some weeks ago. The passes of the Carpathians are still held by the Austrians, but a new invasion of Hungary by the Cossacks is again talked of and seems to be not unlikely. Austria's campaign in Servia has been more successful. She has penetrated that country in three different places, but in the engagements which followed there has been, apparently, no decided result, as both sides claim victories.

The Audacious and Emden

For some days there have been rumors of the loss of the British superdreadnought Audacious. They have now been confirmed by very circumstantial information given by passengers on board the Olympic, which was called to her assistance on October 27, and after rescuing her crew saw her sink off the Irish coast. England has exercised a severe censorship regarding the incident and has kept the catastrophe secret for three weeks; even now she refuses either to confirm or to deny the report. As a consequence it is not yet officially known how the disaster occurred, although it has been stated that the Audacious struck a German mine while at target practice and was so badly disabled that it was impossible to save her. To prevent danger to shipping she was blown up by orders of the Admiralty. Her entire crew were rescued. This loss has been partly offset by the destruction of the German cruiser Emden, which was engaged in battle by the Australian cruiser Sydney, off the Cocos Islands. As soon as she sighted the Australian vessel the Emden tried to escape, but was quickly overhauled, and being outranged, was completely riddled during a running fight that lasted more than an hour. At last she caught fire and was run ashore and abandoned. Many of her crew were lost, but the daring captain was among the rescued. He and his men were given the honors of war. Her career, which lasted more than three months, was a particularly glorious one, and is almost unrivalled in the history of the sea. With her destruction the Pacific and Indian Oceans have been almost cleared of German warships. Only the Königsberg and the Karlsruhe, and the fleet that was last heard from off the coast of Chili, still remain. Another German submarine raid resulted in the sinking of the British gunboat Niger in the Downs. This loss is comparatively trivial, but it was a daring feat to dash in among 200 British vessels and sink a warship within sight of the English coast.

Other Items

The rebellion in South Africa, in spite of some minor successes gained by General De Wet, is not proving serious. During the week the rebels were defeated twice, at Sandfontein and again near Winburg. Contradictory reports make it difficult to ascertain just how the Turkish campaign is progressing. An engagement of minor importance has taken place near the Suez Canal. The Turks have seized El-Arish in Egypt, and have made vigorous attacks on the Russians at Koprikoi, where both sides are said to have suffered heavy losses.

Austria-Hungary.—The infamous plot for the murder of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand has been instrumental in bringing about the one thing it sought to make forever impossible. To-day the ideals of the great Catholic Archduke have been realized to an extent that would hardly have been possible during the normal course of his life. The aims he had set himself have all been justified. He worked for a strong army and navy, and he sought above all to build up a united nation whose strength should be its loyalty to dynasty, morality and religion. Three months of war have already undone the harm caused by centuries of political intrigue. They have formed a united people. Thus Hungary no longer consists of ten million Magyars, but of all the nationalities fighting about the banner of the monarchy. Upon the Ruthenians only has any doubt been cast even by our own American press, and that doubt has been authoritatively set aside. To complete the work planned by the murdered Archduke it is necessary now to inaugurate a complete legal reform which shall assure full rights to each of the many nationalities. This is already freely discussed. Its execution should be coupled with a religious revival for which the war may possibly prepare the way. It is touching to note in this connection that the Archduke has left in his will a foundation for a perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, binding the nuns to pray for all personal and political enemies of himself and his wife—for all, therefore, who conspired to bring about his death.

Triumphant in Death

France.—In an official communication directed to the various embassies the French Foreign Office, replying to a note of the German Chancellor to the Vatican, denies that the Cathedral of Reims was in any way used for military purposes. The dispatch further quotes the solemn declaration which was made some time ago by the Archpriest of the Cathedral, l'Abbe Landrieux, and published in the Paris Temps. The protest of the Archpriest concludes in these words:

A Ruined Cathedral

> In the name of the Cardinal Archbishop of Reims, and in my own name, I attest that at no time were batteries placed before the Cathedral, that no posts of observation were placed in the towers, and that no cantonments of troops of any sort were placed in the proximity of the Cathedral.

A writer in the London Post reports that the battered and unroofed Cathedral "looks like a ruin." Fears are expressed that even without further attacks from the enemy, a severe winter will complete the wreck of France's most venerable Cathedral. The marvellous beauty of the wonderful façade; "the story of the gesta Dei per Francos in stone," has vanished forever. According to the writer in the Post, even now fragments of stone are falling, and each new day reveals some new injury to the building. The Archbishop of Bordeaux has issued a vigorous protest against the aerial attacks on Notre Dame.

Germany.—The Corriere d'Italia recently published an interview of its Berlin correspondent with Count Hertling, the President of the Bavarian Ministry. As perhaps the foremost Catholic leader in learning, as well as in statesmanship, his views will be of interest to all. He thus sums up what he considers to be the three factors of the war. The first factor, he says, is Russian pan-Slavism, which vainly sought to gain its purpose through the Balkan alliance, but successfully brought it about through the Servian agitation. The second is the French desire for revenge which welcomed alliance with any enemy of Germany. The third is "England's old intention of destroying German commerce, trade and power upon the sea." Germany, he argues, has been forced into the war and will fight for her existence to the last drop of blood. That German militarism has brought about the war, while "its enemies are fighting for freedom on the side of Russia," he characterizes as "nonsensical and ridiculous." The practically universal repudiation of Bernhardi's book on the German side would show that this view is not restricted to the twenty-five millions of German Catholics. The Stimmen, likewise, argues that had it not been for the military training given to German youth, the nation would have been made the laughing stock of its foes, and that, therefore, the present war justifies the precautions taken in the past, which were nothing more than a necessary condition for national existence. No doubt, of course, is entertained as to the absolute justice of the war and the nation's rightful "invocation of Christianity and the Gospel."

Militarism or Selfpreservation?

Great Britain.—The King's message at the opening of Parliament expressed the confidence of the people that, regardless of whatever sacrifice asked, England must triumph in the war against Germany. Addressing the Commons, Mr. Asquith declared that he now believed that the war would not last as long as was at first thought. The Premier based his opinion on the fact that the Allies had utterly defeated the first designs of Germany. "Our enemy has tried three objective points," said the Premier in his Guildhall speech, "and has been baffled in all—Paris, Warsaw and Calais. But we shall not sheathe the sword until the menace to the peace of Europe, the military ideals of Prussia, are utterly destroyed." On the same occasion, Lord Kitchener spoke with deep appreciation of the splendid troops furnished by the colonies, notably by Canada, Australia and New Zealand. "They are training in this country to-day," said Lord Kitchener, "more than a million and a quarter men who are eagerly awaiting the call to bear their part in the great struggle." The parade of the colonial troops on Lord Mayor's Day is said to have been "the finest recruiting propaganda that could have been devised." Recruiting, especially in London, seems to be meeting the wishes of the authorities, and while the question of conscription will probably engage the attention of Parliament, it does not seem likely at present that conscriptive measures will be adopted.

War Speeches

Lord Roberts, called by the Kaiser some years ago, "one of the finest soldiers of our age," died in France on November 14. Lord Roberts was born in Cawnpore in 1832, and was educated at Eton and Sandhurst. In 1858, during his first Indian campaign, he won the Victoria Cross, and in 1901 was elevated to the peerage as Earl of Kandahar. For the last ten years, Lord Roberts endeavored, but with little success, to prepare his country for the war which he believed inevitable. Time has shown the wisdom of his counsels.

Death of Lord Roberts

Ireland.—The Agricultural Department has issued a detailed report showing that in every county there is a large increase in the area under tillage, in many cases double and treble that of the previous year. The increase is chiefly in wheat, winter-oats and "catch-cropping," to meet the demands occasioned by the war. By means of instructors, leaflets and varied information concerning seed-supplies, the Department is assisting the farmers to extend their agricultural operations intelligently, and as a result there is an increased demand for farm laborers and a diminution in those eligible for military service. A report that the Ballot Act or some form of conscription was about to be enforced occasioned a considerable emigration of young men from the Western counties to the United States. Bishop Naughton, of Killala, strongly condemned their action, both because the report was unfounded and in the present industrial conditions of America they had better prospects at home, where they were needed. The Gaelic League has also advised the young men against leaving Ireland for any quarter, particularly in the present crisis. The war is not attracting them, for despite many military devices and the encouragement of the Irish Party and the daily papers, enlistment is still reported slow. Among other causes, the Government's promise to support dependent relatives of enlisted men has not been kept in many instances, several having had to go to the poorhouse; no attention has been paid so far to the reasonable demand of the Irish bishops that the regiments at the front should have chaplains; the Ulster Protestant Volunteers have been sent to Egypt, while the Irish Catholic regiments have been placed on the firing line, where three have lost 90 per cent. of their men. The Dublin Corporation and public bodies generally pass resolutions in support of the Irish Party, and often in favor of the war, but the young men do not respond to recruiting pleas.

Agriculture and Enlistment

Mexico.—The week has been one of riot and blood. Villa took the field with 45,000 men and displayed his usual skill and courage in battle. Carranza moved his troops close to Vera Cruz with the intention, no doubt, of making a timely escape through that port. An unconfirmed report states that a truce of six days was declared in the hope of a settlement of outstanding difficulties. Meantime our Government had issued an order recalling the American troops from Vera Cruz. The evacuation is fixed for November 23. To the credit of the Administration be it said, that it was willing to transport priests and Sisters marooned in Vera Cruz. At the present writing it appears that General Funston informed the Government that the Church Extension Society will attend to this matter. This is an uncalled for interference in a good work.

War and Affidavits

To the revelations made last week are now added a portion of two other affidavits:

First Affidavit

They took possession of the college on August 25 or 26: they held a dance in the chapel and took the ornaments and vestments and threw them into the yard. . . . When one of the servants went into the yard to gather up the vestments and ornaments, he was told he would be shot, if he did not leave the things where they were. The women camp-followers used the benediction veils as shawls and one of the officers took a chasuble and folding it used it as a saddle-blanket on his horse. . . . As to the conditions of affairs in Zamora: . . . the Governor there treats the priests most cruelly. He goes out on horseback and makes the priests follow him on foot. One day the Governor struck a priest saying, "We are told that if one strikes a priest, his hand will wither. Let us see if this be true," and saying this he struck the priest again.

Second Affidavit

Others (Sisters) . . . were given hard manual labor and were treated like slaves: they were obliged to grind corn and wash clothes . . . (too shocking to print, Editor AMERICA). There are others (Sisters) who through some feeling of revenge have been stolen away . . . over forty priests were obliged to come out of the Spanish consulate, where they had taken refuge. They were fined, treated badly by word and deed, being shut up in cages, as if they were beasts.

Next week's issue will contain further affidavits. A decent reticence, however, forbids the publication of much of the matter contained in sworn statements in the possession of AMERICA.

Spain.—For some time past Spanish politics have been revolving about two questions: "What is Spain going to do in Morocco? What part will Maura play in the politics of Spain?" The practically unanimous sentiment of the Spanish people is opposed to the continuance of the present state of affairs in Morocco, where 80,000 troops are being maintained at a daily expenditure of more than a million pesetas, and this without much probability that such a sacrifice will ever repay the country. Socialists and Republicans have openly declared that Spain must immediately get out of Morocco. The "Traditionalists," through the lips of the eloquent Vazquez Mella, condemn the treaty with France, which has led Spain into this dangerous venture and clamor for another International Conference similar to that of Algeciras. The Reformists, led by Don Melchiades Alvarez advocate a purely civil policy, one which will subjugate the Moors by persuasive means only. The Liberal Democrats propose a compromise. Instead of wasting millions of pesetas on a foreign war, they ask that part of this money be spent in the development of Spain's national resources. The Romanones Liberals and the Dato Conservatives are the only politicians who, while opposed to a war-policy, still defend it as a national necessity. The last word of the present Government, seconded by Romanones, is that Spain is doing in Morocco what she can not refuse to do. Time and providence will solve the problem, but Spain's present duty is to force the rebels into submission by concentrating a yet larger force in Northern Africa. But this program convinces no one. The present Cabinet, like its predecessor, which was headed by Romanones, has neither clear views on the Moroccan question, nor any definite plan of pacification.

Maura and Morocco

The Maurists strongly oppose the continuance of the military policy in Africa, and desire that the Spanish protectorate over Morocco work for the pacification of the country by schools and hospitals rather than by military force. The policy of the Government Señor Maura has denounced as an inexcusable compromise with the enemies of social and religious order.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

War Orphans

ONE of the results of the lamentable struggle that is wasting the world is the opportunity that has been given our own land to exercise charity. In many ways American benevolence has hurried to the aid of European misery; we have not hardened our hearts, nor looked with unconcern on the tears that will not dry on the cheeks of widowed women. Now at the bidding of the Chicago Tribune we are turning our eyes toward the orphaned children. It has proposed that citizens of the United States adopt the bright, red-cheeked, lovable little children, whose fathers lie in untimely graves, and who, being too pitiable a thing for the cannon to kill, and too young to care for themselves, must inevitably suffer unless we in our opulence come to the rescue. The scheme is not altogether original and has been tried on a large scale in Canada on behalf of English children, with marked success. There has, too, been a successful, though rather limited, attempt on the part of those in charge of orphan asylums to find childless people willing to adopt and rear as their own the tiny mites of humanity whom death has robbed of their parents. And no one knows better than the priest how ready Catholic fathers and mothers have always been to open their homes and their arms to the waifs whom a heartless world passed by and left to starve.

It would seem, therefore, at first sight that we Catholics ought to welcome with fullest approval the philanthropic suggestion of the Tribune. We can not, however, commend it. Catholics can not view the question from the standpoint of pure philanthropy. Our judgment must not be based on the dictates of unaided reason. We have a higher principle of guidance. Revelation should have its part in our decision. Now revelation tells us that temporal interests are always to be subordinated to eternal interests, and that corporal suffering and the other hardships of life are a slight thing to bear as the price of the safeguarding of the Faith. Faith is the priceless jewel for the purchase of which Holy Scripture tells us we ought to be willing to sell all we have. How, then, can we stand by passively and give our approval to a scheme that is likely to take from many children the most precious thing they have or can hope to have? A beautiful home with the prospect of a good education and an easy and affluent life are no compensation for the loss of faith. The comparison is a pitiable one. It is selling one's heritage for a mess of pottage.

What then shall we say? At the present moment the scheme seems very far from being practical. It is almost out of the question to determine now what children are so destitute of friends or relatives that they have no hope of being cared for at home. Unless, however, this point is established beyond a doubt it would be a crying injustice to the children themselves and to their parents to transport them out of their native land and uproot them from the country to whose traditions and history and glory they have an unquestionable right. It would also be an injustice to the European nations to rob them of the flower of their destitute children, for it is these only that the Tribune will accept, at a time when their male population is so depleted, and they have dire need of every boy who gives promise of developing into a good and healthy man. To us it seems almost a crime to do so. If we wish to perform a work of true altruistic charity we need only establish an orphan fund which will enable the countries themselves in their first years of need to take care of their own destitute children.

Supposing, however, that the scheme were not impracticable and unjust, it has, as it is proposed, an essential lack that must win for it the disapproval of every Catholic. We object to the proposal because it makes no provision for the safeguarding of the Faith of the children. The Tribune says that it will "send to Europe a corps of physicians and nurses who will see that no children are accepted except those free from taint of every sort." From this it would seem that the scheme is not so Christlike after all. The Saviour sought out principally the halt and the lame. What the Tribune promises is "strong, sturdy, bright-eyed, clean-limbed children." But there is no need of adopting such children into American homes. Undoubtedly they will be just as much in request in the childless families of Europe and there will be many such after the war. Is it not something like kidnapping to steal them away now? Granting, however, that their native lands would be glad to have the children taken off their hands, no Catholic would think of even considering the Tribune's plan until it has agreed to add to the corps of physicians and nurses some Catholic priests, whose task it shall be to determine whether or not the child is a Catholic child, and until it has given the further assurance that such Catholic children shall not be put into non-Catholic homes, but shall be placed only in Catholic institutions or in thoroughly Catholic families. It is obvious to all that this concerns particularly the country which is evoking most of the world's sympathy, for Belgium's children are almost all Catholic. Above all their Faith should be safeguarded. Unless this is done we can neither call the proposed plan a work of charity nor can we wish it God-speed.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Young Man and the Religious Life*

OF paramount concern to the young man deliberating on a choice of the religious life, is the consideration of its deep significance, its importance and excellence. He is about to purchase a pearl of great price for which he must be ready to give all he has; a high tower is to be reared for which he must needs calculate the wherewithal. That pearl, that tower, is evangelical perfection.

*The twentieth of a series of vocational articles.

Charity is the scriptural ideal of perfection. Following of Christ is the practical realization within us of this ideal. Now charity sets no limits to our endeavors. A certain degree, tested by our observance of the Commandments, is necessary and sufficient for entrance into eternal life and for companionship with Christ. But charity shows us yet a more excellent way which is that of the evangelical counsels. Their general object is the sacrifice of everything that would weaken or impair charity. In particular they inculcate renunciation of riches, of carnal pleasures and of all ambition and self-seeking, with a view to the acquisition of a spirit of voluntary submission and generous devotion to the service of God and of our neighbor. Self-denial is the watchword of Christianity; no one can follow Christ without the cross. In this respect all Christians are bound to have at least the spirit of the evangelical counsels. Their actual observance, however, means supreme self-denial, means the cross on Calvary, and therefore the closest following of Christ; in a word, evangelical perfection. Now whereas there are many who, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, privately and individually practise such perfection in every walk of life; there are others who under the guidance and direction of ecclesiastical authority make a public profession of the practice of these evangelical counsels. Their state of life is called the religious state, and those who embrace it are called religious. Such persons are not necessarily more perfect than others, but by their state they adopt the best means of attaining perfection, and, moreover, bind themselves by the solemn obligation of the vows to the pursuit of perfection.

The religious state, or the profession of the evangelical counsels, as regulated by the Church, to be perfect, requires: First, the three evangelical counsels of voluntary poverty, perfect chastity regarded as a means to perfection, and in pursuit of that perfection, obedience to lawful authority; secondly, the external and perpetual profession of these counsels. To insure this stability in practices which are not made obligatory by any law, the religious promises himself to God by perpetual vows. The religious state then is a mode of life irrevocable in its nature, of men who profess to aim at the perfection of Christian charity in the bosom of the Church, by the perpetual vows of poverty, chastity and obedience. Like some consecrated temple or hallowed object of the sanctuary, the religious stands specially dedicated to the honor and service of God.

The great variety of religious Orders and Congregations is one of the glories of the Church. Besides the common end of the religious life, which makes it a school of perfection, the different Orders have special objects of their own, dividing them into contemplative, active and mixed Orders. The contemplative Orders devote themselves to union with God in a life of solitude and retirement; the active Orders expand their energy in doing good to men by dispensing the corporal works of mercy. Where the activity is spiritual in its objects and requires contemplation for its attainment, we have mixed Orders such as those devoted to preaching and higher education. It is clear that this variety also permits a larger number of men to find a religious profession adapted to their needs and dispositions, and multiplies the services which religious render to Christian society and the world at large.

What must be the credentials of the young aspirant to such a religious life? Necessarily none other than his gifts of nature and of grace along with Christ's general invitation: "If thou wilt be perfect . . . come follow me." True, the Lord may call one in a very special and extraordinary way, by private revelation or exceptional illumination of mind and all but irresistible solicitation of will. Ordinarily, however, a right intention and such fitness of nature and grace as will give a well-founded hope of his rightly discharging the obligations of the religious life in the Order he contemplates entering, warrant the young man to make his choice. Grace of course prompts and assists, as it does for every supernaturally meritorious act.

With his cause clear, his aspirations lofty, his will cleansed of all paltry self-interest, his heart aglow with love of God and of the things of God, his courage high to surmount all obstacles of flesh and blood and of an alluring world, let the young man consider what symptoms in the past and what reasons in the present seem to make a choice of the religious life especially desirable for him. Has God attracted him for any length of time by the sweet solicitation of His graces, or has the thought to be generous for God lingered with him in spite of natural repugnance and struggle against the thought of a religious life? If so, the fact is worth heeding. God may be strengthening his will in that way for the sacrifice. Although of itself, mere sensible attraction is not a vocation, it may be a special manifestation of it, though not necessarily so. What is vital, however, is that the young man examine his fitness for the religious life. Ordinarily certain physical and intellectual, and always good moral qualifications are required. There may be impediments. Poor health may be a bar to entrance, so also in most cases a lack of sufficient talent or studies. A strong virtuous character, and especially freedom from sinful habits, are indispensable requisites. Poor judgment, ingrained selfishness or stubbornness, an unsympathetic, unsociable, querulous temperament, want of docility, are all poor recommendations for any religious candidate. Duties to parents or relatives, financial obligations may, temporarily at least, disqualify the candidate. Once the main question of a religious vocation has been settled, it will be a secondary and an easier matter to determine the choice of a particular Order or Congregation, according to one's aptitude or temperament or generosity. When deliberating on his fitness let the young man be earnest in prayer for light and guidance, and especially be a frequent communicant at the altar rail. If at all possible let him make a retreat where he can commune alone with God about the weighty problem that confronts him. By no means should he neglect to confer with a prudent and experienced director or confessor who is enlightened about the religious life and will be able to advise what is best for his particular case. Before the decisive resolution is taken, the young man should ponder well, that God's loving invitation is tendered not with any threat of His displeasure in case of a refusal, but with the assurance of His predilection for the generosity of an acceptance. Special love prompts the invitation; special love should dictate the response. Sacrifice is the test of the generosity of our love.

Can anything but the purest and highest motive sway the young man in such a choice? Is there aught of craven spirit or ignoble purpose or pusillanimous sentiment in a soul that can pledge itself to such disinterested and lofty service? No, the religious is not within cloister walls because he is a coward in the battle of life, one disappointed in ambitious hopes, a pessimist or a weakling as the world loves to caricature him, but because he is supremely solicitous for what is of supremest interest in this world and the next, God's greater honor and glory and the closest companionship with Jesus in the spreading of His Kingdom in his own soul and in the souls of his fellowmen.

JOSEPH F. HANSELMAN, S.J.
Rector of Woodstock College.

Italy's Neutrality

THE neutrality of Italy in the present European conflict has, undoubtedly, deprived Germany and Austria of the support of a very powerful modern army and navy. But to remain neutral was the best policy the Italian Government could adopt, for according to the treaty of the "Triple Alliance," Italy was not obliged to take part in an offensive war.

When the first clash of arms between Austria and Servia was heard, there were outbursts of enthusiasm and love in many an Austrian city in favor of Germany and Italy. This was especially the case in Vienna, where friendly demonstrations were frequently made in front of the German and Italian Embassies. All this, however, found little echo in Italy. For, as soon as the people realized the future consequences of the war, they kept aloof from any outside show of sympathy toward any nation.

The first official declaration of Italy's neutrality appeared on August 2 in the following royal decree:

Since many European nations are at war, and since Italy is at peace with all the belligerent powers, the Government of the King, and all the citizens and subjects of the Kingdom are obliged to observe strict neutrality, according to laws in force, and according to international agreement. Any one violating these laws, will suffer the consequences, and will incur the penalties provided by the aforesaid laws.

The reasons on which this decree was based were discussed by the Italian Cabinet at a time when only Austria and Servia were at war, and were published on August 2 by the Tribuna, a semi-official paper of the Government. They may be summed up as follows:

1. It is according to the spirit and letter of the treaty of the Triple Alliance that none of the allied Powers can compromise itself in an action which will have general consequences, before having interchanged views with the allies, and taking advice from them.

2. This general regulation of the treaty is supported by special agreements between Austria and Italy, in everything concerning the situation of the Balkan States.

3. As it is known to all, the Austrian ultimatum to Servia, from which the present situation arose, was not communicated to Italy. Hence Italy has not been able to exercise her right in counseling its ally in this diplomatic step. On the other hand, it is clear that once the Austrian ultimatum had been sent, Italy could not force Austria, an ally and friend, to recall it. The Italian Government, however, has tried every means to obtain from the Austrian Government a promise for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Servia. This, the Austrian Government has promised, but without giving any pledge.

4. The fundamental points of the treaty of the Triple Alliance are of a character eminently defensive, and make for the maintenance of the territorial "status quo." Hence Italy can not be obliged to take part in an offensive war, so much the more since its allies had not consulted her.

5. Lastly, since Italy has been kept in darkness as to the real intentions of its allies, she has not been able to take, in due time, the necessary measures of precaution for the defence of its vital interests, which in case of war would be necessarily and grievously exposed to danger, especially, when one remembers the long coast defence.

"We are authoritatively informed," says the Tribuna (August 2), "that the Italian Government firmly believes that, according to the letter and spirit of the treaty of the Triple Alliance, Italy is not obliged to take part in a war which is not defensive. The Government, however, will examine, how, safeguarding Italian interests, it can maintain a favorable attitude toward its allies."

In the meantime a partial mobilization of the Italian army and navy was ordered. The people became alarmed at the news of the extent of the war and at the rise in prices. But the Government reassured them of Italy's neutrality and, to prevent all abuses, fixed prices on all merchandise, and punished the guilty with severity. In this way peace and the ordinary measure of prosperity were soon restored to the country.

It is difficult to know, even now, how Germany and Austria received the news of Italy's neutrality. It was rumored, for a time, that the Kaiser had made strong personal appeals to King Victor Emmanuel III, to induce him to fight with Germany, and that the Austrian Government intended to declare war against Italy. But these were mere rumors. On August 24 the "Agenzia Stefani" published the following telegram sent by Baron Conrad von Hetzendorf, chief commander of the Austrian army, to the Austrian embassy at Rome:

The rumors spread in Italy that Austria has hostile intentions against the kingdom of Italy for failing to participate in the war, are utterly false and without any foundation whatsoever. Such rumors have the malignant stamp of a third party hostile to both countries. I beg of you to do all in your power to deny effectively all such reports.

It was said, at that time, that Italy's neutrality would be temporary and in order to keep England neutral; that there were secret understandings between the three Governments; and that the Italian army had to be ready to strike the common foe at the right time. But all these were mere conjectures.

In Italy the great majority of the people accepted, with satisfaction, the Government's policy of neutrality, especially, because it was directed to the safeguarding of the national interests. The different political parties held meetings all over the country, and almost all of them agreed: 1, that their duty, for the present, was to stand with the Government; 2, that Italy's neutrality should be an armed and watchful one; 3, that should her rights or prospects be in danger, war should be immediately declared.

At that time, therefore, public opinion seemed to be decidedly in favor of neutrality. Of late, however, many seem to be wavering between the Government's prudent and careful watching of events, and the opinion of a certain class of journals strongly sympathizing with France and England. The journals have been drawn, very probably, toward the "Triple Entente" by France and England's golden offer of Trent and Trieste. Disturbances have taken place in Rome, Milan and Venice, caused by mass meetings and shouts of "Viva Trento, Viva Trieste," "Viva la guerra," "Abbasso l'Austria." But the Government took decisive steps to check such manifestations: a number of turbulent persons were arrested, their flag was seized, and the crowd was dispersed.

Who are those persons, after all, who are now boasting of being the only real patriots left in Italy, the only watchful guardians of the dignity and greatness of the nation? Who are those who are now lauding to the skies the bravery of the Italian army and navy? We have but one answer to offer: they are, precisely, those same persons who, in our last war, so vigorously opposed the Government, and characterized the war as a barbarous and an uncivilized act, insulted the Italian army and navy and the national spirit, inaugurated general strikes in almost all the leading cities of Italy, and started, not long ago, a revolution known as "the red week." They are in a word, the radicals, the real enemies of modern Italy.

At present the Government, the Constitutionalist party, the official Socialists with the ex-premier Luzzatti, the Nationalists, the press in general, and the great majority of the people desire the neutrality of Italy. She must remain neutral: 1, to save her economic resources; 2, to safeguard her national strength; 3, to remain faithful to her foreign policy.

The Reformed Socialists with their leader Bissolati, a few Radicals, and almost all the Republicans are of opinion: 1, that Italy should not remain neutral; 2, that she should immediately join the war with the Triple Entente, for the realization of her old aspirations of annexing Trent and Trieste, and for supreme and absolute dominion of the Adriatic.

This opposition, however, can never and will never prevail against the country's wishes of neutrality. To quote the words of the Corriere Subalpino, the organ of the friends of the famous ex-premier Giovanni Giolitti:

> To join with the Triple Entente at this juncture would be an act morally bad, and politically problematical. We are not obliged, by the treaty of alliance, to take up arms and fight for Germany and Austria, but we would be faithless and disloyal were we to stab in the back our allies and friends. Nor can any one say that in politics these words have no value; for even Machiavelli, in defending the omnipotence of the State, never stooped to such cynical doctrines. Moreover the dignity and the honor of a nation are above Machiavelli and above everything else. Non de solo pane vivit homo but by dignity and honor too.

The Giornale d'Italia says:

> If we have any right at all to shout Viva Trento, Viva Trieste because they were once Italian territories, why should we not shout, with the same right: Viva Nice, Viva Savoy, Viva Malta, the beautiful island, which were also once under the Italian flag?

These two quotations will suffice to express clearly the national Italian spirit.

Will Italy remain neutral to the end? It is difficult to foretell. We hope so. As our Holy Father Pope Benedict XV remarks in his encyclical: "The griefs, mournings and miseries of this mortal life are already too many to be increased, thus rendering the present state more sorrowful and wretched."

P. M. TELESE.

The Church and Politics

IT is a common accusation made in our day that the Church is engaged in politics. Her very service to mankind, her spiritual ministry, her ritual itself and her sacraments are transformed by the imagination of unscrupulous men into methods of cunning intended solely to assure for her a temporal and political ascendancy. Leaving aside such extreme assertions in which Socialist writers and many anti-Catholic journals freely indulge, we may reasonably be called upon to answer the question: "What is the attitude of the Church toward politics?"

That the Church, in the first place, can never entertain political ambition is certain. She clearly, and without hesitation, acknowledges the sovereignty of the State in temporal matters, reserving to herself the spiritual sovereignty in things of the soul. To all the accusations against her she has but one answer to make, the answer of Christ when accused in precisely the same manner: "My kingdom is not of this world." That very kingdom of which He then spoke, in as far as it exists here upon earth, is the Catholic Church herself. She alone dates back directly to Him, and the mission confided to her is nothing else than the continuation of His own. It is a spiritual mission. But that her fulfilment of it should be misinterpreted, even as was Christ's mission, is to be expected. The world is ever the same. But this misinterpretation will never obscure the truth laid down by the Supreme Pontiff with whom the last word on the matter rests. There is no ambiguity in the answer given by Rome. In his encyclical Immortale Dei, on the Christian Constitution of States, Pope Leo XIII wrote:

> The Almighty has apportioned the charge of the human race between two powers, the ecclesiastical and the civil, the one being set over divine, and the other over human things. Each in its kind is supreme, each has fixed limits within which it is contained, limits that are defined by the nature and special object of the province of each, so that there is, we may say, for each a fixed orbit, within which the action of each is brought into play by its own right.

What is contained within each of these two provinces the Holy See defines no less accurately in the same encyclical:

> Whatever in things human is of sacred character, whatever belongs, either of its own nature or by reason of the end to which it is referred, to the salvation of souls, or to the worship of God, is subject to the power and judgment of the Church. Whatever is to be ranged under the civil and political order is rightly subject to civil authority.

The Church, therefore, according to the institution of her Divine Founder and the declaration of her Sovereign Pontiffs, is not concerned with purely civil and political matters, as long as there is no violation of the laws of God and no infringement of her own sacred rights.

Questions, however, arise which are neither spiritual nor purely civil. It is necessary here that State and Church should cooperate harmoniously, taking due account of the relative excellence and nobility of the respective ends of Church and State. Thus for the Church matrimony is a sacrament, for many States a purely civil contract. The State may rightly make all due temporal provision; but the Church must no less clearly maintain her own spiritual jurisdiction; for its exercise her clergy and hierarchy are responsible to Almighty God. Education, in the same manner, may properly be insisted upon by the State to the extent required for good citizenship; but the Church must not in any way be hampered in the spiritual and moral training of her children, to fit them to become likewise true citizens both of the State and of that spiritual Kingdom whose invisible head is Christ. It is her solemn duty to insist upon this right as it is the sacred duty of the State to aid and not to hinder her in its fulfilment.

The fact, therefore, that both powers, the secular and the spiritual, have authority over the same citizen can not of itself cause the slightest conflict, since all authority in State and Church is alike derived from God, who has perfectly coordinated them to work in harmony with one another. "For the powers that are, are ordained of God," as St. Paul writes. The Church on her part has always sought to restrict to the utmost her demands. It but remains for the State equally to respect her rights in order that the two powers may work together as soul and body. This, we know, can perfectly be realized only among a Catholic people, yet it is the ultimate perfection of the citizen. So individual, domestic and public rights one securing the earthly, the other the spiritual welfare of the citizen. So individual, domestic and public rights will alike be safeguarded and hedged about by divine, natural and human laws.

Two points have thus far been made clear. The first is that the Church can not entertain political ambitions. The second, that she must safeguard the spiritual rights of her children. The crucial question, therefore, is that which regards her action in matters that are not only political but likewise touch upon spiritual interests. Here, too, her attitude has been perfectly defined. She will not interfere except in as far as the moral and religious interests of souls may require such a course. Then it becomes her sacred duty to do so within the limits of her possibility. The power which she thus exercises is not, however, political, but spiritual. Victor Cathrein, S.J., in his "Moralphilosophie," thus briefly explains the important point at issue:

> The Church can never for earthly ends ordain or prescribe anything in temporal matters. But she has the right to provide that her subjects be not seduced to commit sin or suffer detriment to their spiritual welfare through the ordinations of secular authority. It would be very wrong to call this indirect power over temporal matters a secular power. It is and remains a spiritual power, because it extends to temporal matters only in as far as spiritual interests are concerned. Its formal object is spiritual.

Should any political party, or should the State itself, propose what is unjust and sinful, it is evident that the voice of the Church must be heeded. The Church must always protest against crime, the great enemy of the State. Of two things, however, both Catholics and non-Catholics may rest assured. The first is that the Church will never interfere with any man's economic or political views unless those views are sinful. But against sins she is obliged to cry out. The second is that loyalty to the Church will never stand in the way of any genuinely patriotic interest. A true Catholic must of necessity be a true patriot. If any should be inclined to doubt this fact let them look to the great battlefields of Europe and see the priests and religious, forgetful of all past injustice, persecution and banishment, returning in undiminished numbers to the flags of their native lands, offering freely their service and their lives, and generously pouring forth their blood for the countries that had rejected them. Whatever, therefore, is beautiful, whatever is good, whatever is just, whatever is ennobling in the patriotism of any land will always be blessed and promoted by the Sovereign Pontiff, whose kingdom is not of this world, but whose voice is raised against sin and injustice wherever they lift their head, in private life or public.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

The Awakening of Faith in France

I

LAST April I listened to M. René Bazin telling of the hope he cherished for the return to Catholic practices of the land which he adorns so handsomely by pen and piety. I little thought that the blessed time was near. Nor did that true son of the Faith think that the day of the Lord's return was nigh. And yet the anticipations of the brilliant litterateur were well founded. He knows his France well; its working class of city and country, its artists, its writers, its statesmen. In all these lanes of life he had met men with faces looking toward the golden sunrise, against which, in more gleaming splendor, shone "the city set on a hill which could not be hidden." The pilgrims have come to the bourne of their travel. The hopes of M. René Bazin and of millions of true Frenchmen have been realized. For the true Frenchman is the Catholic Frenchman. Mgr. Baudrillart well expressed the truth when he wrote, shortly after the outbreak of war, En redcvenant tout à fait française, l'âme nationale se retrouve catholique.

That the nation has become Catholic is everywhere apparent. The greater papers report religious incidents even to minutest details. Even politics, though most diverse in aim and principle, offer no interference, because editors and readers are all united in a manner hitherto unknown, to make the cause of France the cause of each and all. The field staff at the Aisne; the regiments at the front; the multitudes in town and country see the war with one and the same eye. Those who do not know Catholic France, the real France which, true to the Church in spite of the efforts of a hostile Government to make it infidel, has always remained faithful to the Church, are wofully mistaken if they believe that the Government succeeded in "blotting out the light of Heaven." If these lights were extinguished it was only in atheist skies. Even here, thanks be to God, they have been relit. May they burn on forever! May those who feel the need of Faith in times of war, realize that it is as necessary in times of peace. May the shocking shortage of competent nurses, hospitals and convalescent homes teach the Government that no helpers are so numerous, so skilled or so well-placed and equipped for service in time of war as in time of peace, as the nuns who were cruelly expelled a dozen years ago, and who, God bless them, have returned to take care of the wounded.

Writing in the Echo de Paris, the late Count de Mun appealed to Catholics to yield themselves entirely to the influence of the mysterious workings of God's grace, which is accomplishing miracles in the conversions of souls. "Here is the great miracle of these days," he said, "on battlefield, as in ambulance, God once more takes possession of souls." The awakening of Faith in the minds of the people, is "due, of course, to the fearful struggle in which they are involved; but the special cause at work is the sacrifice of life on the part of priests and nuns who have shed their blood on the field of honor; the former fighting, the latter caring for the wounded in trench and plain and hospital." The Count ended his appeal with these words:

> After God, to whom we pray with unfailing trust; after the patron saints of France, whom we call to our side unceasingly, it is the legion of these priests whose sacrifice intercedes for us; and the Sisters whom dire necessity leads into the daily growing number of hospitals, who are our saviors. Without "decrees" or "official permission," they are remaking, to-day and to-morrow, the Christian soul of France.

I give a few facts which show how widespread is the return to Catholic faith and practices. There are Masses said at all the principal churches of Paris, in the course of which, patriotic sermons are delivered by stirring preachers. At Notre Dame, Father Janvier, the celebrated Dominican, thrills his large audiences by fervent words:

> Jeanne d'Arc prayed without ceasing for the success of her call. Assuredly, I have absolute confidence in the valor and skill of our generals, the courage and resolution of our soldiers; but I tremble at the thought of how useless are these resources, if God does not fight for us. Help us, fight for us, Warrior-Maid of France! Wrap in your victorious oriflamme the flags of our allies. Soon, I trust, we shall drive the invader back to his own country. Our victory will not be stained with brigandage; we will not slay women and children, nor make them walk before us to screen us from the enemy's fire. Christianity, Chivalry and Justice will guide us to the end.

Other noted orators are to be heard at the Madeleine, Montmartre and St. Etienne du Mont. On Sundays and during the week these churches are filled, not with women only, as used to be the case before the war, but with men. At a service held at the Madeleine for the success of the army and navy, noted generals and admirals were present. Although the President of the Republic was absent his wife was seen in a front place praying earnestly all the time. She walked near the Cardinal as he went out to bless the vast crowd which was gathered in front of the church. At the requiem Mass for Count de Mun, the full Cabinet was present. This time President Poincaré assisted. The Governor of Lyons, who is a general also, attended Mass with his staff and received Holy Communion before starting for the front. At Vanne a regiment marched from its barracks to the train headed by two chaplains, the bishop's secretary and some religious. At the station the soldiers crowded around the priests, cheered them lustily and gladly took the medals which they gave them. At Montpellier, Cardinal de Calvières and the city prefect exchanged visits. At Poitiers General Pellarin begged the bishop to bless his cannon. The Coadjutor Bishop of Nancy, having had to go as a reserve, was made by the authorities chaplain of the corps to which he belonged. The parish priest of St. Andrew's at Niort was invited by the officers of the 7th Regiment of Hussars, to bless their sabres. When he came to the officers' hall he found fifty of them gathered about a table in the centre of the room. Unrolled upon the table lay three French flags. The lieutenant made a speech in which he told of the good the Church's blessing would bring to the sabres. The priest congratulated them all on the grand example of faith they were setting the army, using the famous words of Jeanne d'Arc to make his lesson sink deep into their souls: "The men will fight, but it is God who will give victory." At the order from the lieutenant, fifty sabres flashed in air, all pointing to the flags. So they were blessed.

TERENCE KING.

An Early Transaction in Cotton

MANY men of many minds and many women too are now engaged in trying to formulate some practical scheme to avert the disaster the European war has brought to the financial hopes of our Southern cotton planters. This recalls a big international war-time transaction in cotton, the results of which had a far-reaching effect on Catholic pioneer progress in the West.

There came from Ireland, in 1792, an immigrant named John Mullanphy, with his wife and a year-old babe. Born near Enniskillen, County Fermanagh, in 1758, at twenty he went to France and enlisted in the famous Irish Brigade in which he served until the Revolution drove him back to Ireland. The immigrants remained a year in Philadelphia and then went to Baltimore, where Mullanphy prospered in business, until 1799, when he pushed on "further West" to Frankfort, Ky. Here his store became the trading centre of the section, and his house the hospitable refuge of the missionaries who visited this district from time to time to minister to the scattered Catholics settled in the neighborhood.

St. Louis was then a French settlement. In 1804 Mullanphy fell in with one of its founders, Charles Gratiot, who persuaded him to leave Frankfort and locate in St. Louis. As he spoke French he was soon at home there and the store he opened on Second street was an object of wonder. He invested the money his enterprise ensured in real estate, his energy and initiative contributing constantly to the growth of the little town. A letter he sent back to Father Badin in Kentucky gives an interesting picture of conditions then in the community, for which Archbishop Glennon, the other day, dedicated his new three-million-dollar cathedral:

ST. LOUIS, UPPER LOUISIANA,
October 29, 1804.

REVEREND SIR: I now sit down to write according to promise. The first news I shall tell is a very bad one: our priest leaves us to-morrow or the next day. His name is Mr. Janin, a man very much beloved by the people because, as they say, il n'est pas Bigot, ils datent le declin de la Religion de's le commencement Français (1790), for be afraid it is a very low Ebb here. On Sundays you see but women, and not many of them, and a few men at Church. Ther's here a small but good church, a good presbytery house and a fine garden and orchard. One of the gentlemen from this place goes to Congress, and I am pressing them to make up some money to fetch out a priest, but I am very much afraid I shall not succeed. I like this country much better than any part of the United States I have yet seen. The lands in general are better; it is healthy and navigable water every day in the year. This town is beautifully situated on the high banks of the Mississippi, with fine gardens and orchards.

I have bought a very good house with a fine garden and orchard for 3,000 Dollars Merchandise and am situated very much to my mind, and altho' sales are dull, je ne minuit point. . . . I could wish very much you were placed here, but I know you could not bear the laxity of morals; I don't mean to say the people here are more criminal than your Catholics in Kentucky; indeed I do not think they are so much so, but they will dance on Sunday and neglect attending at Church.

I am Dr. Sir yours with Consideration and Esteem, and wishing you health and a large prize in the Lottery.

JOHN MULLANPHY.

Evidently the social and educational disadvantages of the frontier town did not appeal to him, for, in 1809, he took his family back to Baltimore, where he put his children to school. They were there when the War of 1812 with England broke out, and during its progress he sent them to live in New York. He was in Baltimore himself among "The Defenders" in 1814, when Fort McHenry was attacked and "The Star Spangled Banner" written; and in January, 1815, took part with Jackson's men, at New Orleans, in the defeat of Packenham. Foreseeing an early peace, the low price of cotton during the war appealed to his commercial instincts. He purchased all he could get hold of and stored it in New Orleans, where it was taken to form the unique ramparts behind which "Old Hickory" fought his famous battle. When Mullanphy protested against the seizure of his property Jackson is reported to have answered: "You say this is your cotton, then, egad! I know of no one who has a better right to defend it. Sergeant, get this man a musket, and see that he has a chance to fight for his cotton." As soon as the war ended he took the cotton to England where what had cost him about four cents a pound was readily sold for thirty and made him an immense profit. It is the first "cotton corner" on record.

He came back from England to New York in 1817 and two years later again settled down with his family in St. Louis and there remained to the end of his days, dispensing much of his great fortune in charity and the promotion of education and the Faith. He gave twenty-four acres of land in 1827 to the Religious of the Sacred Heart, to establish their St. Louis Convent, the second in the United States. To this he added a house and $1,000 to help to open a school. The saintly Madame Duchesne was his intimate friend. The following year he brought the Emmitsburg Sisters of Charity to take charge of a hospital he founded, the first Catholic institution of its kind in the United States. For many years it was the only hospital in St. Louis. He started the Church of St. Ferdinand at Florisant, Mo., and generously assisted the building of the Jesuit Novitiate there, also erecting a convent for the Sisters of Loretto. His minor gifts were constant and numerous. When he died, on August 29, 1833, it was found that his will devised $25,000, of which $3,000 was for a home for aged widows and the rest a donation to the twelve bishops then in the United States to open orphanages for boys. He had fifteen children, eight of whom lived and continued his benefactions. His only son, Bryan, who died a bachelor, in 1851, was Mayor of St. Louis in 1847. Bryan Mullanphy's will left one-third of his estate, about $200,000, as a trust fund, "to furnish relief to all poor emigrants passing through St. Louis to settle in the West," but litigation to define the purpose of the trust defeated for years any immediate practical results. Changed conditions have since made it impossible to devote the fund now to anything even approximating the object expressed in his will, and the eccentric manner in which he devised the funds almost entirely frustrated the compromise by which they are at present devoted to charitable purposes.

John Mullanphy's name is recalled to the St. Louis of to-day by the Mullanphy Hospital and the Mullanphy Orphanage Asylum, as that of his daughter, Mrs. Ann Biddle, is preserved in the Biddle Home and St. Ann's Foundling Asylum. His life in St. Louis was one long deed of charity that smells sweet and blossoms in the dust, even if men, in the hurry and bustle of these materialistic days, seem to forget his varied and picturesque record. "Among the distinguished men engaged in laying the foundations of the city and building up the same," says John E. Darby, one of the non-Catholic historians of St. Louis, "no one was more prominent than John Mullanphy. . . . A man of great enterprise, foresight, judgment, he contributed more than any other individual to the building of St. Louis. . . . A worthy man and a good man. In charitable deeds he never had a superior in the city of St. Louis, and his works will live after him as long as the Mississippi laves the shores of the city where the institutions founded by him in the cause of charity and religion shall stand."

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

Helping the Belgian Orphans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Among the thousands of people interested in the relief of Belgium, quite a number have suggested the organization of a movement to bring over the Belgian orphans and find homes for them in this country. This movement undoubtedly appeals to every one as a beautiful act of charity. But unfortunately, after considering the facts of the case, I fear that it is not practical at the present time, and this for obvious reasons. Belgium has been invaded and its population driven out and scattered into different adjoining countries. We learn every day from private letters, as well as from newspaper reports, that a great many families are scattered and that their members are ignorant of one another's whereabouts. In some cases the father is a prisoner in Germany, the mother and perhaps one child may be living in Holland, and another child in England. It is veritable chaos. After the war comes to an end, these people must be brought together and only then will it be known who are orphans without relatives to take care of them. At the present time, it is impossible to fix upon the orphans who will depend upon charity from outsiders. So no practical work can be done at present, and we should wait in patience until the end of the war. Another thing that must not be lost sight of is the fact that Belgium is a country, the population of which is, practically speaking, entirely Catholic. Consequently the Belgian children are Catholics too, and undoubtedly if they were to be brought up outside of that faith, it would be entirely against the will of their parents or relatives.

J. F. STILLEMANS,
Director of the Belgian Bureau and President of the Belgian Relief Fund.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Chicago Tribune is following up the "Christmas Ship" idea of the Chicago Herald with an appeal to its readers to arrange to adopt Belgian war orphans. Of course you know the kind of people who are in a position to do this, as a general thing, and the ultimate result to the orphan. Can not AMERICA sound the alarm over in the old countries and make a world-wide appeal to Catholic institutions to take in these children, even if the abandoned little ones left in our own alleys and elsewhere, have to be given less care and attention for a while at least. I know every one with any Catholic blood in him will assist in saving these children if properly appealed to and an organized effort is started in their behalf

Chicago, Ill. M. SMITH.

The Italians Again

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Several friends have asked me to write a few lines in defence of the much-maligned Italians. This request has been occasioned by the recent publication in AMERICA of two letters reflecting on the Catholic spirit of Italians both here and in Italy. The first communication emanated from the pen of Herbert Hadley, New York; the second comes from Baltimore and is signed: "Enotriae Amator." It ought to be made a felony for any one to assume such an unintelligible pseudonym. Affecting the scriptural parlance of the incredulous Jews, Herbert Hadley declareth it indeed a hard saying that the Catholic spirit is keenly alive among the Italian people, that is, if we judge of religious conditions across the water from the religious spirit of the Italians who come here.

But are we justified in adopting such a criterion? We may take for granted that Italy does not send us the crème de la crème in the way of immigrants, nor does any other nation for that matter. No nationality has an exclusive monopoly of either vice or virtue, of Catholic faith or infidelity. Human nature is pretty much the same the world over. We find the same good and bad traits in every son of Adam, and it matters little whether he happens to be born under an Italian, German, French, Irish or American sky.

We certainly would send up a roar of protest that could be heard from New York to San Francisco, should any one dare to judge the Catholic spirit of Ireland from the Bradys, Gradys, Bourniques and Brushinghams who dropped the O as big as a cart wheel from the front of their names, and are now parading in our midst as Episcopalian, Methodist and Presbyterian preachers. How many, not only of Celtic but also of German parentage, have twisted and distorted their good old Catholic names beyond all recognition in order to remove every vestige of their nationality as well as of their religion? Shall we judge of Catholicity in Ireland and Germany from the defection of these miserable apostates who have abandoned their faith in order to advance their material interests? Hardly. For it would be jumping from the particular to the universal.

It is not true that the Italian falls an easy victim to the Protestant proselytizer. It is, however, true, that here in the United States the proselytizer puts forth greater efforts among the Italians than among people of any other nationality. My seven years' sojourn as pastor of perhaps the largest Italian parish in America taught me to appreciate the high grade of morality existing among those poor people. Undoubtedly one of the greatest evils menacing the Church to-day is the appalling number of mixed marriages. In Guardian Angel parish we averaged about 275 marriages annually. You can scrutinize the matrimonial register from A. D. 1898 to 1905, and you will not find the record of a single mixed marriage. How many rectors of other nationalities can make that boast? The Italian, as a rule, not only abstains from work on Sunday, provided he retain his job, but he religiously observes the feast of his patron saint and a great many more that are not holidays of obligation. It is a matter of history that an infidel administration tried to diminish the number of festivals and religious processions in Southern Italy, but lamentably failed. My experience has been to see the church crowded on the feasts of SS. Peter and Paul, Nativity of St. John Baptist, SS. Vitus, Roch, Lucy, Sebastian and all the feasts of the Blessed Virgin just the same as on Sunday. As to approaching the Sacraments, I have been kept hearing the confessions of Italian men until after two o'clock Holy Thursday morning. Poor Sicilians have come fasting twenty-one miles on the train in order to make their Easter duty. Of course I can only speak of the religious conditions prevailing among the Italians in and around Chicago, as they came under my personal observation.

✠ E. M. DUNNE,
Bishop of Peoria, Ill.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In re "Religious Conditions in Italy" it may be of interest to readers of AMERICA to hear an explanation of the apathetic attitude of Italian immigrants in matters of practical religion from the late Holy Father Pius X. He was aware of the deplorable condition of his fellow countrymen in foreign lands and deemed it necessary to establish a seminary for the sole purpose of preparing Italian clerics to labor among them. In his letter of foundation (March, 1914), among the reasons given for their religious apathy is the following: "Plerique enim . . . iidemque fere non satis doctrina religionis instructi"; or, in plain English, they are not thoroughly instructed in their religon. Any comment would be superfluous: suffice it to say, that it would be well, in these days of prevention, to anticipate a continuance of said condition by removing the cause.

However, it is a fact that those nationalities alone give evidence of being appreciative of their religion who have been persecuted on its account. If compelled to suffer for their Faith in their own lands, they show love for it in a very practical manner when on foreign shores. The Italian has never been persecuted; his land reeks with the blood of martyrs in the struggles between Christianity and paganism; then it was a question of the divinity of Christ; now it is the divinity of His Church and this is the very point of which they seem to be the least aware. They will never be any more practical until they are instructed, nor will they ever realize what the Church really is, until its doors have been closed to worship by some persecutor.

New York. FORESTIERE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Sorrentino seems to admit, and tries to account for, the religious indifference of the Italian immigrants. The only difference between us is that he attributes this indifference to their poverty and environment in a new country, and I seek its cause in Italy itself.

Poverty is hardly the cause of religious indifference, as our poor are generally our best Catholics. Neither will environment explain the difficulty, otherwise the same ought to be true of the Germans, the Poles, the Slovaks and Catholics of other nations who have migrated to this country. How is it that the vast bulk of these people in precisely the same condition as the Italian immigrant are not religiously indifferent? Then again, it would appear that this environment which kills the essentials of Catholicity in the Italian immigrant seems rather favorable to the growth of the accidentals, such as processions, festas, etc. Lastly, environment and untoward conditions in America will not account for the great ignorance of their Faith, for their hatred in many cases, and very frequently their distrust of their priests, for their ever-ready acceptance of help from proselytizing societies and for other noted traits of the Italian immigrant. It is well to remark that conditions for the Italian in this country are not so hard as is at times represented. Few, if any, immigrants find employment so readily and so constantly, and none in proportion send more money back to their native land than the Italian. It is not true that the Italian immigrant is judged by a few exceptions; we form our judgment from the bulk of Italian men to-day, who, after twenty-five years of struggle and striving by American and Italian priests, after a great expenditure of money given by American Catholics, show themselves impervious to the practical teachings of the Church.

Father Realmuto calls for mercy. It is well to remember that it is no mercy on the part of the surgeon to spare the knife if the corruption is deep. You can not put an organ in order by gilding the pipes, nor can you eliminate typhoidal germs from the pump by painting the handle. Father Realmuto with his figures and statistics has not proved and can not prove that the majority of Italian men who come to this country, after his twenty-five years of labor among them, are not religiously indifferent. This is the meaning of 99 per cent. which, as I said last week in answer to Father Corbett, was not to be taken with mathematical exactness. Will Father Realmuto count next Sunday the number of men that attend Mass in his church regularly and tell us that number together with the number of Italian men who live in his parish? It is true, it is the testimony of numbers of priests who have worked among them, even Father Sorrentino admits it by laboring at its explanation, and it is the result of observation, that the bulk of Italian men do not go to Church, do not frequent the Sacraments. Many of them readily work on Sunday; many of them hate and despise and distrust their priests; they are easy victims to proselytism, not in the sense that they lose the Faith, but they readily and willingly accept the goods furnished by Protestant societies and attend their services, and the reason of that is not found in their environment. The letters of Pius X, his efforts toward the reform of seminaries in Italy, the stringent regulations that have been made in Rome for the coming of Italian priests to this country, all tell in no uncertain tone some of the causes of the condition of Italian Catholics.

New York. HERBERT HADLEY.

The Outrages in Mexico

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am a new subscriber, deeply interested in the Mexican chronicle of the last two issues of your paper. Will you kindly let me know more fully your attitude toward the problem?

New York. J. L. C.

[The Mexican problem has a triple aspect, political, economic and religious. The last aspect only has been our concern. Under ordinary circumstances the Mexicans would and should have taken care of this themselves. In this instance, however, our Government, no doubt with the best intentions, made itself sponsor for the Constitutionalist party, thereby incurring certain duties. Among these not the least is the duty both of righting wrongs and of preventing further crime. Unspeakably frightful crimes, wanton enough to make strong men shudder with horror, have been committed against priests, Sisters and lay people; and AMERICA feels that in justice both to itself and to American citizens who abhor such brutality, our Administration should bring every possible moral pressure to bear upon the Mexican criminals, who have time and time again said that they are acting under the authority of Washington.—Editor AMERICA.]

Hint from a Rural Parish

To the Editor of AMERICA:

This is a seaside settlement drawing a big crowd in the hot months but harboring about three hundred Catholics during the rest of the year. For them the pastor, Rev. W. J. McConnell, celebrates two Masses on Sunday. To-day at each of the services he prefaced the sermon by reading from the current issue of AMERICA the account of the persecution of the Catholics in Mexico, and of the outrages committed on them by the Constitutionalist bandits. It was shocking, he added, that such things could happen at all, but incomprehensible that they could have taken place without any protest being made in Congress by the Catholic representatives included in the membership of that body. There were precedents for such action in the petitions introduced some time ago on behalf of the Armenians and for the Jews of Russia. His congregation, he said, was only a small one, but he believed that the men of it should at once communicate their indignant remonstances to the Congressman of the district and request that measures should be adopted by the Federal authorities to have the outrages in Mexico stopped. He was sure they knew they never could have begun had the influence of the United States been exerted at the proper time.

The example of this little country parish could be followed with a probably satisfactory outcome by other congregations, urban and rural, if their pastors took the matter in hand. The program of action is very simple and direct; good will and ordinary political experience are all that is necessary.

Now is the time to call the roll and to find out why the Catholic Congressmen have ignored this Mexican question and what they intend to do in the future to adjust the issue. Many non-Catholics also would surely assist, did they have the shocking details of the outrages brought directly to their notice. This is the time to act for practical results.

Belmar, N. J. CITY VISITOR.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Thanksgiving

"IT is truly meet and just, right and profitable, for us, at all times, and in all places, to give thanks to Thee, O Lord, the Holy One, the Father Almighty, the Everlasting God," sings the Church, not merely once a year, but as often daily as she reaches the most solemn part of that never-ending Sacrifice which is itself the most perfect act of thanksgiving man can offer his Creator. It is, of course, wholly fitting, however, that in a Christian nation like ours a special day be set apart on which we make to God a united public acknowledgement of all the blessings the year has brought us. We thus take the most effective means, moreover, for enjoying an uninterrupted continuance of Heaven's bounty. It is a noteworthy fact that "think" and "thank," as philologists assure us, are words derived from the same Anglo-Saxon root. Almighty God, who is kind even to the thoughtless and the ungrateful, will be particularly gracious toward those who thankfully remember all His past mercies, while it is plain from the miracle of the ten made clean, that nothing grieves more sorely the Heart of Our Saviour than "benefits forgot." Gratitude, be it recalled, is not merely good manners, it is an act of justice. If the sincere and humble expression of thankfulness wins even from selfish man new and greater favors, what limit shall be set to the blessings that the generous Bestower of all good gifts pours upon those who never fail to make Him the due return of gratitude for all His loving-kindness?

Wary Reading

Violent unbelief has never been attractive. The normally constituted mind is reverent, and listens in no kindly spirit to revolt and protest against familiar traditions and time-honored truths. Those who would obtain a hearing must disguise their reactionary tenets and give them a presentation that makes a show of sympathy for the old and well-worn habits of human thought. Even with us, in spite of our wide drifting from religious moorings, there is little sympathy with the open, unvarnished expression of intellectual atheism. In their practice men may be as unconcerned about the divine Master of the world as they please, but in their speech and in their writings, they must not assail the existence or the prerogatives of God. Such a stand is not popular. God may be ignored, and the practice of ignoring Him is growing every day; but He should not be attacked. This much at least of the old respectability still exists. How long it will maintain its influence may be a matter of doubt, but its influence has not yet ceased to be a fact. Even attacks on Catholicism, the staple of so many pulpits, have not found favor with the more cultured of our people. They may pass with congregations that are ignorant and with pastors who have to eke out their poverty of positive instruction with attacks on the Pope and the Church; but our better educated countrymen have forced their preachers to substitute other topics for their Sunday morning talks. The practice of religion, therefore, as such, has not been openly assailed, at least not often.

And yet atheism is not silent. Its words are guarded and skilfully disguised but it continues to instil its subtle poison in many ways. Of late it has become bolder. An example in point is the recent novel, "They Who Question." In it there are three characters sharply and sympathetically drawn, all of whom independently, and without influence exerted on them from without, by three different processes, give up all belief in God, and resolve to live as best they can without Him. The exclusion of the other world with its hopes and fears is developed so gradually and so artfully that it is made to seem a natural and by no means a shocking thing. Souls that are unquestionably good wrestle painfully with unmerited sorrow and receive not even a suspicion of relief, they grope pitifully for light and find only darkness. The principal character is at the beginning one of more than ordinary holiness and nobility; and yet all that she hoped for and cherished in her youthful dreams of the goodness and the nearness and the love of God crumbles about her and she is left standing among the ruins, cheerless and despondent and an infidel. All the stock objections are urged against religion not by argument but by the events of life. They are not put strongly or controversially or in a spirit of angry revolt, but are presented by the sheer weight of life's sufferings and the seeming indifference of the Creator to His creatures' pain; and it is their accumulation that drives divine love out of a beautiful, trustful soul and leaves in it only bitter questionings.

When the book has got thus far it stops. Of course the process may or may not be altogether unusual in those of non-Catholic convictions, but it has no counterpart within the Church. It is well, however, for Catholics to realize that there are many doubts, much unbelief, and a growing attitude of irreverence for things supernatural and divine in the hearts of those about them. Such books are not to be read, but it will do no harm to know that they exist. Wary reading is required nowadays of those who would safeguard the purity of their faith.

Children's "Social Betterment"

Not long ago some very earnest Philadelphia school-ma'ams made a canvass of their pupils to learn what proportion of the children drank beer at home. For doing this the zealous investigators had the authority of their principals, but not that of the Acting Superintendent of Schools. Indeed he was so wanting in sympathy with the movement that he promptly disavowed the teachers' action, but not before they had gathered and published an alarming array of statistics, which doubtless proved to admiration that the boys and girls coming from homes where beer was a beverage, were without exception the dullest, tardiest, most untidy, and most unruly children in the school.

Our readers will unanimously agree that the "Acting" Superintendent of Schools who acted in this instance with such unseemly haste and faulty judgment should be at once removed from office. He is a clog to the wheels of progress. That the noble work of our public school teachers for the "social betterment" and "uplift" of the little ones committed to their charge, should be hampered and impeded by medieval reactionaries is not to be borne. For who has a better right than the school-ma'am to regulate her pupils' diet? Indeed our public school system, admirable as it is, can not be brought to flawless perfection until every teacher is provided with a tabulated chart that will indicate at a glance, the minutest circumstance bearing on the parentage, domestic habits and environment of every child in the school.

Miss Perkins should know for example at just what hour little Mildred is accustomed to rise in the morning; what breakfast cereal she prefers; what her father's favorite recreation is, what salary her sister Mabel receives, what her big brother's literary tastes are, and what is the area of the back yard in which she plays. As for little Reginald, Miss Simpson has of course an inalienable right to be told what time he seeks his truckle bed, whether he uses paste or powder for his teeth, if he sleeps with the window open, who his playmates are and whether they always pronounce their final consonants, if his mother does her own cooking and whether his sister Sally's intended husband is addicted to the use of tobacco.

It is plain that a child's aversion to spelling is likely to be intense, should his father be a printer; the hue of the domestic wallpaper has more than once proved a serious obstacle to concentration of mind; geography doubtless comes easier to boys and girls who have near relatives commercial travellers, and school-children who haunt the moving-picture hall can not be reasonably expected to let mental drudgery of any kind curtail in any way this most important amusement.

It is absolutely necessary that the modern school-ma'am should know about her pupils' home life. Otherwise how can she effectively work for the "social betterment" of the little ones the State has entrusted to her care? Meanwhile the benighted Sisters in the parish school persist in thinking that they have done their duty by the boys and girls parents send them, if they teach the children to fear God, love the neighbor, respect authority, and read, write, spell and cipher correctly.

"Not Anticlerical But Inhuman"

The worst spirit of French anti-clericalism is exhibited in the attacks of the Socialist press upon the nuns who are nursing the wounded along the battle lines in northern France. These devoted women are enduring all the sufferings and horrors of war for the sake of their country and of humanity. More than one has given her life in the work. Their crime is that they offer the consolations of religion to men dying and in pain. The hostile newspapers call this an unfair advantage taken by the Church of the opportunity the war has given it.—New York Sun, November 10.

Not merely the hostile newspapers; the Government itself is displaying even bitterer hostility to the twenty thousand priests and the devoted religious women who are giving heroic service to their country. The men on the fighting line had shown too much appreciation of those priests and religious and their services. Hundreds of such reports as this come from the soldier-priests: "Many officers and men come to confession during the night in intervals of the fighting and I have a crowd at the Military Mass on Sundays." Another recites that on ten different occasions of danger he had given public absolution to the kneeling soldiers at their own request; and the substance of many narratives is thus voiced by the Abbé Castelin:

> War is a great mission. The men here no longer know what human respect is; they have become fervidly religious. They make their confessions in the streets, on the roadside; they attend services, sing hymns and recite the Rosary. All wear medals, not round their necks or in their pockets, but in their caps or on their tunics.

This would never do; Premier Viviani had not "extinguished the lights of Heaven" to have them relit on the battlefields of France. The Masses and confessions and absolutions as well as chaplains were in violation of his petty regulations, and he had provided against Extreme Unction and final reconciliation by ordering that in the hospitals the wounded and dying shall have to sign a written request in order that a priest be admitted to them. But General Joffre, being a soldier, not a Masonic politician, disregarded the despicable restrictions, and gave full liberty to clergy and soldiery to serve God and country together. The little Masonic clique who had machined themselves into the government of France and harried Christian officers in time of peace, dared not tamper with the triumphant war chief nor tie up in its official tape the surging religious spirit of the troops. But medals and scapulars were more tangible; and their suppression was according to its measure. The Archmason Lafferre, who had fled to Bordeaux with his paper and his Cabinet, demanded that the "scapular and the medal of the Sacred Heart, the official stamp of a Catholic" should not be given to the soldiery; and at once it was so ordered. The zealous Viviani, whose neutral conscience would not permit him to order public prayers for peace after President Wilson's example, improved upon the command and also prohibited the Rosary.

This is but one example of the petty persecuting spirit of this miserable Government in the midst of war. By another decree it has seized on all the remnants of Church property that its penalizing laws had left, including even the funds of the infirm clergy. The same mail that brought this decree to the diocese of Bourges, brought also an account of the heroism of Sergeant Lemoine who, himself wounded, sought out his officer among the dead and dying, rescued him amid a rain of bullets, and carried him for miles to safety. Sergeant Lemoine was a priest of Bourges. It is the heroism and Christian nobility of such as he that prompt the persecutions of the fanatics of the Viviani type. The Christian revival that their presence and action are fanning into flame must be quenched at all cost. Christianity must fall even though France fall with it. Of this spirit the New York Sun writes:

> Its true description is not anti-clerical, but inhuman. The narrow bigotry which it propagates is far more terrible than that which it imputes to those who disagree with its teachings. Its ultimate triumph in national life would mean complete servitude of the soul.

Let us hope that the Christian spirit that has burst forth amid the perils of war will assert itself in peace, and that the virility displayed by the clergy on the battlefield will insist on impressing itself on the Government of the nation until religion and liberty shall again reign in France.

Wisdom from the East

Representative-elect London, the first Socialist to be sent to Congress from the State of New York, reluctantly allowed himself to be interviewed the other day. In the prologue the restrained reporter attested that Mr. London will carry with him to Congress "the best knowledge the universe affords," for he thoroughly understands "life and humanity." In a word he is a "storehouse of wisdom." At the interviewer's entreaty Mr. London then discoursed profoundly on shoes and ships and sealing-wax, scattering with a prodigal hand such jewels of wisdom as these:

> Education brings all men to a level, and a high level. The more you know of people, the more you love them. Large families enslave a man. Economic freedom for both sexes is the only road to progress, personal and national. A man who must slave to feed many mouths is weighted down to his treadmill labors. He can not educate himself or his children. For those who are not independently well off I believe in small families. A girl should be educated exactly as a boy.

It is not hard to picture what the domestic life would be of a family in which Mr. London's lofty principles were strictly reduced to practice. To avoid the humiliation of accepting money from their husbands, wives would of course leave the home in charge of a well-paid servant, and going forth into the marts of trade become bread-winners themselves. That lone, lorn, little tomboy whose parents' love for "economic freedom" and "education" would doubtless be much warmer than their affection for her, would sternly demand for herself, no doubt, the same independence her father and mother enjoyed. Every week she would exact from them sufficient money to procure as much and as varied "knowledge" as the other boys of the neighborhood were getting. Every sensible person is aware that nowadays knowledge is power, and that a man's usefulness, virtue and happiness can be measured exactly by the number of things he knows. This principle, as Mr. London implies, is of universal application. For instance, there are no really unamiable persons in existence. "The more you know of people, the more you love them." As the Socialist Congressmen would doubtless admit, however, the perfection of a man's "economic freedom" depends to a large extent on the use to which he puts the knowledge he possesses. Our prisons are said to be restricting at this very moment not only the "economic freedom" but even the personal liberty of men whose knowledge of reading, writing and arithmetic is exceptionally profound, but who unfortunately used their skill in these branches, for forging checks or falsifying accounts. With regard to Mr. London's Malthusian propaganda, he should be reminded that if the "poor but prolific" race to which most of his constituents belong, had adopted that abominable practice, in all probability Mr. London would not now be a Congressman-elect.

Just As You Say

Here is a short formula for civilization. It heralds the substitution of deference for force, of charity for selfishness, of obedience for wilfulness. The young find it hard to utter; the old find it easier. When ideas are new in the mind, when hope is dazzling bright and difficulties disappear in its splendor, when experience is limited, then the lips can hardly shape these words. But test the exultant plans by the acid of experience, sober enthusiasm by the humility of failure, broaden sympathy by the knowledge that comes with years, and most men and women will anticipate their own objections or prejudices and cry, "Just as you say." Time, however, is not always a softener; it is sometimes a toughener. If it mellows the fruit, it hardens the wood and bark, and some hearts turn the sap of life into fiber rather than into luscious pulp. The self-made man who has been spoiled with constant success, whose father made the best shoe-lasts before him and whose son is learning to make the best shoe-lasts, just as he does, after him, is likely to exclaim, "Just as I say," at least when there is question of shoe-lasts. Yet it was a man of that description, a man proud of his family success, who nevertheless was deferential in other points. He did not wish to go beyond his lasts and was ready to utter "Just as you say" when you could get him away from his pet subject.

Take that phrase from the language of the army, and the army becomes a disorganized mob. Take it from business, and the wheels of commerce are blocked. "Just as I say," is grit on the bearings; "Just as you say," is a lubricant. What is it that marks off society from anarchy? It is the recognition of authority, and recognition of authority is a philosophical and lordly way of expressing, "Just as you say."

In the famous Greek tragedy of King Œdipus there is a stormy fight going on between the king and his brother-in-law. It had reached that helpless stage so often witnessed in wordy quarrels, where one combatant almost out of breath shouts, "You did," and the other combatant equally breathless replies with the convincing and powerful cry, "I didn't." There were several ways out of this dead-lock besides the death of both parties, but the brother-in-law heard something he could agree with and at once interjected, "Just as you say" or what amounts to that. The ultimatums disappeared for a time at least, and reason seized the opportunity to talk. "Just as you say" will always win a truce, if it does not succeed in avoiding hostilities.

Our eloquent Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, has spoken many excellent speeches in his busy life, but his biographers ought to rank a recent sentence of his far above all more lengthy and more elaborate exhibitions of oratory. "Is that your last word?" (Last word is English for ultimatum), he was asked in an exchange of diplomatic conferences, and Mr. Bryan replied in words which should never die, "There is no last word between friends." We might risk spoiling the finality of that phrase by stating that if there could be a last word, it would be, "Just as you say," which comes immediately before, "Just as we say," and with that harmonious chord the music of friendly conversation comes to a happy close.

There is yet another place where this magic phrase wins wondrous victories. It is heard there softer than a whisper, but results in the eloquence of deeds and speaks in power through a life of holiness. What is a saint but one who to every prompting of conscience replies at once and effectively, "Just as you say." How can we better sum up the life of the Saint of Saints than in that sublime and divine way of voicing, "Just as you say," the courageous words which made Calvary, "Not My will but Thine be done."

LITERATURE

The Catholic's Bookshelf

"The best of the world's best literature" has been so often of late years brought to the "average reader's" attention that he is apt to be either somewhat callous to the subject or suspicious of its exponent. The best speeches, the best poems, short or long, the greatest novels, realistic, romantic or prurient, the most permanent dramas, the most popular short-stories, heart-songs and heart-throbs, chosen by the people or for them by their ever-ready and unfailing, if not infallible guides; the funniest stories, the wittiest after-dinner speeches, enumerate or imagine what catalogue or category you will, and sooner or later an advertisement of the same will appear in some "leading" magazine. The advertisement will be a masterpiece of the art of publicity. No cereal or cosmetic would be proclaimed with greater care or blare of ink and adjectives. The bindings will be described; color-photographed with a skill that makes the reader's eye the salesman's advocate. For the grosser wits, the pounds of paper, gallons of ink and number of hands employed to print, paint, paste and bind will all be set forth duly. Then the fame of the writers, the repute of the publishing house and above all the great, unquestionable, indisputable, every-where-recognized authority of the superior intellects that deigned to leave their Olympian calm long enough to gather up all these Sybilline leaves for the poor, dear public. And all yours on approval if you will first tear out and mail, etc., etc.

We have all had the experience and so perhaps we suspect the "bookshelf." We may have found on it things which burned our fingers, or perhaps soiled them. At least we were careful to keep the bookshelf, whatever its length—an all-important feature, by the way—at a due height, so children could not reach it until they were well out of their "teens."

Meanwhile the library in our little sitting-room was growing, growing; but alas, "like an unweeded garden," if "things rank and gross in nature" did not "possess it merely" at least there was a profuse foliage of "best-sellers" and a woful paucity of things worth garnering. Notably lacking, too, we sadly reflected, was any consistent and readable collection of Catholic books. True, on the top shelf, among the little books and small collections of verse, there was a various and gaudy aggregation of devotional books or of very good stories about very good people. They were a little shop-worn or shelf-worn, but not overmuch used. They needed blowing off when we took them down on occasion of a mission or the First Communion of the children. They opened with an ominous crack, suggesting much glue and little using. We had bought some of them at church fairs or missions, others had been given as premiums to us or our children. They were very good indeed to have there, but to read—well, really we prefer something in a more literary style.

A literary style! There is one unquestioned master of a literary style in English. So transcendent a power has he shown in the wielding of our language that he seems to have done for it what his great master, Cicero, did for Latin: to have laid himself open to his own complaint against a great classic; that it seems to exercise a tyrannous and almost blighting influence on succeeding writers. The English author who answers to this description is Cardinal Newman. Yet to most laymen, it must be feared, Newman is a name too much linked with controversy or theological disquisition for them even to think of his works as a source of interesting reading, let alone literary enjoyment. But let us examine his bookshelf and see what it contains for the Catholic layman, the Catholic American of the twentieth century.

First of all we must not be content to judge Newman's, of all books, by the cover or the title on it. In the selection of his titles the Cardinal differed from the author of the "gripping" novel or the "staggering exposé of conditions." Now in looking at his books' tables of contents what do we find? An array of masterly essays by a masculine mind on subjects ever interesting and never more so than to-day; subjects on which we have often sought information and rarely gotten satisfaction; on which we have desired to form sane judgments, but have been contented for the most part to accept second-hand "views." As parents, with sons perhaps in college or daughters at some prominent convent school, we feel that we ought to have definite ideas, not sketchy and hazy notions, about education. Have we ever read Newman's lecture on "Knowledge Viewed in Relation to Learning"; or "Knowledge Viewed in Relation to Professional Skill"; or "Duties of the Church towards Knowledge"; or "Discipline of Mind"? We have heard, doubtless, of his "Idea of a University," but we did not realize that it was the treasure-house of just such masterpieces as these. For, mind you, they are masterpieces every one. Purer, finer English words and phrases were never mustered or marshalled than you shall find on those same pages; nor, we may add, more eloquent rhetoric, nor more cogent argument.

Sociology presents us with the ever-recurring problem of the relative values of discipline and influence, as forces in the moulding and guidance of masses of men. Have we ever read a better treatment of the difficulty than in Newman's "Discipline and Influence" among his "Essays"? Have we ever read a more perfect example of lucid exposition?

We like visualized history, and so, after getting a few facts from a manual or an encyclopedia, we turn to some historical novelist to visualize for us some epoch that has struck our fancy. An historical novelist may be defined as one who turns facts into fiction. Newman does not do that. Read his "Athens," his "Tribes of the North," his "Turks," and see the difference: he turns dead facts into living ones, torpid generalizations into quivering details of life and emotion.

The good, old-fashioned habit of reading sermons on Sunday afternoon or at other times, has gone the way of the spinning-wheel and the andirons and, unlike them, has not yet come back from the garret to a new life of respectable prominence amid our bustling world. Otherwise it might have been worth while to call attention to such gems of eloquence as "The Second Spring," the "Gospel Palaces" or such profound character studies as "Saul," or "Abraham and Lot," or "St. Paul's Gift of Sympathy."

Our ignorance of disputed points of history and our repugnance to reading controversial literature has more than once put us in the embarrassing position of either confessing our ignorance or admitting assertions that were no compliment to our religion. Had we read Newman's "Historical Sketches," or his "Essays Historical and Critical," or his "Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England," we might have had something to say about Charlemagne, or the Rise of University Education, or the Eastern Empire, or we might have learned the secret of the strength of the Protestant Tradition.

Fiction is Newman's "left hand," but like Milton's prose, it is the left hand of a giant. Has history been more clearly visualized or description carried to more vivid lengths than in "Callista"? A problem ever practical and clear is analyzed to the uttermost. As a love-story it is voted a failure, yet what more dramatic passage in all love-literature than Callista's rebuke to the lover who sought to make religion the servant of his romantic passion. Set it beside the rejection of Ophelia in "Hamlet," and even that comparison it will endure. But we must leave room on your Catholic bookshelf for some other authors, doubting no whit that if you can not find them you have friends who will aid you in the selection.

MARK J. MCNEAL, S.J.

REVIEWS

Germany and England. By J. A. CRAMB. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

The Case of Belgium in the Present War. New York: The Macmillan Co. $0.25.

Who Is Responsible? By CLOUDESLEY BRERETON. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $0.50.

The Facts About Belgium. Washington: The Belgian Legation.

The Real "Truth About Germany." By DOUGLAS SLADEN. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.

One American's Opinion of the European War. By FREDERICK W. WHITRIDGE. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $0.50.

The German Enigma. By GEORGES BOURDON. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.25.

Whatever may have been the cause or causes of the present European war, and even now they are in dispute, the issue is now clear, and the world gazes upon a conflict for mastery between the German and British empires. The struggle is all the more bitter, the ultimate results so far-reaching in their effect, because these two standards of empire are, in themselves, totally opposed. If we narrow down extraneous issues and come to bare facts the British empire is intrinsically scarcely British or imperial. In itself it is, excluding Ireland at present, a confederacy of free, self-governing nations, knit together by some bond that is far removed from the accepted imperial idea of centralized domination, but whose essential idea is democracy. The German empire is of an entirely different character, and to understand the spirit that dominates this power it is necessary to get into the German temperament and character, and this the late Professor Cramb may be said to have done. To understand the spirit that animates Germany in this war we must understand German mentality and its environment for the last forty or more years; and given this factor we can apprehend this phenomenon of a people united with a single purpose. For, let critics say what they will, Germany is a united people, and the war has drawn all classes together in the closest bond. And the bond is first, a love of the Fatherland and a belief in the greatness of its mission, and, secondly, hatred of England.

To sum up the working out of this gospel of a vision of world-power and hate in a few words is impossible, but Mr. Whitridge's survey of the question is undoubtedly the sanest and fairest that has so far appeared; and even he, lover of Germany that he is, declares that if the outcome of the struggle be world-power for Germany or downfall, then, for the sake of the nations that are to come, let it be downfall.

To discuss the diplomatic moves by which the war may be said to have come to be may be interesting, but it is futile. The blame may be here, or it may be there, and the nation that is without sin may cast the first stone. When the professors and learned men of England and America beat their breasts and cast ashes on their heads, and cried alas! they mourned for things they are better without; and they shed no tears for the democratic and homely virtues which are the real greatness of the German nation. Professor Cramb, too, saw strange visions:

> And what is the religion which, on the whole, may be characterized as the religion of the most passionate and earnest minds of young Germany? What is this new movement? The movement, the governing idea of the centuries from the fourteenth to the nineteenth, is the wrestle of the German intellect not only against Rome, but against Christianism itself. Must Germany submit to this alien creed derived from an alien clime? . . . Thus, while preparing to form a world-empire, Germany is also preparing to create a world-religion.

Does the fact that Belgium has drained the cup of sacrifice to the dregs supply a running commentary to this vision of the English professor who knew and loved Germany as much as his own country? Is Louvain but an incident, or is it a land-mark set up? And is it by chance that the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris received the first attentions from the air bombs of Germany?

Of the doctrine that might is right, of the outcome of the war, of the sufferings of Belgium, or even of the negotiations between Austria and Servia, of which Mr. Sladen writes somewhat lucidly, there is no space to treat. In the terrible struggle which is now going on in Europe we can only hope to catch a glimpse of the motives that have influenced the belligerent nations, and perhaps discern which cause is making for righteousness and true liberty.

Some time before the storm broke, a conscientious French journalist set out to learn from the spokesmen of Germany what lay between the two countries; to find a basis for a reasonable understanding with Germany. Whatever may have been his hopes, they are now frustrated, yet the work of M. Bourdon is not in vain. To him Germany was an enigma, and he sought to peer beyond the veil to uncover the mystery; but the answer has been given, and it is war. One does not need to be a jingo to see that war was inevitable, and has been for many years past; nor is it necessarily chauvinism to say that a patched peace will be no solution of the difficulty. A great principle has united Germany to face nearly the whole of Europe, and an equally great principle has drawn the allies together to withstand Germany. Had the war really had its foundation on the murder of the Austrian Archduke or the invasion of Belgium it might have admitted of some compromise. But it is a war of principle, and humanly speaking, its end can only be when one side or the other is utterly crushed. H. C. W.

Yourself and Your Neighbors. By SEUMAS MACMANUS, Illustrated by THOMAS FOGARTY. The Devin-Adair Co. New York: $1.25.

Seumas MacManus' book is not pure fiction. It is an artistic portrayal of facts, the idealization of the real. It contains a series of eighteen interesting sketches, strikingly characteristic of the peasant life of Ireland in far Donegal. The author has the rare gift of reproducing artistically the unstudied, oral expression of a witty, imaginative and emotional people. For those who are Irish-born, sketches like "Yourself and Herself," "The Lore You Loved," "The Masther," "The Come-Home Yankee," "When the Tinkers Came," can not fail to set flowing again the streams of those simple, primitive, humorous affections that warmed and refreshed them when life was young, but which may now, alas! be choked up and forgotten under the spell of a false admiration for the artificial and too often tawdry attractions of their new surroundings. The reading of Seumas MacManus' book will be for them like a refreshing breeze from the mountains and hills they once loved, and help them to hear again in memory the curlew's call, the rapturous thrill of the invisible lark-choirs, the fairy-like music of the fiddle at the cross roads, that had > in it the wailin' o' the wind, and the sighin' o' the sae, the loneliness o' the bog and the loneliness o' the sky, the whistlin' o' the blackbird and the singin' o' the lark, and the throopin' o' the fairies and the beat of their ten times ten thousand little feet at the moonlit dance on the rath.

Even the sociologist and educationalist may find the reading of such simple books useful. They suggest the question, whether the foundations upon which future mental and moral greatness are built, the imagination, the feelings, mental powers, the near sense of and reverence for God, are not more effectually developed in the young, in homes by mountain, valley, stream and moor, than when in the artificial environment of crowded city life? M. J. M.

Mustard Seed. Some Pungent Paragraphs. By FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $0.60.

In this attractive little volume are gathered some three dozen papers which, with a few exceptions, were originally published in the editorial pages of AMERICA. The book is well named, for the chapters, which are generally about four pages in length, are full of epigrams, figures, illustrations, anecdotes and applications that will yield the ruminating reader valuable lessons on the conduct of life. In his preface the author begs us to remember that "many of these papers are intentional caricatures" and that no "indictment of a whole class" is intended. "Mustard Seed" should not be read through at a sitting, but taken a few pages at a time, when in a meditative mood. "You Were Right," "Chuckling to Oneself," "Will-Hygiene," "Giving Bad Names," "Borrowing Trouble," "You Begin," to name but a few, are cleverly disguised sermonettes that will force the surprised reader to exclaim with smiling contrition: "Thou art the man!" No doubt AMERICA's subscribers will now be eagerly watching for more of Father Donnelly's pungent "Mustard Seed."

W. D.

Venerable Philippine Duchesne. A Brief Sketch of the Life and Work of the Foundress of the Society of the Sacred Heart in America. By a Religious of the Sacred Heart. New York: The America Press. $0.25.

Those who are at all familiar with the work of the Religious of the Sacred Heart in the United States will be glad to learn that something has at last been published about Mother Duchesne. Hers was an eminently heroic life. She was a type of the strong French character at its best. Catholic to the core, with the will of a man and the heart of a child, an idealist, facing death without a tremor and feeding her soul on dreams of the foreign missions and a martyr's crown, insatiate of labor, heedless of fatigue, and supremely contemptuous of the comforts of life; such in brief is the subject of this sketch. And what a devotion she had to the interests of the Sacred Heart! Among the many marked women who were the first members of the Society to which she belonged, she stands out in some respects as the most marked of them all. Catholic education and Catholic ideals of womanhood in the United States owe her a debt that is far from being generally realized. This little book, it is hoped, will inspire many readers to the courageous following of high ideals, and will induce some appreciative and facile pen to undertake a more extended study of her life.

J. H. F.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Would a town which boasts of a High-Church Anglican bishop be left completely at the mercy of incompetent dentists, whose knowledge of their profession is so slight as not to recognize a carious tooth? Would the bishop's daughter, who rejoices in the sweet name of Ingeborg, be forced to leave her home and travel unaccompanied to London, to dwell there alone for a week while searching for dental relief? During a tour to Lucerne would she become unwittingly engaged to a fellow-traveler, whose very appearance she detested? Could the mother of six children leave her family for a week without her absence being noticed? These are some of the absurdities that the anonymous author of "The Pastor's Wife" (Doubleday, $1.35), asks the reader to believe. After all the plot of a story should be at least probable. Many pages in this book might have been copied from a work on obstetrics.

Father Thurston begins the November Month with an article that exposes the source of the so-called prophecies regarding the present war, which are ascribed to a seventeenth century monk named Brother Johannes. The author of the forgery is probably Josephin Peladan, a French "Seer," who writes "mystic" nonsense. Lewis Watt makes an interesting comparison between G. K. Chesterton and Sir Thomas Brown. They were quite similar in their attitude toward the Church. John Ayscough and Father Martindale contribute good stories to the number, and "D." some reminiscences of Mgr. Benson. The editorials, for the most part, bear on the war, and "H. T." takes another shot at the so-called prophecies of St. Malachy. Onofico Panvinio, a sixteenth century writer, seems to have supplied the data that was used.

In the well-named and well-written little volume "Appearances" (Doubleday, $1.00), G. Lowes Dickenson, an English journalist, chronicles the impressions he received while traveling through the Far East and through the United States. He is such an enthusiastic admirer of Nippon that he has "no doubt" that the "civilization of Japan is higher than that of America." "The physical attractiveness of the people" he found very striking and even their "sexual purity" in his opinion compares favorably with that of European nations. After reading the latter assertion we are not surprised to be told that "All America is Niagara. Force without direction, noise without significance, speed without accomplishment," and that among the thousands of papers in this country there are possibly five "which contain in every issue some piece of information or comment which an intelligent man might care to peruse." Can it be that the dinners Mr. Dickenson ate in Yokohama agreed with him better than those he took in New York?

"Rada, a Drama of War in One Act," by Alfred Noyes, which was produced last winter in New York, has now appeared in book form. (Stokes, $0.50.) The scene is laid in the Balkans on Christmas Eve in a village just taken by the enemy. Two soldiers are quartered in the house of Rada, a newly-made widow, Subka, her little girl and Nanko, a half-witted schoolmaster. At the climax of the tragedy Rada kills herself and her daughter to escape a worse fate, and the village idiot proclaiming himself a striking example of "the survival of the fittest," starts the "Adeste Fideles" on the gramaphone that was to have been Subka's Christmas present. The play, which is written with its pacificist author's usual vigor of expression, doubtless represents but too faithfully some of the horrors that are actually taking place in Europe now.

A correspondent sends us the following recollections of the lamented novelist, Mgr. Benson:

> One of his hobbies was the making of tapestry, and I love to think of him busy at work, and all the time thinking out the plot of a new novel. One of these tapestries of his hung round the walls of his study, and in the bedroom in which I slept, was another, "The Dance of Death," as he called it. It showed the visit of Death to "all sorts and conditions of men," to the schoolmaster, the doctor, the soldier, the Carthusian, where Death and the monk are arm in arm, the bishop, the Pope and the final scene, over the bed, was the meeting of Death with Robert Hugh Benson. And now that meeting has taken place, he has laid down his hard-worked pen, his voice is still, his eyes are closed, at last he is at rest.

A rest well won! For Mgr. Benson had crowded into the eleven years of his Catholic life work of which an industrious nonogenarian might well have been proud. He burned himself out. But his intimates aver that he died as he wished and hoped to die. Mgr. Benson also wrote good verses and a volume of them is announced for early publication.

Those who have been reading the war editorials in the New York Evening Sun will be glad to know that they have been collected into a volume by their author, Mr. Frank H. Symonds, and given to the public in a popular form that will bring it well within the means of most readers. The writer, who is a clever newspaper man, is not a novice in the chronicling of wars, and his past experience has made his account of the main movements in the east and west theatres of the conflict not only graphic, but accurate. It is safe to say that "The Great War" (Kennerley, $1.00), in its 256 pages contains the clearest and most comprehensive story of the struggle that has yet appeared. Later works will, of course, give greater detail and better authenticated information, and will avoid the defects that are inseparable from collections of isolated essays; but at the present moment Mr. Symonds' book is very valuable.

"Uncle Remus and His Friends" (Houghton, $1.25) is a judicious selection from the inimitable "Br'er Rabbit" and other "Affikin" stories that won Joel Chandler Harris the affection of the children of the world, and of such others as never get too old to be young. There are forty-five tales in two sets, one marking the triumph of Rabbit wit over the might of big Brothers Lion, B'ar etc.; the other showing Uncle Remus roaming at large in exposition of "de truf" from Limbo to the "watermillion" paradise in "de Nunited State er Georgy"; and between them Mr. Harris' early plantation songs are rather unwisely sandwiched, for the folklore tales are on the highest level of excellence. The introduction is a sympathetic but all too brief biography of the wise and kindly and modest humorist who, in the forty odd volumes he contributed to the original literature of America and the folklore of the world, never set down a word that offended taste or charity or truth. There are twelve illustrations, one of his bedroom which shows, not very clearly, his beloved pictures of our Lady and St. Anthony and the beads he was wont to say long before he was received into the Catholic Church. There should be generous welcome for many other such selections from his published works, and also for his unique, but as yet uncollected letters to his daughters at their convent school, which, like all he wrote, are happy, healthy and delightfully original.

"Letters and Addresses on Woman Suffrage by Catholic Ecclesiastics" (Devin-Adair, $0.10), is a pamphlet Margaret Rorke has compiled with the object of proving that the Church has taken no official stand against extending the voting-franchise to women. It also contains an excellently written discussion on the "Church and the Position of Woman To-day," by Father Joseph H. McMahon, of New York. With some of the reasons presented in these pages the majority of Catholics will find themselves in agreement. To say, however, that woman needs the ballot for her spiritual and intellectual growth, and that "to centre her interests in one family, no matter how large, is selfishness," is mere nonsense or worse. Apart from the fact that the statements on page sixteen concerning St. Paul are little short of scandalous, many will believe that the compiler has weakened her argument by including the paper "Why I Believe in Woman Suffrage." If the pamphlet reaches a second edition, Catholic sensibilities should be consulted by omitting the introductory paragraphs.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Ave Maria Press, Notre Dame, Ind.:
The Secret of Pocomoke. Mary T. Waggaman. $0.75.
Crowell Co., New York:
Women of the Classics. By Mary Sturgeon. $2.50.
Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The Grand Assize. By Hugh Carton. $1.35.
Duffield & Co., New York:
Westminster Abbey. II Vols. By Helen Marshall Pratt. $4.50.
E. P Dutton & Co., New York:
The German Enigma. By Georges Bourdon. Translated by Beatrice Marshall. $1.25; Poetry. By Arthur Quiller-Couch. $0.50.
J. Fischer & Bro., New York:
In a Flower Garden. Cantata for Juvenile Voices. By Edith M. Burrows. Music by W. Rhys-Herbert. $0.75.
Harper & Brothers, New York:
May Iverson's Career. By Elizabeth Jordan. $1.25; Life in America One Hundred Years Ago. By Gaillard Hunt. $1.50; California. An Intimate History. By Gertrude Atherton. $2.00.
Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Boys' Book of Battles. $2.00; Prints, Their Technique and History. By Emil H. Richter. $2.00; The Eskimo Twins. By Lucy Fitch Perkins. $1.00.
P. J. Kenedy & Sons; New York:
Mustard Seed. By Francis P. Donnelly, S.J. $0.60.
J. P. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Prehistoric Man and History. By G. F. Scott Elliott. $2.00.
Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
What Can I Know? By George Trumbull Ladd. $1.50; The Book of the Blue Sea. By Henry Newbolt. $1.50.
The Macmillan Co., New York:
Japan To-day and To-morrow. By Hamilton Wright Mabie. $2.00; The Wife of Sir Isaac Harman. By H. G. Wells. $1.50.
Oxford University Press, New York:
Hamlet and Orestes. By Prof. Gilbert Murray. $0.25.
Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Through the Brazilian Wilderness. By Theodore Roosevelt. $3.50.
Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York:
Rada. A Drama in One Act. By Alfred Noyes. $0.60.
Sturgis & Walton Co., New York:
Henri Bergson. A Study in Radical Evolution. By Emil Carl Wilm. $1.25.
University of Chicago Press, Chicago, Ill.:
Water Reptiles of the Past and Present. By Samuel Wendell Williston. $3.00.

EDUCATION

The Latest Apologist for the Carnegie Foundation

In its October number the Educational Review sees fit to criticize those organizations which, "at various summer meetings," have passed resolutions condemning the activity of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. It observes, with some heat, that "two often-exploded lies are still iterated and reiterated, sometimes by persons who are in genuine ignorance, and sometimes by persons who are actuated by malice." The Review then states, "for purposes of future reference," first, that, the Carnegie Foundation has no animosity toward sectarian colleges, and no criticism to make of them; that, in the second place, the Foundation is not engaged in oppressing or suppressing small and struggling colleges.

These two negatives are stated clearly enough, but they do not justify the insinuation that these accusations are made by "persons who are in genuine ignorance," or by those "actuated by malice." Recent criticisms of the Foundation have been offered by the Catholic Educational Association, and by the National Educational Association. We can speak for the officers of the Catholic Educational Association who passed a plainly-worded resolution, condemning the work of the Foundation as "pernicious." These officers, representing as honorable a body of men and women as can be found in America, were well acquainted with the activities of the Carnegie Foundation. They understood thoroughly the purport of their resolution, and their resolution voiced the general opinion of American Catholic educators. To say that they acted in ignorance or malice, is but to exemplify anew the air of calm superiority which has marked the dealings of the Carnegie Foundation, with schools and educators who refuse to sell their independence for Mr. Carnegie's dollars.

RELIGION UNDESIRABLE IN EDUCATION

It can not be denied that by the very magnitude of Mr. Carnegie's gift, a gift, however, intended only for those colleges which will throw off "denominational control," the impression has been created that religious influence in education is something highly undesirable. The public has been led to think that, in the opinion of Mr. Carnegie and in the judgment of his representatives, who scrupulously administer the bequest in the spirit of the donor, an education without the religious element is essentially better than a cultural training imparted in schools where religion exercises some control. "If you want my dollars for educational purposes," says Mr. Carnegie in effect, "you must first give up all allegiance, public or private, to any religious conviction, and all adhesion to any sectarian body. It is not enough that you do not teach any religion in your school. By suitable changes in your charters, you must put religious teaching beyond the range of possibility." Can it be denied that this is the meaning of Mr. Carnegie's offer, or that this is the interpretation which, quite naturally, has been almost universally accepted? To hold out an alluring bait of dollars, at a time when religious indifference is already widespread, and when forces hostile to religion are actively at work is, to put the matter plainly, to finance a propaganda of unbelief. The Catholic Educational Association, not in the least blinded by the gleam of Mr. Carnegie's gold, says that this baiting for the colleges is pernicious, and detrimental to the best interests of religion and education alike. The Association had a right to express itself in this fashion, if only to protest that it did not share the opinion which the Foundation is foisting upon the public, that religious influence is fatal to intellectual training. It may not have been the intention either of Mr. Carnegie, or of his Foundation, to spread this opinion. But it is none the less true that the general public can read no other purpose in the activities of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. The Catholic Educational Association did not criticize any person for "keeping faith" with benefactors. They criticized the "deed of gift" itself, and they assert that such a deed is a detriment, not a blessing, to the cause of education.

EXCHANGING RELIGION FOR DOLLARS

The weakening of religious influences, foretold by critics of all beliefs and no beliefs, as a result of the Foundation, has actually begun. In order to fall within the purview of the statutes of the Foundation, colleges have either changed their charters, or have become unfaithful to religious obligations originally set by their founders. In one year, Drake University, of Des Moines, Iowa; Central University, of Kentucky; Drury College in Missouri, and Franklin College in Indiana, revised their charters so as to abolish all denominational tests in the choice of trustees, officers and teachers. Again, the cases of Coe College, Iowa, and Swarthmore College (Cf. Fourth Annual Report of the Carnegie Foundation) exemplify the unworthy efforts that have been made by some institutions to become participants of the steel-magnate's generosity, efforts which have provoked the reproach that they were ready to sever all religious connections in order to obtain money from Mr. Carnegie. It is not worth while to point out the loss of academic dignity involved in these proceedings. It was a sacrifice of academic independence, and worse, an offering to Mammon.

There is justice in the contention that the scramble of these and other institutions to get within the scope of Mr. Carnegie's "benefactions" can not but react injuriously upon the religious life of the nation. The public sees that great material advantages are held out to those who are willing to forsake spiritual ideals. The college is asked to hold religion a thing of small worth. It is asked to name the price of religion. A Foundation, most respectable in its money connections, offers a new lamp of gold on condition that the old lamp of religion be relegated to the lumber-room. The college accepts, nay, clamors for the exchange, and thereby shows the public how profitable it may be to sell your religion for material advancement.

MONEY UNDER FALSE PRETENCES

The Educational Review refers to "individuals and institutions who are engaged in getting money from the public and from the parents under false pretences," and suggests that these should receive the criticism which is now being leveled against the high-minded Carnegie Foundation. It is always the lamb that has muddied the waters. The Review may rest assured that the standard of intellectual honesty is quite as high among private institutions, as it is among schools and colleges which name their price, or among those who pay it. Mr. Carnegie's defenders have yet to show that an education from which religious teaching is excluded is superior to the training in which the precepts of Christ have part. They have yet to show the credentials which justify Mr. Carnegie's Foundation in laying down the conditions upon which a college may be suffered to exist, and finally they have not, as yet, proved that dependence upon Mr. Carnegie's dollars is less degrading, morally and intellectually, than, let us say, a dependence upon the teachings of the Westminster Catechism.

It is with quite an air of finality that the latest apologist for the Carnegie Foundation bids all benighted folk, "particularly New Yorkers," peruse an article in the Dial for July 16, 1914, entitled "A Live Wire." We have carefully studied this production, and fail to see what strength it lends to the position assumed by the Educational Review. The intention was, no doubt, that the reader should be profoundly impressed by the following statement:

> It was only the other day that he (Mr. Churchill, President of the New York Board of Education) distinguished himself by a violent onslaught on that worthiest of philanthropies, the Carnegie Foundation, on the ground, forsooth, that Mr. Carnegie does not choose to extend his benefactions to institutions which flout the very idea of a university by establishing sectarian tests for their teaching.

Tremendous as is this indictment, we refuse to be crushed. "Idea of a University" seems to recall a fairly well-educated man, one John Henry Newman. But apart from this unfortunate connotation, it remains for the writer in the Dial to show that Mr. Carnegie's is the "worthiest of philanthropies," and that sectarian tests "flout the very idea of a university." Our logic may be small, but, as it seems to us, these are the very points at issue. Our "Live Wire" artist will be busy in ruling out all the great universities of the past and the greatest of our day, which were founded on definite religious principles, and in proving that negation of religion is not "sectarian."

ALBERT MUNTSCH, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

The Bad Samaritan

The old-fashioned Samaritan doubtless means well, but his work was rough, unscientific. He picks battered travelers out of the roadway, and pours oil and wine, septic medicaments into their wounds. He carries them into private hostelries, and for their expenses puts pennies into mine host's hand. Plainly, this is to encourage carelessness, mendicancy. It is upsetting plans scientifically devised by schools of philanthropy, for the relief of the afflicted. Was not Mr. Garizim aware that this rural district had been assigned to the recently incorporated Allied Charities of Samaria? Surely, these gentlemen should have been consulted; yet, quite without authority, Mr. Garizim announces that he will call later to make further expenditures, should these be necessary. Methods of this type are as unwise as they are well-meant. We can never attack the problem of public relief squarely if private and sectarian charities perpetuate this wasteful "overlapping." An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Let the representative citizens of Jerusalem and Samaria forget their religious prejudices, and unite in recommending a non-partisan State Road Commission. These shameful highway robberies will soon become as remote as the savageries of the Dark Ages. Private agencies, especially when dominated by the "sectarian outlook," can never hope to suppress public evils. This is the work of the State, committing its duty into the hands of capable persons possessed of the "social outlook." We can recommend no fitter agents for this work than men and women—especially women—who have been trained scientifically in the modern school of philanthropy. We are pleased to hand you herewith a revised list of our graduates.

COMMERCIALIZING CHARITY

Not quite so obvious, but to the same effect, is the "message" of the modern school of philanthropy. Has it ever been your fortune, gentle Lector, to sit on the benches of such a school?

Gentle Lector: Yes; and for all my obtuseness, I could not but note that the lecturers frequently wept like the Walrus and the Carpenter, because of the extremely low salaries begrudgingly paid by hard-hearted municipalities to willing social workers.

Auctor: Thanks, gentle Lector. That is the answer you must give, if these poor lines are to proceed smoothly. And did they not say, that most of our city officials were slow to acquire the "social view"?

Gentle Lector: They did. I may add that the "social view" means "the view I am now advocating." "Broadmindedness," or, "an open mind," signifies "taking my word for it." Quite clearly, too, "narrowmindness," or, "the sectarian view," means "opnions which I, Sir Oracle, reject." In fact, it is one of the privileges of these schools that one finds——"

Auctor: Yes, the privilege of these schools, assumed or conceded, are many. You are over-willing to talk, Lector, and I will e'en take the words out of your mouth. Are you to write this Homily, or am I? One of these privileges is, to discover that what our fathers did for charity, we may now do as a profitable means of livelihood. Again, the wisdom often displayed by the lecturers in these schools is very deep and wide. There can be little doubt, that were the Governance of the Universe to be dominated by their syllabi and theories, one short generation would expunge completely all the evils against which the wisdom of ancient sages, and the inspiration of the Christian religion, have done battle in vain for centuries. For there is much virtue in your "social view"; power unlimited in sociological planning for "the perfecting of the race."

SCIENTIFIC PHILANTHROPY

Gentle Lector: But hold, Auctor. Let us be fair. We must admit that these schools have at least taught us the unwisdom of helping impostors. Prudence must rule our charitable endeavors. Though I am not learned in Divinity, I believe Aquinas teaches there can be no virtue without prudence. We must investigate before we help.

Auctor: I suppose, Lector, you are thinking of the time when, without investigation, you helped a family through a bad winter. You contributed weekly, three dollars, only to find, when spring came round, that the pastor and the tender-hearted Prefect of the Young Ladies' Sodality, had likewise been lavishing their charity upon very unworthy objects. Naturally, you felt a bit sore. But do not regret it altogether; you shall not lack a reward. Yes, prudence is a great virtue; yet I think that when without it, we give of our small means to many in His Name, we are saved by a good intention. But, as it seems to me, scientific philanthropy means that we give to a few well-investigated poor, without any good intention at all. At least, it is not supernatural. We do not aid our suffering brethren out of love of God, but because giving "makes for social betterment." That is the difference. I should say, between St. Vincent de Paul and Mr. Andrew Carnegie. Also, our alms help to pay "overhead expenses" connected with organized philanthropy. I will be blunt, Lector, and I may be a raving bigot; but I have never found that scientific charity had much charity to spare, when there was question of private institutions, particularly Catholic institutions, officered by Sisters and Brothers who, by working for the love of God and a bare sustenance, disturb the economic order of high salaries for charitable workers. Scientific philanthropy, Lector, means philanthropy under the control of scientifically-trained philanthropists, "stripped of sentimentality," and only schools of philanthropy breed such. As for institutions, they are medieval, and that is quite enough to damn them.

STATE AND PRIVATE CHARITIES

Gentle Lector: Truly, Auctor, language runs away with you. Perhaps some social worker has flicked you on the raw of late?

Auctor: Yes. Do you read the Survey? Sometimes? Well . . . no matter. But in the last October number, you might have seen an article on "State Money and Privately Managed Charities." It is an intensive study, based on the returns from forty-six States. It is impressive with statistics, footnotes, and judicial decisions. It is very high-minded. The author all but cites Aschaffenburg.

Gentle Lector: It must be an excellent article.

Auctor: I have expressed myself but poorly. It is a very wretched article. But it illustrates excellently the "social point of view." It sums up the case of the State against the privately managed charity. In the latter, it sees seven distinct disadvantages. On the credit side, it can write but four "alleged advantages." I quote the heading. That is, this broadminded social worker, whose sight is free from "civic strabismus," can see no real advantages, but only "alleged advantages" in privately managed charities—such as Brother Barnabas' famous school at Lincolndale.

Gentle Lector: Well, you remember the definition I gave you of the "social point of view," don't you?

Auctor: Perfectly. The gentleman in the Survey further tells us, that "managers and supporters of private charities are compelled to oppose general measures of social reform."

Gentle Lector: I think he is right. By "social reform" he probably means, "a new order which will secure to me and mine excellent jobs." Phrases carelessly tossed off by your social workers are, to the initiate, as pregnant as Lord Burleigh's nod.

Auctor: It may be. But as I was pondering upon frames of mind and similiar topics, my eye was caught by the headlines in the New York Tribune for October 27: "Grand Jury Assails Dep't. of Charities. In Bitter Presentment Urges Abolition of Present System. Food in Hospitals Scored as Unfit for Human Consumption. Conditions at Home for Aged Shocking. Feeble-Minded Children Only Partly Clad." I assure you the text of the Grand Jury's report did not make pleasant reading.

Gentle Lector: But surely, Auctor, these were not privately-managed institutions?

Auctor: No. They were city-managed institutions. Or, rather they do not seem to have been managed at all.

Gentle Lector: I am momentarily shocked into silence. But I know that the Commissioner who has been publicly designated by the director of a school of philanthropy as eminently possessing "the social point of view," rejects, and intends to investigate these findings of the Grand Jury.

Auctor: So I have heard. But while the Commissioner is investigating the Grand Jury which investigated his institutions, the Commissioner himself is being further investigated by the State Civil Service Commission, which is investigating the Municipal Civil Service Commission, because it is charged, the Commissioner "in appointing investigators to investigate charitable institutions went outside the Civil Service list."

Gentle Lector: This sounds very much like The House that Jack Built.

Auctor: Yes. And charity has as little place in it.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Dr. Casartelli, Bishop of Salford, England, has announced that the University of Louvain will accept, in part, the invitation of Cambridge to continue its session at the English university. Fifteen professors of the Faculties of Theology, Philosophy and Law, will resume their courses at Cambridge. It is also reported that the University of Chicago will engage one or more professors as special lecturers.

Through the Secretary, Miss Elisabeth Marbury, the New York League of Catholic Women announces that it has undertaken war relief work. The League will cooperate with other organizations now in the field but, according to the prospectus recently published, will engage in a special branch of work. This will be, "to send assistance to the many religious orders which have been driven out of their convents in Belgium. Even in France and Belgium, in localities where the Sisters are as yet unmolested, many are quite without resources, and yet are striving to care for hundreds of sick and homeless men and women who seek shelter and care at their hands." This worthy charity has the hearty approval of His Eminence, Cardinal Farley.

The question of sororities and fraternities is again troubling the Chicago high schools. In some of these schools the "frats" seem to be flourishing almost as successfully as they did some years ago, when the School Board undertook to suppress them. It is now admitted that these efforts were not so effectual as was then thought. Children in the seventh and eighth grades are being "pledged," and the line between members and non-members in a few high schools is closely drawn. According to one investigator, the secret societies will prevail until certain high school principals are "withdrawn from the school system." The objection made by the school authorities is that secret societies interfere with the discipline and studies of the school, and are sometimes hurtful to the morals of the children.

With the avowed purpose of the World's Purity League, lately in convention at Kansas City, Catholics will sympathize, but they will regard the methods by which the League intends to gain its end, not only as useless, but more likely to do more harm than good: "Frank, clean, open-minded discussion of social diseases is the best way to stamp out the plague," says the League's president. "Nothing can be accomplished in darkness, and nothing can be accomplished by prudery. The doctrine that the white-slave traffic can and must be annihilated, must be given the widest publicity." But how is this remedial? We can not talk vice to death. The world has known of these horrors for generations. Why further discussion of the symptoms of disease? Government officials, investigating the foot and mouth disease, do not engage in "frank, clean, open-minded" public discussions of the repellent symptoms they observe. What is new and worth noting, they consign, not to publications for general circulation, but to bulletins for cattle-owners, and to technical treatises intended for physicians. We have had enough, and to spare, of indiscriminate public talk on these matters. "Christ, not hygiene," religion, not public discussions, will save the world.

Last winter a minority of the teachers in the public schools of Cleveland formed a labor union. Its dissolution, as a body which could not further the best interests of the public, was requested by the School Board and the Superintendent of Schools. Those teachers who refused to withdraw were, after due warning, dropped from the roll of the city's employees. After charges and countercharges the matter was brought into the courts. The teachers won their claim, and the superintendent who refused to reinstate them, in accordance with the court's ruling, finds himself under sentence for contempt. No one will dissent from the decision that labor has a right to organize to protect its rights, but labor might profitably consider that its rights are often identified with the rights of the employer. Apart from special considerations which may be connected with the situation in Cleveland, teachers must see that an organization which refuses to work in harmony with the school authorities can be of no real value to its members. It is imperative that a school have a central authority. If teachers may organize against the principals and School Board, and force their demands by threatening a strike, why may not the children join together to overrule the teachers?

On the battlefields in Europe death and devastation are working out their unholy purpose; but amid it all the life of grace flourishes. It was Friday, October 2, the feast of the Holy Angels and also the first Friday. In the trenches of the French army were many soldier priests, and at one point of action a number of them desired to receive Holy Communion in honor of the Angels and to celebrate the devotion of the first Friday. The battle was raging, and there was no question of the soldier priests leaving the firing line, even for the sake of their immortal souls. But the military chaplain attached to the regiment heard of their wish, and, taking his life in his hands, he set out for the thick of the fighting, carrying with him the Most Blessed Sacrament. All around him the bullets shrieked and whistled, and at times the firing was so heavy that the priest had to crawl along the ground on his knees. But the heavenly guardians strove with the angels of death and prevailed, and the priest with his Burden at last reached the trenches. In the stronghold of Death he gave the Bread of Life to his brother priests and then departed, while the soldiers of Christ again took up the arms of France. It is still possible to be a Catholic and a priest, as well as a brave man and a patriot!

Is the charm which certain Protestant Episcopalians find in Retreats, the charm of asceticism or estheticism? Judging from several recently-published accounts, it would seem that estheticism largely prevails. A lady who had been persuaded "by the wife of a priest," to make a "retreat," tells her experiences in a recent number of the Living Church. The "convent" in which the exercises were held, was, of course, "spotless"; and as is usual in books, though not always in life, the nuns were "sweet-faced" and "quiet."

> Mass was said daily at seven o'clock. The chapel was very beautiful. There was just a faint odor of incense [Surely! to Protestants, incense is a Note of the True Church] and as the dear, familiar words were spoken in the solemn stillness of the early (!) morning, it was slowly borne in on me that I was indeed in a holy place. The quiet nuns, etc.

Monks, according to Browning and the Protestant concept, are generally built on the plan of Daniel Lambert. Not so the conductor of this retreat. He had "a fine, thin face, suggestive of power and humility." It must be remembered, however, that this gentleman was a Protestant monk. One wonders how popular retreats would be among these good Protestants, were they given in chapels where a shrieking riot of color and tinsel and imitation marble and paper flowers, well-meant for ornaments, betokened the congregation's artistic and actual poverty. Protestant retreat masters generally speak "beautiful, simple English." On the other hand, it has been noted that the diction of certain unusually successful Catholic retreat masters, closely resembled the English of the Hans Breitmann Ballads. Does the Protestant Episcopal Church teach as "the Faith of the Church," that the dead have "a conscious knowledge" of what we on earth are doing? This monkish retreat master, it seems, inculcates this belief upon his followers.

By the recent death of Franz Brandts, Catholics have lost one of their most successful social workers, a pioneer and pathfinder for the present generation. Outside of Germany his work is better known than his name. There is no one familiar with Catholic social organizations who has not heard of the great Volksverein with its almost 800,000 members. Comparatively few, however, may know of the important part played in its foundation and development by this Catholic leader who was placed at its head, with Windthorst as honorary president, and who remained its constant director. Its program of social instruction, its activity in every field of social service, its unequalled literary productiveness have long been the admiration of friend and foe. Socialists themselves, against whom the influence of the great Catholic organization was always directed, have accorded to it their highest tribute of praise for its thoroughness and efficiency. While still a young man Franz Brandts had foreseen the course which social and economic development must take, and had rightly measured the dangers of that radicalism which was then gaining ground. He therefore prepared himself to meet successfully the issues of the future and remained to the end of his long and fruitful life a guide and inspiration for the fellow workers who had been trained under his leadership. His name, likewise, is inseparably connected with the enterprising Catholic workingmen's movement known as the Arbeiterwohl. It was largely due to the labors and devotedness of Franz Brandts that the great Catholic social ideals of Windthorst were so completely realized in Germany.

Longmans' New Books

Mentally Defective Children.

By ALFRED BINET and TH. SIMON, M.D. Authorized Translation by W. B. DRUMMOND, Author of "An Introduction to Child Study," etc. With an Appendix containing the Binet-Simon Tests of Intelligence by MARGARET DRUMMOND, M.A., and an Introduction by PROFESSOR ALEXANDER DARROCH. With 10 Diagrams. $1.00 net.

Christianity and Economic Science.

By the REV. W. CUNNINGHAM, F.B.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. $0.90 net.

The author endeavors to trace in current thought on economic questions the elements which are due to Christianity, even though they may have ceased to be consciously religious.

THE WESTMINSTER LIBRARY.

A Series of Manuals for Catholic Priests and Students. Edited by the Right Rev. Monsignor WARD, President of St. Edmund's College, Ware, and the Rev. H. THURSTON, S.J.

The Priest and Social Action.

By the REV. CHARLES PLATER, S.J., M. A., Professor of Psychology at St. Mary's Hall, Stonyhurst. $1.20 net.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

Globe-Wernicke
Sectional Bookcase

A LEGACY for the future is a growing library in a Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcase. Built to grow, it costs no more than the ordinary kind, and lasts generations.

Sections with glass doors of the "Quality First"—"Built-to-Endure"—Globe-Wernicke Construction, $2.25 and up. Catalog RR 111 and the World's Best Books sent on request.

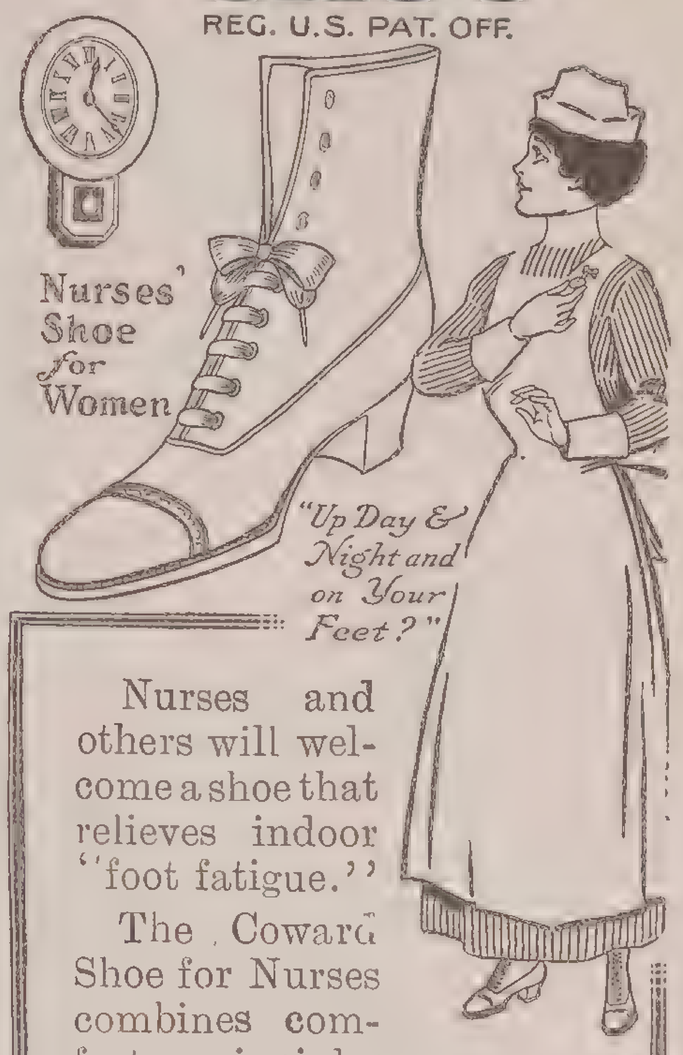
On sale by 2,000 agents.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati
Makers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Steel and Wood,) Globe Safes, Stationers' Supplies.

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives



For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

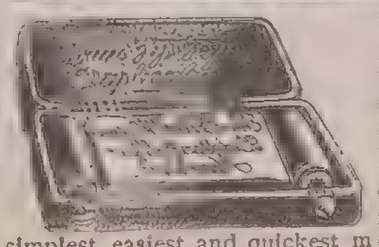
The Coward Shoe
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Nurses and others will welcome a shoe that relieves indoor "foot fatigue."

The Coward Shoe for Nurses combines comfort principles which relieve foot strain, support the ankle, and is most helpful in treating arch troubles.

Those whose feet feel the strain of constant standing will find this shoe of immediate relief and lasting benefit.

Built on a special Coward Last, with pliant sole and rubber heel lifts.



SOLD NOWHERE ELSE
JAMES S. COWARD
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished — Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

EVER NEED DUPLICATES

of form Letters, Price Lists, Bills, Invoices, Drawings, Menus, Reports, anything? Then take advantage of our offer of ten days' trial, without deposit, and become one of thousands of satisfied customers who will agree that DAUS IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR with "DAUSCO" Oiled Parchment Back, negative roll, is the simplest, easiest and quickest method of duplicating on the market. 100 copies from Penwritten and 50 copies from Typewritten Original. If you have tried other duplicators without success, you willbe more than pleased with ours. Complete duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains several articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, NOV. 8.

Four Papers on Catholic Sociology

"The Needy Family and Institutions"

BY THE REV. RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J.

"Safeguarding 'Jim,'" By the Rev. Paul L. Blakely, S.J.; "The Workingman's Home," By the Rev. Henry Woods, S.J.; "Catholic Social Workers," By the Rev. Paul L. Blakely, S.J. In this number too is the letter on the Great War that Pope Benedict XV addressed to the world. No one interested in Sociology can afford to miss the current CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1906

15. I. Object of Federation. II. Divorce. — Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D. Hon. Daniel J. Kenefick

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. — C. S. Devas, M.A.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. — Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. — James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. — Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

16. The Catholic Press. — E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Eethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. — John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. — Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." — Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
12. The Religious Teacher. — M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. — Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. — Charles D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. — James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. — New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. — His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. — Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. — Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. — A. Hilliard Atteridge
24. The Scientific Outlook. — Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
18. The Index. — Peter Finley, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box X, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

FOUNDED 1856
BROKAW BROTHERS
MEN'S & BOYS' CLOTHING HATS & FURNISHINGS

The last word in clothes-buying wisdom is spoken when men and young men exercise discretion and make our clothing their habitual choice. We could advance many reasons in support of this statement, but by saying no better clothes are made we sum up to a simple nicety.

Fall Sack Suits	$18. to $50.
Fall Overcoats	$16. to $38.
Winter Overcoats	$18. to $75.

Mail orders filled. Samples sent upon request.

Astor Place & Fourth Avenue
SUBWAY AT THE DOOR—ONE BLOCK FROM BROADWAY

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

THE FRANK MEANY CO PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

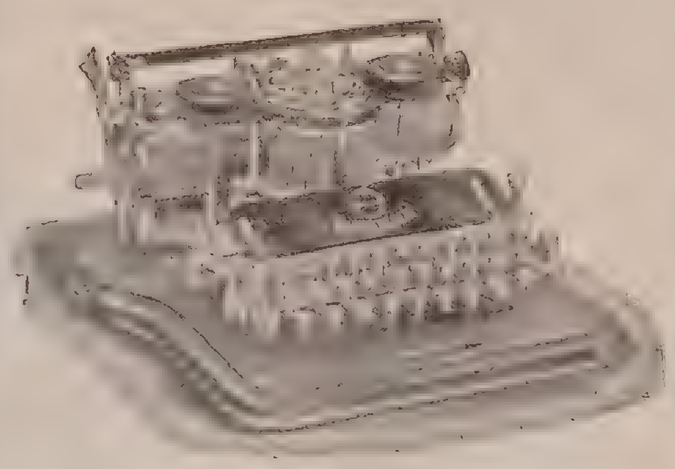
The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By Father Michael Kenny, S.J.



The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that ir this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The MULTIPLEX HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

Important Multiplex Hammond Users

President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River New York, N. Y.

BIND YOUR COPIES OF
AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week

In Book Form For Future Reference

"BIG BEN" BINDER Is handsome and durable
Opens flat to any page

Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.
I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "BIG BEN" BINDER

*NAME*_____ *CITY*_____

*STREET*_____ *STATE*_____

AT LAST!

SECTION FOLD PARTITION

Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst

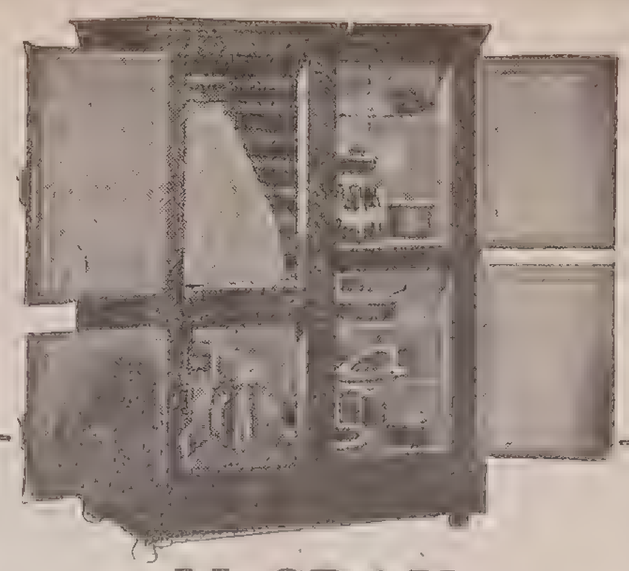
"A Child Can Fold Them"

A movable partition that is movable--easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.



Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.

507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.

Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

McCRAY Refrigerators

are used in the best Catholic Institutions and in thousands of the finest Private Residences.

Any McCray can be arranged to ice from the outside. Hundreds of Catholic Institutions use McCray Refrigerators, either stock sizes or built in, and find them the greatest convenience and comfort as well as big savers of ice.

Send us a floor plan with dimensions and our designing department will work out the best and most economical solution of your refrigerator problem, furnishing blue prints, or suggesting a suitable stock size without cost or obligation.

Write for Catalog

No. 50 for Catholic Institutions. No. 91 for Residences.

The McCray Refrigerator Co.

682 Lake St., Kendallville, Ind.

Branches in all principal cities

STORIES WITH A SUGGESTION

and other articles suitable for a boy or girl comprises the monthly grist of THE CHILD APOSTLE. It is a children's magazine published in the hope of cultivating unselfishness in the young folks. Your boy or girl will like it. Sample copies free. Fifty cents yearly. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions can SAVE MONEY on their purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER

College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of

AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.

Hudson, Jay & Staple Sts., New York, N. Y.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Church and Social Problems

CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION

By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Associate Editor of AMERICA

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Price 75 cents, postpaid

(Regular Price, $1.10)

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

It is in fact a very stirring call for recruits to the highest life, written throughout in a style that will catch the boyish ear, and it might almost be termed a sermon with the Decree of July 15th, 1912, as its text. Father Cassilly makes the most of his case, and does not forget to bring in that eminent member of his Society, Father Ribadeneira, whose vocation took its rise in the very unpromising occasion of a fight with another boy. We wish his pamphlet a large circulation and much fruit, and should like to see a reprint for use in our own country. — The Month.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the

Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times.

Cloth 30 cents — Paper 15 cents

12 Copies $2.70 — 12 Copies $1.35

100 Copies $22.50 — 100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York

Priests, Brothers and Sisters are much needed in all parts of the United States. Is it not to be feared that many boys and girls who ought to give themselves up to God and to work for souls miss their vocation because they are not properly instructed? Father Cassilly in this "Chat for Young People" explains vocation to religious life and to the priesthood in a simple, attractive way that ought to appeal to our youth.—The Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

MENEELY & CO.

Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.

Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.

88 years' experience

Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal — Memorials

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

PEERLESS HAIR BROOM

$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Now Ready Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

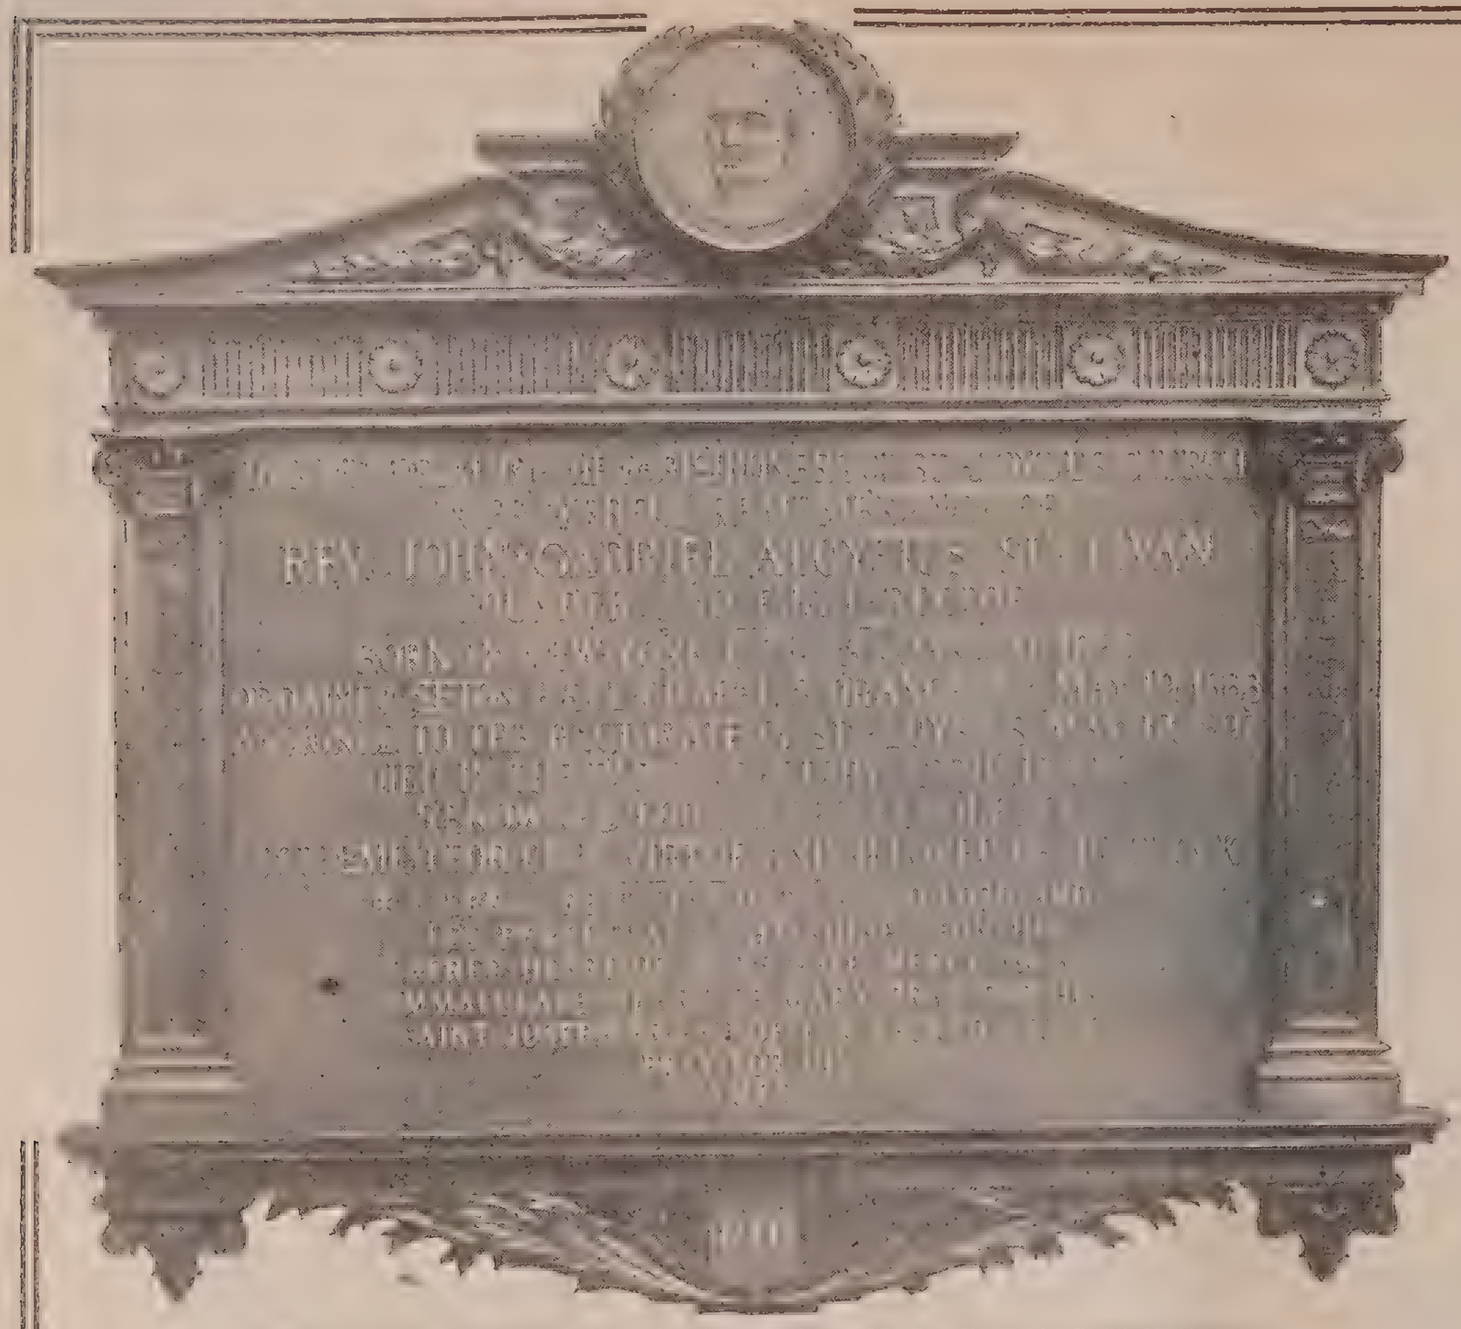
MARYMOUNT
Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York
HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES
Conducted by the
Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary
Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City
PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES
European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.
For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute
For Girls and Young Ladies
Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.
Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph
IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.
Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University
PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE
Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings
Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music
A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. * Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.
Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.
Largest Catholic College in America
Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.
Send for catalogue to
PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY
Adjoining Bronx Park, New York
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city
Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS
Classical and Scientific Courses
St. John's Hall for Younger Boys
School of Law — 140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine — Fordham.
School of Pharmacy — Fordham.
Write for catalogue
Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest.



Mt. St. Mary's College and Academy
PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY
Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. College, Academic and Preparatory Courses. Exceptional advantages in Music, Art and Domestic Science.
Address Sister Directress.

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN
College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK
DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS
Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station
PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST
COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students
WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS
PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

THE MONTH
gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by
THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS
COLLEGE AND ACADEMY
FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS
74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year
Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.
FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Made for St. Aloysius Church, Jersey City, N. J. Rev. J. C. Hall, Pastor

TABLETS for Memorial, Commemorative and Public purposes, in Bronze, Brass, Mosaic, or a combination of materials, are a distinctive feature of Gorham products. : : : : Special designs will be furnished upon request. : :

THE GORHAM COMPANY

Ecclesiastical Wares

FIFTH AVENUE AND 36TH STREET, NEW YORK

Just Ready. A New Novel by Dr. Egan

THE IVY HEDGE

By MAURICE FRANCIS EGAN

Crown 8vo. Colored Jacket

A FINE GIFT

Net $1.35 By mail, $1.45

Dr. Egan's new novel, "The Ivy Hedge," is a picture quiet in tone, but rising at times to very noble heights, of life in the United States among both the rich and the poor. The character of the Canadian girl is a new type in fiction, and Dr. Egan's analysis of the effects of Socialism on well-meaning people who suffer from conditions which they can not analyze is absolutely true to life.

Competent critics have declared this to be the very best work of fiction yet published on those present conditions which lead to Socialism.

Subscribe to Benziger's Magazine. $2.00 a year; 3 years $4.00

BENZIGER BROTHERS,

NEW YORK 36-38 Barclay Street

CINCINNATI 343 Main Street

CHICAGO 214-216 W. Monroe Street

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote.

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

The America Press

59 EAST 83D STREET

NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 7
WHOLE No. 294

NOVEMBER 28, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Nov. 17, p. m.-Nov. 24, a. m.—Comparative Quiet in the West—Events in Poland — Servia — Turkey. Australia: General Election. Austria-Hungary: The Russian Peril. France: The Fête-Day of King Albert. Germany: A Catholic Protest—A Friend of Ireland. Great Britain: Aliens Again—The New War Credit. Ireland: Catholic Chaplains and Recruiting. Mexico: New Wars and New Affidavits — First Affidavit — Second Affidavit — Third Affidavit—Fourth Affidavit.....157-160

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Religious Conditions in the Philippines—The Wise Householder—The Young Man and Building—Why are Graves Untended?—The Awakening of Faith in France, II—Evodia and Syntyche. 161-167

COMMUNICATIONS

The Violation of Belgian Neutrality—A Pro-German "Reptile"—The Italians.....167-169

EDITORIALS

A Defence and an Answer—Our Alleged "Rush"—Protestant Backsliding—The Toll of Death—Lilliputian Souls.....170-172

LITERATURE

The Ignorance of the Past.

REVIEWS: The Book of the Bayeux Tapestry—The World Missions of the Catholic Church—The Struggle for Scutari—Criticism—On Acting—Essays on Books.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Catholic Mind—"Modern Lovers"—"Hugh Carton"—Boston Truth—"From Dublin to Chicago"—"The Reading Public"—Artistic Calendars—Two War Poems.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....172-177

EDUCATION

His Own Master.....177, 178

SOCIOLOGY

A "Don't" for Sociological Workers....178, 179

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Paper for Exiled Belgians—Jews and Irreligious Schools—Doddering Scripture and Church History—The Catholic "Big Brother" Movement—Federation of Catholic Alumnæ—Changed Views of Belgium—The Anarchy in Mexico 179, 180

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—The main interest in the great conflict has shifted back to the eastern theatre, which is again the scene of very desperate fighting; and the lull which recently characterized the situation in Poland is now the chief feature of the situation in France and Belgium. For many weeks the progress of the armies in the west from the North Sea to Switzerland has been extremely slow; so slow, in fact, that readers of headlines in the newspapers are no longer deceived, but have come to realize that the terms "notable successes" and "satisfactory progress" signify very small distances. In both Berlin and Paris considerable elation is felt if it can be recorded that the Germans or Allies have been able to push onward at any point as much as a mile in a week, or even less. This, however, has not meant that the fighting had become either less determined or more desultory. The contrary was true, and the lists of casualties indicated that the struggle was without parallel for bitterness, courage, and loss of life. Night and day it continued with terrifically destructive energy. An example in point is five massed attacks made by the Germans south of Verdun within the space of two hours. A marked change has been noted, however, especially in the north, during the week. In some places the rival trenches are incredibly close to each other, so that the rifles are not more than a few hundred feet apart; under such circumstances artillery fire has become impossible, as it would prove as dangerous to friends as to foes. Then, too, the winter has settled down on France and Belgium; the fields, which have been flooded, freeze by night and melt during the day, with the result that the soldiers at times are deep in mud; add to this that snow has fallen over the fighting area; and it is no wonder that there has resulted a very perceptible weakening both in the frequency and fierceness of the attacks. Another reason has had a very important share in the partial cessation of active operations. The Germans, who have all along been maintaining a strong offensive against the Belgians, French and British, have found themselves obliged to transfer large bodies of troops from France to Poland. It meant a sacrifice to do so, but the prospect of a Russian invasion was so imminent that it had to be averted at any cost. Judging, therefore, from the fact that the unflagging violence that formerly characterized the German movements against the Allies has almost ceased, it is safe to say that, for the present, the Kaiser is concentrating his attention mainly on Poland, and that for some time to come he will be content to hold his own without endeavoring to push forward against Calais. In the west, therefore, the position of the armies, with the exception of some unimportant changes in the vicinity of Verdun, is about the same as it was a week ago; but the general situation has undergone a very important modification in this sense that for the first time in many weeks there is comparative quiet throughout the long battle line.

Bulletin, Nov. 17, p. m.-Nov. 24, a. m.

Comparative Quiet in the West

In the east events are transpiring with bewildering and kaleidoscopic rapidity. The German retreat, which is claimed at Berlin to have been mainly strategic and to have been no less brilliant than the retirement that won such praise for the British, after having covered nearly one hundred miles and reached almost to the Silesian border, has come to an end; and close upon it has followed another advance into the heart of Poland. The excellent railroad system at the disposal of the Germans has enabled them to bring up such reenforcements that they have been able to drive the Russians down from Soldau and Lipno to Plock, and up from Kutno to Gombin. A great battle is now in progress between Lodz and Lowicz, and on its outcome much depends. Should it prove successful for the Germans, they can again march on Warsaw, which even now is only forty miles from the point of their furthest advance, or they can turn to the north and so relieve the pressure in East Prussia, or bend south and so join the Austrians in the region about Cracow. The Russians report that they have checked the German army that has been trying to pierce their centre, and that they are continuing their advance in both East Prussia and Galicia. It would seem, however, that their movements in both these territories have been seriously hampered by the necessity of strengthening their centre, for in both places their advance appears to have been somewhat arrested. In Galicia, however, their victorious march on the stronghold of Cracow has not been altogether halted, and in spite of the resumption of a very vigorous offensive on the part of the Austrians they are reported to have crossed the Rava and to have occupied Wieliezka. In southwestern Poland the Austrians are acting in union with the Germans, and are making a strong movement against the Russians from Cracow to Czenstochowa, but so far are said to have been held at bay. It is impossible, however, on account of contradictory reports, to determine exactly the positions of the two Russian armies that were marching on Cracow; but it looks as though the army that was advancing along the Vistula in southern Poland has been forced to fall back; and that the other army which has been sweeping through central Galicia has been so weakened by reenforcements taken from it and sent to the army threatened at the centre, that it is now merely marking time and awaiting the issue of the important battle that is taking place west of Warsaw.

Events in Poland

Meanwhile, Austria is prosecuting the war against Servia with renewed vigor, and it seems that the Balkan State is seriously alarmed, although still quite confident of ultimate success. Austria has concentrated large armies fifty miles within Servian territory, apparently with the purpose of cutting off Belgrade, isolating it, and compelling its surrender. Servia is making desperate efforts to raise sufficient troops to repulse the new invasion, but has been so weakened by the almost continuous fighting of two years that she is finding it hard to do so. No one, however, and least of all Austria, is inclined to doubt her courage and endurance. It is said that active measures are being taken to induce Roumania and Bulgaria to go to her assistance, on the plea that her defeat would put a definite end to the aspirations of all the smaller Slavic States; but there are no present indications that they will agree to this. The change in the tide of war which is now favoring Germany and Austria makes such a move extremely unlikely.

Servia

The campaign against Turkey is not being pushed forward on a large scale. A naval engagement in the Black Sea between the Turkish and Russian fleets is claimed by both sides as a victory. Operations still continue in the vicinity of Erzerum, but have been impeded by the state of the country, which has been rendered more than usually difficult by bad weather. Berlin reports that Turkish troops in Egypt have advanced ninety miles and are now in close proximity to the Suez Canal. The anxiety that was felt for a while in the United States over the outcome of the firing of shots at Smyrna in the direction of the launch of the American cruiser Tennessee has been allayed. Turkey's explanation that they meant nothing more than a warning not to enter a closed mined harbor appears to have been accepted as satisfactory, and the incident seems to be closed.

Turkey

Australia.—The General Election resulted in a victory for the Labor Party. The Liberals having held office for fourteen months by the casting vote of the Speaker in the House of Representatives and failed in all their measures, induced Governor-General Ferguson to dissolve both houses on the outbreak of the war, and appealed to the electors on the ground that the election of the Laborites would be a vote of censure on the war policy and an approval of separation from England. The six States of the Commonwealth return six Senators each, and the franchise for these and the Representatives are the same, every male and female of twenty-one years and upward having one vote. Registration is compulsory but voting is free. Of the thirty-six Senators elected the Labor Party secured thirty-one. The figures for the House of Representatives are not at hand, but the Laborite majority is overwhelming. Mr. Fisher, who again heads the Labor Cabinet, has announced a policy of Australian nationalism, equality of individual rights, a higher tariff on foreign goods in protection of native industries, and a referendum for amendments to the constitution that will facilitate the suppression of monopolies and the nationalization of public utilities. Australia is struggling with her national problem in a spirit of confidence.

General Election

Austria-Hungary.—The following questions have been asked by a Swiss paper, the Schweitzerische

Kirchenzeitung, in connection with the great Russian invasion:

The Russian Peril

Shall Russian culture win a mighty influence in middle Europe? Shall the Balkan States be delivered over to it? Shall its streets be built through Turkey to the Adriatic? Shall the Russian army crush Austria-Hungary and the Russian giant loom up even more enormous? Shall the Orthodox Church, under the power of the Czar, open everywhere a war of violence against the Catholic Church? Shall the Russian cross be planted on Santa Sophia and beneath it the Russian tyranny be inaugurated?

The paper believes that the Russian supremacy would be far more dangerous to our Catholic missions than the Turkish, and concludes by saying that the Austro-German armies have entrusted to them, at present, one of the most important religious and cultural tasks in the history of the world.

France.—"What the world owes Belgium none know better than the French," said M. Galli, president of the City Council in an address at Paris. The fête-day of the King of Belgium, November 15, was observed throughout France, but particularly at Paris. President Poincaré, together with the Municipal Council of Paris and the authorities of every important town in France, sent messages to the King, expressing France's admiration for the heroism displayed by the Belgians and their king in the operations in Belgium. At Paris thousands visited the Champs Élysées where a bust of King Albert has been erected, and contributed to the fund for the relief of the Belgian sufferers. In the morning great crowds assembled to attend the solemn Mass celebrated in the Belgian church in the rue de Charonne. It is said that before the war more than twenty thousand Belgian woodcarvers were settled in this district. In the afternoon a second religious service was held in Notre Dame, in the presence of Cardinal Amette and a large gathering of Belgian refugees. The wounded in the hospitals were visited during the day, and in many private residences Belgians were made the guests of honor. Never before, in all probability, has Paris thus celebrated the fête-day of a foreign potentate.

The Fete-Day of King Albert

Germany.—Of late so much has been said by enemies of Germany about certain books which are described as representing the spirit of German militarism, that it is important to hear the other side of the argument. In regard to this, a Bonn University professor writes that German Catholics would never have given their consent to a policy of conquest and world power. German Catholics, he says, have rather been censured for being too international in their views of Catholicism than ultra-national. He then continues:

A Catholic Protest

If, nevertheless, with fullest conviction of the justice of our cause, we have unreservedly dedicated ourselves to the resolution adopted by the Emperor, to draw our sword for the protection and honor of our land, it may be taken as an argument that the war has not been originated by greed for power, clearly irreconcilable with Catholic principles, but has been forced upon us.

German Catholics everywhere protest against the injustice of a press which, forgetting English navalism, would put down German militarism. The latter, they argue, is necessary for the national protection of Germany against foes which overwhelmingly outnumber it, while the former openly boasts of controlling the sea, which belongs to no nation. The expenses of the English army and navy, according to the figures quoted, have been far greater per head of the population than those of Germany. The protest further remarks that Germany does not hold the monopoly in atheism.

The German acting Secretary of State, at the direct order of the Imperial Chancellor von Bethmann Hollweg, has given an important official reply to the questions of the Irish leader, Sir Roger Casement. It had been pointed out by Sir Roger that rumors were spread in his country that a German victory would imply danger to Ireland. This accusation has now been officially denied. Germany, it was stated, would never overthrow any of the institutions of Ireland. Should fortune ever bring German troops to the shores of Ireland they would come, not as an army of invaders, but as a nation inspired by good will.

A Friend of Ireland

Great Britain.—Although the Government has announced, on more than one occasion, that no danger is to be feared from aliens in England, public apprehension refuses to be downed. At present nearly fifteen thousand foreigners have been interned, but in a statement made to Parliament by Home Secretary McKenna, about twenty-nine thousand are still at large. In the opinion of many members of Parliament, the authorities have been "complacent, almost frivolous," in dealing with the question. They believe that spies have been active along the coast, and that there are spies among the Belgian refugees, and even among those who present themselves as recruits. The Times thinks that these statements are overdrawn, but according to the Daily Express, the spy is able to do very serviceable work because it is nobody's duty to deal with him. "Three Government Departments are concerned, the War Office, the Home Office and the Admiralty, and the result is inaction, hesitation and all manner of mischief. There should be a committee of safety directly responsible to Parliament and to the people."

Aliens Again

On November 16, Premier Asquith made the greatest single demand in history upon the material resources of Great Britain, when he moved an additional war credit of one billion, one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars. This will mean an increase of about fifty per cent. in the national debt. The Premier admitted that, up to the present, the war had cost the country about five million dollars a day. Speaking for the Unionist members in Parliament, Mr. Walter Long congratulated the Premier on the evident determination of the Government to leave nothing undone to carry the war to a successful issue. The Government could count upon the widest latitude and an absolutely free hand as long as the country was satisfied that the war would be prosecuted with vigor and determination. This statement undoubtedly expresses the temper of the English people, and indicates that no overtures for peace would at present be considered.

The New War Credit

Ireland.—After more than two months of protests and demands from Cardinal Logue and the Irish Bishops and repeated representations from Cardinal Bourne, from the editor of the Irish Catholic, and from many Catholic bodies, the War Office, which obstinately denied the necessity or feasibility of increasing the number of Catholic chaplains in the army, has at length agreed to appoint "a number of Catholic chaplains at the front which ought to be sufficient for all needs." It is not yet clear that the number to be appointed is adequate or that Irish chaplains will be appointed to Irish regiments and be placed on the fighting line as demanded by the Irish episcopate. The War Office intimates that there is no place for chaplains in the trenches, but the Irish priests who have submitted their names to Cardinal Logue declare that they are ready to go into the trenches or wherever else Catholic soldiers are in danger. The Irish Catholic is not satisfied that the War Office has met the demands in good faith, and declines to recommend recruiting until the position is made clear. The refusal of the War Office to sanction an Irish Army Corps as distinguished from the Carsonist forces, which it approved, and to permit special colors for Irish regiments, together with the sight of the returned remnants of the Irish troops, wounded and disabled, have also discouraged recruiting. The London Times recommends that the Government assist Mr. Redmond's recruiting campaign by suppressing and prosecuting the Irish papers that oppose enlistment. Individuals have been prosecuted for circulating such papers as Irish Freedom and for expressing anti-British and pro-German sympathies. The Irish National League of America has found sentiment here so much at variance with Mr. Redmond's on the recruiting question that it has postponed its annual meeting indefinitely.

Catholic Chaplains and Recruiting

Mexico.—Unhappy Mexico is still in agony. During the week two other factions were spawned and began forthwith to use their tentacles. How long the demon will reign supreme in the land beyond the Rio Grande, it is hard to say. At present Villa is triumphant, and will probably remain so. The Church is faring no better than formerly. Five priests were executed recently, and now that the ranks of bishops, priests and Sisters are well decimated, the attention of the bandits is turned to looting, with renewed vigor. They have raised a laugh throughout the world by declaring that they intend to put the stolen treasures in a national museum. This is almost as clumsy as their numerous indictments of honorable men for the murder of Madero. The press of November 17, that is, the part of it which is not engaged in concealing the truth, announced that Henry Lane Wilson and Francisco de la Barra were indicted for complicity in the crime. This is a pitiable commentary on Carranza. The following statements added to those made last week and the week before will give some idea of the temper of the liberators. The first statement was made before two witnesses; the others were made under oath:

New Wars and New Affidavits

First Affidavit

In the month of May a band of Carranzistas, headed by . . . attacked the property called San Manuel. This ranch belongs to a Spanish priest, Tomas de la Peña y Pereda, who resides in the city of Puebla. He had placed in charge of his property two nephews, of the same name as himself, young men, 23 and 25 years of age respectively; the elder of these was married. The assailants looted the place, seized the young men, and, after telling them that one was to be a mirror for the other, they proceeded to pull forward the tongue of one and to cut it out. The same was done to the other; then they cut off the ears of both and proceeded to gouge out their eyes. After this they placed their victims on a table and, having poured oil over them, set them on fire. The wife of one of the victims was driven mad by witnessing these atrocities. The priest, Peña y Pereda, filed a complaint with the Spanish consul at Puebla, the Spanish Ambassador to Mexico, and also with the authorities of the State of Tlaxacala.

Second Affidavit

She declares that when passing through Iraperato she asked to receive Holy Communion, but was refused because the priest was threatened with death if he should administer the Sacraments. She affirms that she saw in S. Juan del Rio how they made a crucifix fall to the ground by shooting at it; they also took a statue of St. Joseph and feigned they shot it dead. Moreover, she saw the tabernacle of their convent shot at till it was torn to pieces, and the men then took out the ciborium, casting the hosts on the floor. In a place called Santa Rosa, where there was exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, the soldiers shot at the Blessed Sacrament and gave the Sacred Hosts to the horses to eat. . . .

Third Affidavit

She declares, furthermore, that she has seen with her own eyes over 20 Sisters kept in some hospitals, as for instance, . . . who had been violated. . . .

Fourth Affidavit

Lastly, on my way from Aguascalientes to Mexico City, I met seven Sisters, who asked me for a maternity house, and although they tried to conceal the fact of their being religious, I knew them from their manner of speaking. They told me how they escaped from the . . . where the Zapatistas had held them. I made every effort to console them, but they were inconsolable, saying that they were already damned and abandoned by God. . . .

And so this miserable story, given under oath, runs on, and will run on as long as the Editor of AMERICA has authentic matter to publish.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Religious Conditions in the Philippines

THE Catholic priest laboring in the Philippines hears ringing in his ears, and with constantly increasing insistence, the words of Jeremias, "How is the gold become dim, the color is changed, the stones of the sanctuary are scattered." These words are not, indeed, literally true of our Islands, and yet the religious conditions which obtain in them to-day are such that the sad state described by the prophet is looming up as a thing of a not distant future. The magnificent splendor of Catholic worship, that was so marked even at so late a date as the American occupation, is yielding at least in the provinces to a deplorable indifference. "There are none that come to the solemn feast," and in many pueblos the holy sacrifice of the Mass is wholly neglected. This is not true of Manila or of Vigan or of certain other towns; but it is widespread enough to make one realize that the general attitude toward religion of the people of the Philippines is one of growing apathy.

The first and the chief cause of this lamentable state of affairs is the lack of priests. Towns of 40,000 souls such as Laoag, Ilocos Norte, for many years had but one priest, others with from 7,000 to 20,000 souls even now have only one. As a consequence the present generation has grown up almost uninstructed in Catholic doctrine and practice. What has increased the difficulty has been the advanced age of many of the priests which has incapacitated them from almost everything except saying Mass and administering the last sacraments. Confessions and Communions have therefore been extremely rare, and sermons and instructions have been restricted to such occasions as brought together three or four priests. Other towns have been more fortunate in possessing young and active priests. Unfortunately, however, they have not had the training to enable them to cope with the changed conditions arising out of the separation of Church and State, and are unable adequately to deal with the present situation or to safeguard their parishioners against their present dangers. There is a third class of priests who are really grappling with the existing problem. In their flocks there is no evidence of loss of fervor; it must be admitted, however, that they are by no means numerous.

Among the Filipinos there is a second cause at work, which is producing not only religious indifference, but is striking even deeper, and is spreading downright infidelity; it finds its chief promoters in the activity of the American Protestant ministers. Making the large towns their headquarters, they gather round them and indoctrinate with Protestant ideas, and principally with hatred for Catholics, a number of ignorant young men and women; and then send them forth through the smaller towns and distant barrios. Some of the Christian Mission ministers are very violent in their methods. When the people are celebrating their great religious feasts, such as Good Friday, Christmas, and the various town-feasts, the ministers and their emissaries gather in the Plaza and vomit forth calumnious and blasphemous attacks on everything that a Catholic holds dear. The Methodists are operating along quieter lines, but like the others make it their chief endeavor not to implant the principles of the Gospel but to uproot the Catholic faith from the hearts of the people. All alike employ the press as their most powerful instrument of perversion. The provinces are simply inundated with anti-Catholic literature of every kind. During the past year they have added another means of sowing their poison, namely, the cinematograph. The tickets of admission which are distributed free and have to be shown to procure entrance to the entertainments are Bibles and Gospels. In spite of all this, however, after ten years of labor they have had very little success, notably in Ilocos Sur; but it is nothing short of a miracle of God's grace that the Faith should still be so deeply rooted in the hearts of the Filipinos notwithstanding the lack of priests and the activity of American ministers. It needs but a zealous priest to make it burst forth in all the beauty of its former splendor.

Perhaps the greatest factor in the propaganda of indifference and neglect of religion is the public school. In Spanish times there was a public school in every town, the parish priest was its principal, and in it he taught catechism; under the present régime it is forbidden by law to teach religion in the school. As a consequence 400,000 children who, according to the old system, would be receiving during school hours regular and graduated instruction in matters of religion, are now growing up in absolute ignorance of the fundamental doctrines of the Faith. Some of them seem to think that attendance at the public school dispenses them from all Catholic obligations. Witness the answer of a little lad of nine, who was asked by one of the Mill Hill Fathers if he went to Mass on Sunday. "Oh no," he said, "I go to the public school."

In another way, though in direct violation of the express order of the Bureau of Education, the public school is destructive of the Catholic religion. American teachers who are generally non-Catholic, and are frequently without religious beliefs of any kind, make statements in the classroom that are directly opposed to Catholic doctrine. For eight years I have been collecting statements of this kind that have been made in the Vigan High School. Of ten such statements made by a single professor of history last year I give one example. "There is no hell," he said, "we do not know anything of the future life." Not content with asserting this, the teacher proceeded to ask Catholic boys if they believed in hell; and they, either through timidity or through fear of incurring his ill-will, replied that they did not. Even where teachers do not knowingly violate the law, they often, through their ignorance of religious truth, give instruction that is in direct opposition to the tenets of Catholicism. It is obviously impossible to remedy this state of affairs, for even if the bureau should investigate the matter, a simple denial by the teacher is sufficient to offset the charge of the pupil. Timidity, too, will often close the lips of the child. Another phase of the destructive influence of the school system is the respect in which the Filipino is accustomed to hold the teacher. From olden days the Maestro has held second place in the community only to the Padre. His word is law, his example a beacon light. When, therefore, the children see that the Maestro never enters the church, their own sense of the importance of this obligation promptly diminishes. If in addition to this negative influence, the teacher directly throws the weight of his influence against the Catholic faith, the work of evil is completed. This particular aspect of the danger is growing from the fact that the number of Filipino teachers is steadily increasing, and that the Filipino boy or girl who becomes a Protestant is as a rule strongly anti-Catholic.

Certainly the religious future of the Philippines does not look bright, and the priest has much reason to be discouraged. And yet there is hope. When the Church has recovered from the sudden and severe blow it received in the change of government, and has adapted itself to changed conditions, it may flourish as gloriously as it does in the United States. Signs of new life are already making themselves manifest. I instance the towns of San Vicente, Bantay, Narvacan and Santiago, all of the province of Vigan. In the province of Pangasinan, 60,000 confirmations were administered within six weeks by Bishop Hurth, the seminaries are giving the young aspirants to the priesthood special training to fit them for their difficult work, and flourishing catechism classes are being established. Unexpected circumstances have brought about a temporary stagnation in the Church of the Philippines; but history will repeat itself, and let us hope that a zealous clergy, animated by the love of Christ will restore and intensify the glory of the old religion, "ever ancient but ever new."

JOHN THOMPKINS, S.J.
Missionary Priest of Vigan.

The Wise Householder

IT is untrue that social science is a new study, an error which the Church has repeatedly been called upon to refute. Modern social work, as Catholic sociologists are well aware, is only fragmentary, experimental and exceedingly defective compared with the results achieved by the Church in past ages when her activity was unhampered. These facts are of vital consequence, since they determine our entire attitude toward the social and economic sciences of our day.

In its utterances upon the social question the Holy See has, therefore, repeatedly stressed this important point. Pope Leo XIII, whose encyclical upon labor has been the most scientific and adequate social document of modern times, strongly insists upon the same truth. It will suffice, however, to confine ourselves here to the social pronouncements of his successor, Pope Pius X. In his letter addressed to the Archbishops and Bishops of France, dated August 25, 1910, he lays down the following injunction regarding priests who were thenceforth to be set aside and schooled for the direction of Catholic social work:

> Let them grasp thoroughly the fact that the social question and social science were not created yesterday, that from all time Church and State, working together happily, have raised to this end fruitful organizations. The Church, which has never betrayed the well-being of the people by compromising alliances, has no need to cut itself off from the past. It will be enough to take up again, with the help of true workers for social restoration, the organisms broken by the Revolution, and to adapt them to the new situation created by the material evolution of contemporary society in the same Christian spirit which of old inspired them: for the true friends of the people are neither revolutionists nor innovators, but traditionalists.

These words at once indicate the importance and the far-reaching consequences of the Catholic point of view. Social science is as old as the precepts and the teachings of the Gospel.

Upon closer scrutiny the prudent direction of the Holy See will be found in full accord with all the truest conclusions of the sociology even of our day. After more than three centuries of social confusion, brought about by defection from the Church, the world is gradually coming back to what it rejected, the Catholic idea of cooperation and social solidarity. Modern sociologists and economists have hitherto only vaguely grasped this great thought which inspired all the social work of the Church. They have been groping blindly in their labyrinth, for they have lost the thread which would have safely guided them to the light of day. Even now they are more in need of spiritual than of social guides—of that religion of Christ to which the world must return if its social labors are ever to be truly and lastingly effective. Socialism has attracted the minds of thinking men mainly in as far as it has caught something of the primal Catholic social ideal. Unfortunately, it has caught only broken fragments and has led men astray by many a wandering will-o'-the-wisp that beckoned them to their destruction. Apart from Socialism, social science itself has at times been transfigured by a light whose source it did not know. Even the most extreme of all schools, excepting anarchism alone, has based the entire system of syndicalism upon a partial understanding of the Catholic social principle. True its idea of brotherhood is limited to one class of men, while the one bond of all human brotherhood, the Fatherhood of God, is inconsistently rejected. Small wonder that love gives place to hatred! Closest of all to the true idea of the Church are the secular organizations of laborers and employers which still stand aloof from the extremes of radicalism and individualism. Yet even here we are far removed from the ideal solidarity of Christian society preached by the Church.

Catholics, therefore, have the only solution for the social problems. It is their social traditionalism which has now become their glory and their power. This fact, therefore, must be firmly grasped by every one, whether engaged in social work or not. It is our message to the men of our generation, as it will be the Church's message to the men of every future generation as well. The reason is plain. Our fundamental social principles are based solely on the Gospel and on Christianity. We may be able to interpret them more perfectly at one time than at another, we may succeed in applying them more adequately to the social and economic conditions of one age than of another, yet we can never change them. They are the expression of the laws of human nature and of divine faith.

It must not, however, be thought that any obstacle is ever placed by the Church to the complete development of all that is good and true in the social and economic wisdom of any period. The possession of truth aids and does not hamper the most perfect activity of the human intellect. There is no limit to progress in Catholicism. Its restrictions are only guideposts that point out the directest, safest and unfailing way. Where others wander about in confusion, the Catholic, if he will but follow the guidance of his Church, is set at once upon the path that leads to Christ, and therefore to all ultimate truth and perfection. We quote once more from the direction of Pope Pius X to the Catholic episcopate of France:

> No, Venerable Brethren, there is need of declaring with energy, in these days of social and intellectual anarchy, when every man poses as a doctor or a legislator, that the city can not be built except as God has built it, that society can not be constituted unless the Church lays the foundation stone and directs the work. No, there is no new civilization to be invented, no new city to be built in the clouds. The work has been done; it exists. The only need is to restore it without ceasing, and to instal it on its natural and divine foundations, against the perpetually recurring attacks of an unhealthy utopia, of revolt and impiety: to renew all things in Christ.

Here, therefore, is our glorious program of Catholic social traditionalism. It is the living conservatism of essential truth, and not the dead stagnation so often and so gratuitously ascribed to us. To set aside doubt upon this crucial point it is necessary once more to quote at some length from the social pronouncements of the same Pope. We shall use for this purpose his letter addressed to the Bishops of Italy on June 11, 1905. It admirably illustrates the constant progressiveness of Catholicism and its adaptability to all times and all circumstances. Yet it no less clearly affirms anew the immutability of all essential Catholic principles, unchangeable only because they are based upon truth and the will of God. He thus writes:

> And here it must at once be observed that it is impossible at the present day to reestablish in the same form all the institutions which may have been useful, and were even the only efficient ones in past centuries, so numerous are the radical modifications which time has brought to society and life, and so many are the fresh needs which changing circumstances cease not to call forth. But the Church throughout her long history, has always and on every occasion luminously shown that she possesses a wonderful power of adaptation to the varying conditions of civil society; without injury to the integrity or immutability of faith or morals. Always safeguarding her sacred rights, she easily bends and adapts herself in all that is contingent and accidental, to the vicissitudes of time and the fresh needs of society. . . . Catholic action, while suitably varying its outward forms and methods, remains ever the same in the principles which guide it and in the very noble end at which it aims.

Here surely there is ample latitude for the Catholic social worker. Two things only are required of him. The first is a thorough understanding of the true Catholic social work of the past and the determination never to deviate from the spirit which animated it. The second is the proper adaptation of Catholic principles to actual social needs. For this purpose, as the Holy Father writes: "Catholic action ought also to be invigorated by all the practical methods furnished at the present day, by progress in social and economic studies, by experience already gained elsewhere, by the condition of civil society, and even by the public life of State." Such, therefore, is the vital, progressive social traditionalism of the Catholic Church. It is in brief, nothing else than sound reason and the best experiences of past centuries wisely applied, for the love of God and in the light of Faith, to the ever-changing social problems of our age. Thus the Church, like the householder of the Gospel, ever bringeth forth from her treasury "things new and old."

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

The Young Man and Building*

THE building business offers a good opportunity for the young man of the right calibre, but to be successful he must be properly trained, either by a course in a good technical school, or by work for a few years in an architect's office where he can acquire a thorough knowledge of plans and details. This should be supplemented by a course with some good building firm, where he can have a chance to acquaint himself thoroughly with the structural part of the work. This is the most important part of his training, for it takes some years of experience to fit him for a position where he will be responsible for the erection of a building.

The tendency of to-day in this country is toward specialization in all the various sub-divisions of a work, and this creates a number of opportunities for young men to equip themselves to take charge of these departments. Putting up a building at the present time means dividing the work among sixteen or eighteen kinds of artisans, namely: stonemasons, bricklayers, concrete-workers, carpenters, painters, plumbers, metal-workers, structural steelworkers, ornamental iron-workers, stair-builders, electricians, steamfitters, marble-workers, mosaic-workers, etc., and there are opportunities in each of these for young men who are willing to work.

*The twenty-first of a series of vocational articles.

The young man who expects to succeed in reaching a position where he can take charge of a building must have a fairly good knowledge of all the sub-divisions, but he should be especially strong in those that have to do with the structural features of the building. Many of the accidents occurring nowadays, owing to the collapse of partly-erected buildings, are due to the incompetency of the person in charge of the work. It is absolutely necessary that the responsible overseer should be able to detect any weakness of construction in the plans, so that he can call attention to it before the work is installed and have the defect remedied. In order to do this he should know enough about engineering to be familiar with the strains of the various kinds of material that are used in putting up a building.

The writer believes that the best way for a young man to fit himself for any business is to enter it early and grow up in it. No amount of schooling or technical training can take the place of actual experience in the industry itself, though both are necessary. The public schools of this country have spent a great deal of money in their manual training and mechanic arts schools with a view of directing boys toward some of the mechanical pursuits, but if the results elsewhere have been like those experienced in Boston, the outlay has not been warranted. A former president of one of our best technical colleges said that he would rather have the graduates from the regular high schools than from the vocational schools, for the shop training the young men received was of no special value and could not make up for the loss of the academic studies.

The Mechanic Arts School of Boston thus far has been unsuccessful in directing its graduates toward the building trades, though this year the curriculum has been so changed that now efforts will be made to direct boys toward some of the mechanical pursuits. Few of the graduates from that school of late years were found entering the building trades. Instead, they sought employment driving teams, running elevators or clerking in stores, though in such occupations the chance of advancement is very meagre, the wages low and the working hours long. In these respects the trades offer much better opportunities and if boys who have to go to work after leaving high school would only learn a trade, they would certainly be better off.

After mastering their chosen calling they would receive wages double what they now get in stores. True, they would have to don a suit of overalls, but if they are ambitious there are ample opportunities of attending evening schools and fitting themselves for advanced positions in the building business, such as clerk of works, inspector of buildings, foreman and superintendent of construction. There is no set of men in the country more independent than our mechanics, for they are not at the beck and call of any special employer; they can enter any city with a confident assurance of finding work; and there is always an opportunity for the ambitious young man with a small amount of capital to start in business for himself.

The American boy has lost many good chances in the past because of his reluctance to put on a jumper and soil his hands. Consequently we have had to depend to a large extent on immigration to supply our needs in the building business. The young man who wants to be successful in business must be willing to begin at the bottom of the ladder, to take the rough with the smooth, mix with the workmen and do his share of the hard part of the labor. In this way he will win the respect of the men and will learn how to handle them when he attains a position of responsibility.

Hardly a week passes in which the writer is not asked to find work for young men who have not been trained along any special lines. Consequently it is very difficult to help them. Too many of them are looking for "soft snaps" and are wanting in ambition. They depend too much on others for help. The young man who has confidence in himself, and is really prepared to work, usually succeeds in life.

After graduating from the grammar school it would be better for many boys if they went to work and learned a trade. At the end of four years they would have acquired knowledge which would better assist them in fighting life's battle than would four years spent in the high school. When boys leave the grammar school they are willing to work for small wages, but after graduation from a high school they will not accept a low salary. Consequently it is hard for them to secure good places. A capable lad should not, of course, be deprived of a chance to get a good education, but in many cases it would have been better had lads gone to work instead of entering the high school. The "little learning" that they receive there often proves a great danger. Far too many callow graduates of our secondary schools are characterized by this scorn of manual labor and their inability to do anything else. As a result they begin to loaf around street corners, drift into bad company, and at last give up any idea of earning an honest living. The present efforts of the authorities to establish industrial schools, however, will doubtless help to remedy these evils.

CHARLES LOGUE,
Charles Logue Building Co., Boston, Mass.

Why Are Graves Untended?

CATHOLIC graveyards are a by-word for neglect. Not that all Catholics are neglectful. Many of our graves give evidence of the most loving care. And yet somehow or other weeds are prolific in the holy ground where we lay away our dear dead. The stranger who makes his way to the silent city of those who once have lived but live no more, has no need to ask where is our burial ground. He can tell at once to whom it belongs by the unhinged wicker gate and the overgrown grass upon the mounds. The convert who sees this is apt to be scandalized. Why consecrated ground should be neglected, why God's own acre should be allowed to run wild, why our graves should be untended, is something he can not understand. To him from his earliest youth trim, bluestone walks and smooth, velvet lawns have always been inseparable from the idea of the last resting place of the deceased. He has always been proud to show his visitors the Protestant graveyard, but he blushes for the graveyard of his Catholic friends. In large and wealthy communities it is not always so, and even among the poor the reverse is often true; but it is unfortunately common enough to have become a more or less prevalent disgrace to us all. And what is still more astonishing is the fact that a deeper participation in the Church's spirit seems to bring with it a more pronounced carelessness as to what becomes of our own poor bodies after death, and a constantly lessening insistence on the freshness of the flowers and the greenness of the grass and the luxuriance of the ivy that cover the remains of those we love. On the other hand, the further men are from sympathy with the Church, the greater the number of wreaths they place upon the coffin and the higher the monuments they rear to the memory of their departed friends.

Human weakness no doubt has its share in the explanation. We are wrong not to show sufficient reverence for the place which shelters the mouldering remains of what was once the temple of the Holy Ghost and the living repository of the Blessed Sacrament. Ties of filial affection should make us more solicitous about the little plot to which even dumb nature is so kind. And yet this is not the principal reason for our carelessness. Our lack of decent thoughtfulness has its root like many another fault in the excess of a supernatural virtue. It springs, strange though it may seem, from the very vividness of our faith. We are so much concerned with the needs of the soul that we are apt to be unmindful of the condition of the body. We believe so firmly in the permanence of the principle of the higher life that we are somewhat wanting in respect for its partner in the lower life. We are so anxious about our loved ones' passage from Purgatory to Heaven that we forget the once red heart that is crumbling into dust. Up from the flames we hear them calling for Masses to propitiate offended Justice, and so we fail to plant the roses that will please the human eye. And the consequence? Men say we have ceased to love when we are giving the best proof of love. The carping world blames us as heartless, when we know that our dead care little for the flowers that grow upon the grave.

Does it not seem, therefore, that if our graves are at times untended, it is partly at least, because we are Catholics that it is so? Is there not something inherent in our Faith that renders us less sensible to nature's elemental cry that we should make our graveyards things of beauty? Is it not because we are unlike the heathen who have no hope, that we do not feel the need of keeping fresh the bitterness of parting by lingering near the spot where our loved ones sleep? Our vision of the supernatural and the mansions in our father's home teach us to lift our eyes from the whitening bones to the ecstatic soul. Death and the grave to us are no hateful, fearful repellent things that are to be softened at any cost. They are familiar thoughts to every Catholic mind. Little our dear ones reck of the rain and the snow; they are willing to submit to the sentence that has fallen on all mortal men; it is a small thing to bear, in the light of the promise that they shall rise again. The process of putting off this corruptible flesh is not an attractive one, but it loses much of its horror even for us who are left in the realization that the beloved forms which we surrounded with such affection are one day to put on incorruptibility and immortality, and to look into the face of the unseen God. If we thought that the grave was the end of it all, things would be vastly different. We are blameworthy, to be sure, if our graves are untended, but it is not indifference that is wholly responsible. Faith, vivid, living faith, also lies at the root of our too common neglect.

There is little consolation, however, in this thought. No matter what may be the origin of our neglect it does not cease to be a fault. Bigotry, too, takes its rise from faith, and yet bigotry is a detestable thing. The remissness we manifest in the matter of our departed relatives and friends is to be deplored, the more so as it takes on something of the nature of a scandal, and is a reproach to our Catholic faith. Prayer for them is indeed the best testimony we can give them of our undying love, but prayer is not enough; we should also tend to their graves. If we love them truly we should do not merely one or the other, we should care for them both.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Awakening of Faith in France

II

THE Paris correspondent of the London Times in affirming that "one result of the war has been a distinct religious revival in France" adds, "the so-called clerical peril has disappeared from the popular imagination in face of the real peril of the German invasion." To the facts which I have already recounted of the volte face, these others must be added.

An official order issued from the headquarters of the French army has acknowledged the bravery and devotion to duty of Sister Julie and her assistants, who, when the Germans shelled Gerbévilier, did not take refuge in the cellars as did the other inhabitants of the place, but went up and down the streets gathering in the wounded. When the Prussian officer ordered her to leave, she refused and answered, "Mother Superior has put me here, and until she bids me go, I shall remain." And stay she did with her companions, all through the bombardment. She belongs to the Congregation of St. Charles. Not only has the army praised her in its report, but the Government has sent M. Mirman, Prefect of the Meurthe-Moselle Department, to thank her and her Sisters, in the name of France, for their heroism.

If the parish-priest of Niort was agreeably surprised when he was invited to bless the sabres of the hussars, what must have been the joy and wonder of the curé of Laigle (Orne) when at three o'clock one morning, he was roused from sleep by the clamorous ringing of his door-bell. He opened his bedroom window, and peered down into the garden below. "What is it, a sick call?" he demanded. "No," came the astounding answer, "perhaps Monsieur le curé doesn't know that I am a priest, and that I should be very much pleased if he will allow me to say Mass in the church." "Tiens! I'll be down in a minute." When the door was opened, and a light lit, the astonished curé saw a colonel. Behind him on the road was his regiment. "And as he gazed his wonder grew," for immediately the colonel told him that he had heard the confessions of two hundred and fifty of his regiment, and that was why he wanted to say Mass, as they all wished to receive Holy Communion. The church was quickly opened, the soldiers marched in, and the colonel-priest celebrated Mass. Along a road red with the dawn they marched shortly afterwards to a field redder with blood. The Lord Jesus they saw not when they took Him at the sanctuary rail, led many through the shadowy way of death unto the City, the light whereof is the Lamb, and the joy His blessed face.

Everywhere as the soldier-clerics arrive to take their place in the ranks they are cheered, Jesuits, Dominicans, Benedictines, abbés, curés, seminarians and novices; they come literally from the four corners of the earth whither they had been banished. It is queer that the enemies of France in times of peace should be welcomed back in time of war. And droll it is to see so many monks with guns in their hands. If writers of Protestant fiction against the priests were permitted to go to the field of the Aisne, they could gather excellent material for their pens. Truth once more would be stranger than fiction. So moving is the sight that the arch-enemy of the religious, Clemenceau, exclaims: "What a surprise it will be to the Germans to see in our army the very monks we drove from the country."

That these churchmen are as good soldiers as they are priests is testified to by all. Abbé Luchat, a sergeant in the bicycle corps, was killed on the field of battle after having been mentioned in dispatches of the previous day for conspicuous gallantry in action. Abbé Monbru and Abbé Grenier, both of them lieutenants, were killed leading their men in a charge. The Journal Officiel has this to say of one of these soldier priests:

> Abbé Buscoz, adjutant of the 97th Infantry, has died a hero. He had just been made a second lieutenant on the field of battle for two acts of bravery. His last hours were admirable. He leaped forward at the head of his men, crying, "I am a priest. I fear not death. En avant!"

A soldier was overheard saying to a comrade in the trenches:

> I never did like those curés; a good-for-nothing lot I thought them. But, hang it all, I did them a wrong to so ill-judge them. I've seen the stuff they're made of. They fight as well as the best of us; are ready for the posts of greatest danger; are eager to go on when we're for quitting.

At the barracks of Orleans an officer gave up to one of his soldier-priests his own private room to be used by the latter for a chapel. Although the troopers get up at five, and have to drill until ten, before they are free, still they fast until that late hour in order to be able to go to Holy Communion. Many are the first Communions, some of the recipients being over thirty years of age. During the day the troopers make visits to the Blessed Sacrament reserved in the room.

In a restaurant some artists were gathered. They were giving a farewell supper to one of their profession, off to the war. His regiment would be one of the first to face the Germans. He was serene, not noisily gay as was his wont. His chums chaffed him over his calmness, which they thought came from dwelling on the certainty of being killed. They misjudged the cause of his subdued demeanor. "No, it isn't that," he told them; "it's because I've been to confession, Mass and Communion this morning." Not a jeer, not even a look of raillery came from those men who had mocked at anything that touched religion.

A dashing dragoon, on the gayest and fairest boulevard of Paris will stop, with a splendid salute, a chance-found priest and say: "M'sieur l'abbé, I'd like to make my confession to you." "Eh bien, mon brave, let's go to the church." The cavalryman hasn't time. There and then as they walk along, the sins of many years are told, and the absolution given. They reach a corner and are parting. "Will M'sieur l'abbé give me a medal?" The medal was given. A week later the papers told of a dragoon, in whose dead hands a medal of the Blessed Virgin was found.

Many another incident of the awakened Faith of France is told. All are consoling. Let us pray that the grace which has revived the practices of the Catholic religion will ever be cooperated with, so that the dawn of the now will wax to the full and shining day of the future. The Faith suffered much since the war of 1870. Only God knows now if victory will make good the prophetic words of Pius X, written when he beatified the Curé d'Ars, "I beg of you to be convinced with me, that God will soon work wonders to show you that France is still the eldest daughter of the Church, and you will have the joy of seeing this in word and in work."

TERENCE KING, S.J.

Evodia and Syntyche

JUST why Evodia did not get on with Syntyche we have no means of knowing. That the two ladies did not agree very well, however, is shown by a passage in St. Paul's letter to the Christians of Philippi. For he breaks the thread of his closing exhortation to say: "I beg of Evodia and I beseech Syntyche to be of one mind in the Lord." Their lack of harmony seems to have caused the Apostle deep concern since he also entreats his "sincere companion" who was, as some maintain, the bishop of the city, to "help those women." Perhaps the breach between them had grown so serious that without episcopal intervention there was little hope of healing it. Yet the two who had fallen out, if we may dally with pious conjecture, were very zealous and devoted women. They had "labored . . . in the Gospel" with St. Paul, St. Clement and the other pillars of the Philippian church "whose names are in the book of life." The quarrel may have arisen from a difference of opinion regarding the most effective way of instructing the women neophytes of the city; Syntyche's convert class perhaps was a little larger and brighter than Evodia's; the former's personality was not quite so winning and attractive as her fellow-worker's; or Syntyche may have been more highly connected than Evodia.

Whatever the immediate cause of these estimable ladies' estrangement, the root of the trouble doubtless lay in that common human propensity of expecting too much of our fellow-men. Evodia perhaps was annoyed to find that Syntyche, who should have been, of course, a perfect saint, had several glaring defects of character, while Syntyche was equally pained to observe that Evodia, though a disciple of St. Paul, was by no means free from a number of shortcomings inherited from Mother Eve. Each lady's many shining virtues were washed in Lethe by the other and forgotten. Her faults alone were noted and remembered.

One fell day the crisis came. A practical difficulty regarding a certain neophyte in whom Evodia was particularly interested, Syntyche, without consulting any one, promptly settled. With Apostolic freedom Evodia then told Syntyche how very characteristic of the latter the solution was. Thereupon Syntyche meekly observed that Evodia had made a worse blunder two weeks before. A sharp retort followed. Then came a long silence during which Charity, wounded and weeping, retired from the gathering.

Even the least patient of us endure with smiling fortitude the absence in ourselves of those numerous virtues that our friends should, of course, possess, but are perverse enough to be without, and in this, Evodia and Syntyche, early Christians though they were, no doubt were very like us indeed. Instead of taking men as they are and joyfully discerning the virtues they have, the Evodias and Syntyches of every generation are inclined to note, less in sorrow than in anger, only the glaring defects ii the character of their fellow-Christians.

"What a pity this rosebush has so many thorns!" a pessimist wailed with a melancholy wag of his head. "But see all the lovely blossoms it has!" rejoined a bright-souled optimist. That little dialogue has an obvious lesson for Evodias and Syntyches. The donkey, sages say, has never forgiven the rosebush for not producing thistles. That useful animal's love for thistles was no doubt a master passion. He believed that there is no plant on earth more valuable than the carduus lanceolatus. A constant diet of thistles, he would maintain, sweetens the temper, soothes the conscience, sharpens the wits, improves the digestion and hightens one's beauty, while the "ethical value" of even the mere sight of the herb is too plain to require demonstration. Therefore he would have thistles growing everywhere. Why should useless roses be allowed to cumber the ground?

It is quite certain, however, that both Evodia and Syntyche would object with vigor to that line of argument, flatly deny the donkey's assertions, remind him that his initial blunder lay in expecting the rosebush to produce thistles and end by proclaiming loudly that one single rosebush is more useful to mankind than is a whole wilderness of thistles. Yet before an hour had passed, each of these amiable ladies would perhaps be indignantly complaining of the other's lack of this virtue or that. In other words she would be grieved and angry because thistles, as a rule, do not grow on rosebushes, or because roses, generally speaking, should not be sought for on thistle plants.

That hunger for perfection which is in the human heart is most effectively and profitably sated by directing the attention to one's own deficiencies. It is in great danger of becoming a disease of the soul if a man, neglecting himself, inconsiderately demands perfection in others. How much we read and hear nowadays about spots in the sun! Whatever bad influence they may have on our planet, it is trifling enough compared with the blessings we constantly enjoy from the sun's light and heat. A serene disregard of the little burrs and briars of this work-a-day world contributes wonderfully to the joy of living. In this connection the answer made to the sensitive cat by the genial elephant who had seated himself in an onion bed is full of practical wisdom. The odor of crushed leeks was a great annoyance, it seems, to the grimalkin, who was fond of sleeping in the sunny vegetable patch. "Doesn't the strong aroma of the onions you are sitting on go to your head?" he asked the ample, care-free elephant. "No, indeed!" was the prompt reply:

> Will you kindly observe where my nose is?
> How can I feel sad,
> When my trunk is made glad
> In the neighboring garden of roses?

What a valuable counsel, this, for the Evodias and Syntyches of our day! Instead of growing impatient with a friend's little faults and shortcomings, imitate the high example of the sapient elephant in the fable. Discover and admire the virtues of others which are no doubt at least as numerous as their defects. Keep the mind fixed on the fragrance of the roses, and then the odor of the onions will not be annoying.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

The Violation of Belgian Neutrality

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me, in the interests of truth, a few observations on a statement that appears in your issue of October 17, under the heading, "A German View of the War." I quote:

> In regard to the violation of Belgium's neutrality by Germany, it is now admitted, even by Dutch and Italian papers, that Belgium had a secret understanding with France to permit her to pass unhindered through her territory in order to invade the unprotected Rhineland.

It strikes me that the alleged admissions of Dutch and Italian newspapers in a matter so far removed from their ken are of singularly little value. Happily we can draw upon more authentic sources of information. From the English "White Book" we learn that the following note was addressed both to France and Germany by the British Foreign Secretary on July 31:

> It becomes essential to His Majesty's Government, in view of existing treaties, to ask whether the French (German) Government is prepared to engage to respect neutrality of Belgium so long as no other Power violates it.

This drew from the French Government the following reply:

> The French Government is resolved to respect the neutrality of Belgium, and it would be only in the event of some other Power violating that neutrality that France might find herself under the necessity, in order to ensure defence of her own security, to act otherwise. This assurance has been given several times. The President of the Republic spoke of it to the King of the Belgians, and the French Minister at Brussels has spontaneously renewed the assurance to the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs to-day (i.e. July 31).

Then we have the following declaration regarding Belgium's own attitude in a telegram from Sir F. Villiers to Sir Edward Grey under the date of August 1:

> Belgium expects and desires that other Powers will observe and uphold her neutrality, which she intends to maintain to the utmost of her power.

On the other hand, here is the reply of Germany to Sir Edward Grey's question. It is contained in a telegram from the British ambassador at Berlin:

> I have seen Secretary of State, who informs me that he must consult the Emperor and the Chancellor before he could possibly answer. I gathered from what he said that he thought any reply they might give could not but disclose a certain amount of their plan of campaign in the event of war ensuing, and he was therefore very doubtful whether they would return any answer at all.

As a matter of fact, Germany's answer took the shape of an ultimatum to Belgium. From this it appears that she was the aggressor, and had deliberately planned beforehand to do the very thing she had bound herself by treaty not to do. France, on the contrary, was simply preparing to act in self-defence, and so at once gave Britain the sought-for assurance that she would respect Belgian neutrality. In fact, France, as much the weaker power, would have more than enough to do to defend herself. Germany knew this. Hence she was quite ready to pledge herself to respect the neutrality of Belgium provided Great Britain undertook to remain neutral. "He (the German Ambassador at London) asked me," writes Sir Edward Grey to Sir Edward Goschen under date of August 1, "whether, if Germany gave a promise not to violate Belgian neutrality, we would engage to remain neutral." This means that Germany was prepared to play fast and loose with her treaty obligations: she would put her bond on the market and get a price for the keeping of it. The "scrap of paper" would have been of some value, could she but have purchased with it Great Britain's neutrality. But how is one to reconcile her willingness to give such a promise to Great Britain with the idea that she knew of the alleged secret understanding between Belgium and France? The fact that she was willing shows she had no serious reason to fear that a French force would pass through Belgium to attack her. In any case, she should have appealed to Great Britain, as one of the guarantors of Belgium's neutrality, if she had proof that France meant to strike at her through that country.

A writer in the Sun, whose article has been copied into the Freeman's Journal, tries to find a justification of Germany's violation of Belgian neutrality in certain words of Mr. Gladstone, spoken in 1870, and quoted by Sir Edward Grey in the British House of Commons last August. Gladstone was considering, on that occasion, a totally different thing, to wit, whether Great Britain would be bound by the strict letter of the treaty, as one of the guarantors of Belgian neutrality, to take up arms against any Power that should violate it. What he thought of that violation in itself is plain from those other words of his that are quoted by Sir Edward in the same speech:

> We have an interest in the independence of Belgium which is wider than that which we may have in the literal operation of the guarantee. It is found in the answer to the question whether, under the circumstances of the case, this country, endowed as it is with influence and power, would quietly stand by and witness the perpetration of the direst crime that ever stained the pages of history, and thus become participators in the sin.

When the time came, Britain did not quietly stand by.

✠ ALEXANDER MACDONALD,
Bishop of Victoria.

A Pro-German "Reptile"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a Catholic journal no one can deny the excellence of AMERICA, but when it seems to have entered the ranks of the "Reptile Press," which Bismarck founded and subsidized, people may be permitted to point out wherein it violates the rule of freedom from partisanship.

In a recent issue you praised the act of the German Emperor's family for visiting the wounded soldiers, but you forgot to say in that and in every other issue that it was the bloodthirsty ambition of the German Emperor, and his ruthless outrage on the Belgian people, which filled the hospitals and that unhappy land of inoffensive Catholics with victims of his war lust. Louvain, once the shelter of Catholic students for the priesthood evidently does not count for anything in the estimate of your notoriously pro-German writer of your review of foreign affairs. Louvain was the shelter of Irish students, therefore your German leanings and sympathies pass Louvain over, for you never had any lodgment in your columns for anything Irish except for such as Cardinal Logue and the Dublin Castle prelates who were never Home Rulers, but very much the reverse. Another specimen of your pro-German leanings is the way you point out how kindly the Germans treated the Irish soldiers who were prisoners. Is this wonderful? But what of the tens of thousands of desolate homes in Belgium and France and the violated women and children with breasts and hands cut off by German savages? Not one word from your journal in denunciation; nor a word condemnatory of the riding rough-shod over the land and homes of the Belgian people who had offended no one. It must have rejoiced your pro-German heart when you read of the German troops entering Catholic Antwerp, singing Luther's hymn, "A Mighty Fortress is Our God," as also it must have been a happiness to your German editorial staff when they read of the destruction of the Cathedral of Reims.

In this British country, where freedom obtains for all creeds and perfect equality prevails, we hope for the destruction of the military system of Germany and the reign of the common people, and regret to see signs, even in your hitherto admirable journal, that the German fund which is being used to prostitute the press of America has not been used in vain.

Again your reference to Prince Battenberg as a high type of a British admiral, who was dispensed with to please the anti-German sentiment of England, rather points to your desire that England should have continued to have her fleet under the charge of a German with all the dangers which his retention conveys. Altogether AMERICA has become too Germanic for many of your readers in free British Canada, and the wonder is, how has this come about.

Toronto. PETER RYAN.

The Italians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I claim to know something of the religious conditions of the Italians in America, having worked for six years among them in Chicago, Denver, Vancouver, B. C., and other places, and I feel bound to say for the honor of the truth and the Catholic Church, that I did not find a hundred such boys and girls coming from Italy without having been properly instructed or having made their first Communion. What about the imputation that their "religious deterioration must be attributed to the fact that they come to this country insufficiently instructed in their faith"? I willingly grant it provided I be permitted to add an explanaton. While the knowledge of the average Italian in religious matters is not sufficient for the life that awaits him here, that same knowledge was amply sufficient, and reasonably thought to be so, for the mode of life he was expected to lead in Italy. Religious needs in America are quite different from those in Italy. But can any one blame the clergy in Italy, as Mr. Hadley's article seems to insinuate, for not teaching their flocks truths whose necessity is felt here and not there, for not forewarning their parishioners of dangers and surroundings about which they themselves can not be expected to know anything? The duty of the parish priest is limited to his parish, and if he sees that his parishoners are practical Catholics while there, he can be satisfied, Mr. Hadley's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

I know from experience that they do not leave their native places without first going to the Sacraments; at least that is true of the Sicilians in Chicago and the Neapolitans in the West. I remember that last year on my way to the Yukon, I met a group of Padovani on the steamer Prince Rupert. They showed me with pride their rosaries and related to me with glowing vivacity their devotional experiences at the Shrine of St. Anthony, whither they had gone in pilgrimage before leaving for America. Alas, my heart ached at the thought that their simple and beautiful faith would probably soon succumb to the necessities of their new life, but it did not occur to my mind to blame their beloved pastors for it, far away. No, the bulk of Italian immigrants are good and practical Catholics when they come here. Their faith is not dropped in the Bay of Naples, but it is silenced and choked in the whirlwind of their adventurous life in this country. It is here that their inexplicable irreligion, with its evil forms of Socialism and indifferentism asserts itself, particularly among the American-born Italians; but to find out the causes of this lamentable phenomenon it is perfectly useless for Mr. Hadley to mount his telescope of zealous patriotism to spy them out beyond the Atlantic, for it is easy for any one to see them at home with naked eye.

Vancouver, B. C. LUIGI M. GIAMBASTIANI, O.S.M.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am among those who, although not of the Italian race, for the sake of our religion and because of our devotion to the Holy See, would wish to find an explanation of the laxity of our Italian immigrants in their religious life in this country other than the one that naturally suggests itself in the well-known line of Horace: "Who cross the seas change the skies but not themselves." Surely if the Italians are good Catholics at home they ought at least to be fairly good Catholics here. But there is no gainsaying the fact that they are not. Mr. Herbert Hadley voices the mature judgment of all the priests and bishops I have talked with on the subject during the past thirty odd years of my priesthood, which covers the time of the great Italian immigration. Many of the priests, too, are men of their own race, and one of them, if it were prudent to mention names, a man whose experience and years of unselfish service entitle him to be listened to with attention. He may have been in a particularly pessimistic mood when I heard him declare, as he reviewed his long years of labor among his compatriots: It is hopeless! Ab uno disce omnes. This Sunday morning, a slight rain was falling; I met my neighbor, il Parroco, coming from his chapel, which is in the heart of an Italian colony of three or four thousand, and I asked him how many were at his two Masses. He threw up his hands and said, about forty all told, men, women and children.

A few years ago it was my privilege to sojourn about three months in Italy, the greater part of which I passed in Naples. I spent most of my Sunday mornings after early Mass and breakfast in walking about the city and dropping into the churches as I met them. Masses innumerable were going on at high altar and side altar in churches and chapels, but there was no such outpouring of worshipers as one would expect to find in a great Catholic city. I did not see at any Sunday Mass in any church outside the duomo what we would call a fair-sized congregation. We saw only scattered groups here and there around the various altars, and the conviction was inevitably borne in on the mind that the great bulk of the people did not go to Mass. Nor, furthermore, did I hear a sermon or instruction at any of these Masses; nor did I find a single class of children receiving instruction.

In due time I went from Italy to Lucern, where I arrived early on Sunday morning. After my Mass I noticed a double line of boys, a hundred or more, with prefects or teachers, come in and take their places reverently in the old-fashioned pews, in which, perforce, one was obliged to kneel upright. During the Missa Cantata that followed, each boy with his prayerbook heard Mass devoutly, and all knelt during the Gloria and Credo, I remember distinctly, and I believe during the whole Mass. At the Gospel a priest gave an earnest instruction of about fifteen minutes. Father Sorrentino can show, doubtless, if he cares to, how defective my logic is; but let me remark, where Catholic faith is alive, its evidences are manifest even to the superficial traveler.

OBSERVER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Answers to the objections against Italians have been made in the public press on former occasions, and the fact has been pointed out, that certain prejudices are very pernicious to the preservation of the Faith and of good principles in our people. From my seventeen years' experience in America I am convinced that, if there be any truth in this affair, the fault is more grievous in those who have overlooked their duty than in the people themselves. For had the door of benevolence, charity and cordiality been thrown open to the first immigrants, with very few exceptions, they would have flocked to the churches for divine services to find solace in prayer during those days of bitter grief due to sad separations from the loved ones across the sea. But only too often the poor Italian was driven away even from the door of the church. People despised him for two reasons: he had no money to dispose of, and they looked on him as excommunicated because he kept the Pope a prisoner. The anti-clericals profited by this occasion to discredit the Church. Had Mr. Hadley considered the trying circumstances in which the Italian immigrant was placed, he would have praised highly the progress made since the God-sent Italian missions undertook the work. Is it merely with a very low percentage of those who go to church that there are to-day thirty-eight Italian parishes in New York City alone? I would divide the Italians into three classes: those who go to American churches, those who go to Italian churches, and those who do not go to any church at all. I speak of the immigrants and of those born here. Almost all of the latter, being able to speak English, prefer to frequent an American church. The Italian churches, however, are well attended on Sundays, especially where the priest labors disinterestedly and zealously. Among those who do not go to church we must include not only the wilfully negligent, but also those who, for some reason or other, are free from the obligation of hearing Mass on Sundays.

In my parish there are about 20,000 Italians. On feast days we have seven and sometimes nine Masses. They are so well attended that I can count about 8,000 who come to Mass every Sunday. You must also take into account the children who are not obliged to hear Mass, the sick, the infirm and the aged and those who go to a French church and to the neighboring American churches, and then see whether a low or a high percentage goes to Mass. In this parish there are six flourishing sodalities with a total membership of 1,550 persons. There is besides the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine which counts at least sixty-five members who teach catechism to 1,300 children from 2 to 3 p. m. These children, moreover, come every Sunday at 9.30 for their Mass. The number of first communions every year is about 575; the number of confirmations is 500. We are five priests, four of whom hear confessions every Saturday from 4 to 6, and from 7.30 to 10 and often till 11 p. m. The yearly communions are about 35,000. What I have said about my parish (Our Lady of Pompeii, New York) can be said of many other missions of which I am the Provincial Superior.

New York. A. DEMO, C.S.C.B.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York. President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

A Defence and an Answer

MEXICAN rebels, not content with the rape of women, torture and murder of priests, unspeakable desecration of the Blessed Sacrament, churches, altars, chalices; not satisfied with blasphemies against God and His Saints, have come to our country to spread calumnies broadcast through the land and to stir up strife among peaceful citizens. The "Liberators" are among us. They have come from out their own blackened and charred land, whining like hungry dogs in search of other bones to pick clean. They have left behind them innumerable corpses rotting on the plains, bodies of the victims of a demoniacal hate masquerading under the banner of liberty and equality. And if they would stop their calumnies and listen for a minute, they would hear the wails of heart-broken women and little girls, ay, of Sisters—victims of a lust of which a wanton beast or a Mexican rebel alone is capable. These men have shattered Mexico from top to bottom, have rent it into a thousand mangled, bleeding parts, have deluged it with blood, have stamped it with the mark of savagery, have sent it down in misery and despair to the very jaws of hell. And now their agents are with us, set down in our cities, to expose their vile souls to our gaze. They fill our mails with calumnies against the Church; our press with blatant rhetoric, expressive of stereotyped untruths, the property of every tyrant from Nero to Carranza.

There was never an evil in Mexico, that priests did not cause. They fostered Iturbide and Santa Anna and Maximilian; they destroyed Madero; they bribed the army; they sustained Huerta; they armed men against Carranza; they did all things that the devil does. The rebels on the other hand, the Carranzistas especially, are sweet, meek, dark, dreamy-eyed, swarthy little "dears," with arched brows and shining teeth and scented breath and waxed moustaches and polished finger-nails and slender hands and feet—cunning, dimpled chaps who bathe night and morning with the aid of a valet and for years sat clad in bath-robes, sighing for protection from sly bishops and "husky" priests, six feet four, and strenuous abbesses and bouncing mother superiors who were importing arms and mounting cannons and shooting guns and directing Zeppelins and sapping and mining to slay poor, weak, puny Don Carranza, huddled in a corner of a Morris chair and half dead from fright for fear a militant abbess might catch him by the scruff of his precious neck and steal him away.

By the favor of hell, however, the sly bishops and the robust priests and strenuous abbesses and bouncing mother superiors were conquered by the scented rebels, gentle creatures who eat out of my lady's hand.

Have you not heard how the victory was won? This way: (1) By outraging nuns. (2) By forcing nuns to live a life of shame in camps. (3) By compelling nuns to accompany soldiers on forced marches. (4) By torturing priests in a fashion worthy of savage Iroquois. (5) By murdering priests and brothers. (6) By desecrating churches. (7) By defiling altars as only a brute or a Mexican rebel could do. (8) By putting chalices to purposes which even brutes scorn. (9) By dressing prostitutes in sacred vestments. (10) By throwing the Blessed Sacrament on the floor in one instance and by mixing it with the horses' food in another. In all these ways, and in others equally vile, contemptible, brutish, did the rebels conquer. A splendid victory that—almost as inspiring as the one they hope to win by calumnies sent out from New York and Washington. Never again will shrewd bishops and athletic priests, and foxy abbesses and plotting mother superiors dare to fire a cannon, or shoot a gun at Don Carranza, the high priest of liberty, fraternity, equality and calumniating news bureaus.

Our Alleged "Rush"

The genial Irish novelist, who visited this country some time ago, on reaching home again, promptly wrote, as was to be expected, a book of "American impressions." He devotes an entire chapter of the volume to discrediting the so-called "hustling legend" about the United States, and maintains that though we may appear to a careless observer to be always in an unconscionable hurry, in reality the average American citizen is a man of ample leisure. A "hustler," in Canon Hannay's opinion, is a cruel name to call a person, for "the word suggests a disagreeable kind of spurious activity. The hustler is not likely to be efficient. He makes a great show of doing things, but he does not, somehow, get them done." Americans, however, are remarkably efficient in "getting things done," yet they generally have withal abundant time to spare.

Our visitor first made this important discovery on entering a metropolitan restaurant. The diners, he observed, gave their orders with deliberation and then waited patiently a long time for the waiter to return.

Between the courses, also, many precious minutes were meekly wasted. The Canon likewise noted that during business hours Americans will cheerfully converse with callers about matters having no bearing whatever on trade or commerce, whereas an Englishman would "go white" at the mere thought of such an unbusinesslike practice. Americans' aversion to writing letters did not escape the observant novelist. To avoid that annoyance, large sums are spent on the long-distance telephone and men will travel hundreds of miles just to have a short interview. He might have added that our passion for swift transportation is really due to our love for leisure. Motor-cars speed madly into the suburbs to give the "tired business man" more time at home. Three minutes are triumphantly saved by a breathless dash from the local subway train to the express, only to be lightly squandered an hour later in waiting for dessert.

Incredible as it may seem, time is just as abundant in this country as in Europe, for we have all there is. "I haven't time," is an expression heard more often here, no doubt, than, let us say, in Ireland, but we mean by it, "I must not shorten by even a minute my hours of leisure." To what use we put the time so avariciously saved is another question. Like the rest of mankind we complain petulantly that "we have no time," and then serenely act as if we had an unlimited amount of it. No one "has time" for the really important duties of life, but we find boundless leisure for trifles.

Protestant Backsliding

The New York General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church has received the report that in the last five years an annual average of 51,000 members was placed on the suspension roll; which means, being interpreted, that 255,777 Presbyterians of these parts "slipped back into the world, fell away, were relegated to the ecclesiastical scrapheap." The causes assigned for their backsliding were:

> The growing love of pleasure, disregard for the Lord's day and the Word of God, the increasing craze for amusements and the influence of worldly company—in short, the modern view of life which is preached by many secular organizations.

These causes are inadequate. Similar defections are taking place in nearly all Protestant churches, especially in their male membership, and worldliness and pleasure-seeking, which always existed, do not explain them. There was more and viler and more wide-spread worldliness in the Roman Empire, and yet Christianity weaned men away from it, and drew them into its churches, which it had continuously to multiply in order to make room for them; and this continued to be the story of the Christianization of all peoples. The same allurements in New York and elsewhere that draw Protestants away from their churches are also presented to Catholics; but they do not draw these away. Our churches are filled many times on Sunday, our altar rails are crowded with communicants; on week days Holy Mass is offered, our Church doors are open, and many enter. Why is it that the world's attractions lure away the one and not the other?

Broadly because true Christianity is a stronger attraction, and this Catholics have. It is not that amusements and worldliness lure away the Presbyterians and the rest, but that they have little Christianity from which to be lured. The Presbyterians had once a very definite faith; hard and repellent, it is true, but they believed in it. Then they went to church and, where they could, forced every one else to go along with them. But not for long could people be persuaded that, willy-nilly, they were damned or saved forever, that joy was sinful and happiness ungodly; and so creeds were pared down to the likings of the membership, until little was left for the members to like or to dislike. Once particularly strong [illegible] they have now eliminated it, and as ministers are [illegible] who will not affirm the Divinity of Christ or the inspiration of Scripture, they have but a very indefinite and unsatisfying heaven to offer to their listeners. Calvin abolished the Mass, and all the sacraments but two, which were allowed to remain as ordinances with some significance. His successors have robbed them of all significance. In other words they have merely the name of Christianity, not its essence. They have words, not truths; no definite belief or guidance, no sacrifice, no altar, no sacramental channels of grace, no Book inspired of God, no Christ Who is surely God the Son of God; and therefore no Christianity that will counteract the allurements of the devil, the world and the flesh. Hence their churches can have only the attractions of secular meeting houses; they are not centres of Divine Grace, and consequently repel people who want it or need it.

The same is true to a large extent of all non-Catholic denominations. Some try to compensate by music or sensationalism or Catholic imitations; but all are continually revising their indefinite creeds, which is a definite admission that they have none that is true, for Christ's Truth is unchangeable. There is one church that never changes; that holds all Christ's truth and preaches it; that has an altar and a sacrifice, which is Christ, the Son of God; and that gives Him and His Grace through His seven sacramental streams to His people. Therefore people go to His churches, for they know that He, their Saviour, is there, the Way the Truth and the Life, and that from Him they will find sustenance against the allurements and the sorrows of this world.

The Toll of Death

Brutal and brutalizing war still rages fiercely in Europe. Tales of misery and stories of horrors, all heart-rending in the extreme, are flashed across the ocean to fill the pages of our papers with accounts that bewilder the judgment and sicken the soul.

The list of dead and wounded is all but endless. The blood of nations is flowing in rivers. Europe's fairest sons lie dead in huddled throngs, like animals stampeded and then struck lifeless by a powerful foe. Such is the victory of hate and greed and base materialism. Nations are offering their sacrifices to their gods: the victims are the souls of men. Our vaunted civilization has broken down and is presenting to angels and men a spectacle which brings the blush of shame to every decent cheek. Our boasted enlightenment is a murky thing, like hell fire, death dealing rather than vivifying. The purpose of a decent civilization is to preserve men and make them happy; the aim of this civilization is to cast them into the jaws of death by the thousands, leaving their widows and children helpless except to send forth a wail of sorrow that rings over the earth, a startling thing like a wail of the dead in the night.

The war had to come. Godlessness was rife: and godlessness leads to strife as well among civilized creatures as among savages. The war must go; men will drop their firearms from sheer exhaustion. But the war will come again, unless men change their ideals. God must be put in the place of inordinate desire for power and wealth. The things of heaven must be more than the things of earth. When this happens man will grow his full length and leave behind him his gods in quest of God, the Master of peace and love, the dispenser of the oil of mercy and the wine of love. This is the lesson that Benedict XV reads us in his encyclical on peace. When men take it to heart then will peace come.

Lilliputian Souls

Suppose you lived in a pin-hole; think of the magnificient arch of sky which would bend over your head! Sweep your gaze around upon the wide horizon encircling your vision: a rain-drop would be a deluge; a grain of sand would be a mighty boulder crashing down upon you with the force of an avalanche. You would sympathize with the anonymous poet who sang in his wild dreams: "Mosquitoes would be mastodons, if we were only small enough." "No, thank you," you would reply, "they are satisfactorily large as it is." What the alliterative versifier has expressed so fearsomely, the philosopher expresses more austerely in the phrase that all magnitude is relative.

If a pin-hole can convert a drop of water into Niagara, why is it not possible to reverse the telescope and see things small which are uncomfortably large? It is far more comforting to see mosquitoes dwindling into mites than developing into leviathans. Are you stranded at the bottom of a pin-hole or standing in triumphant exaltation on a mountain peak? The local pin-hole, the national pin-hole, the pin-holes of bigotry, of antipathy, of selfishness, these are the narrowers of men's horizons, these are the factories for the world's myopia (in every day no-charge English, short-sightedness). The usual derricks for hoisting people out of such cramped quarters are travel, reading, growth in years, humility and, in many aggravated cases, a good digestion.

Where you most need the reversed telescope is in contemplating evil. Some have been so overwhelmed by the evil around them that for them it has eclipsed God's Providence, poisoned His goodness, or even denied His existence. When things get too near, they bulk large and blot out the landscape. What narrows the skyline for you may be a mountain range or a city or one huge building, but for another the view may disappear behind a tree or a curtain two feet wide, or an eye-lid half an inch wide. A grain of dust in your eye means more to you than a sand-storm in the Sahara. Mighty armies may be slaying millions across the ocean, but that carnage will not shake the foundations of Divine confidence for a mother as the loss of a tiny babe may perhaps do.

The pin-hole position limits the outlook and keeps evil very near. The more remote the distance, the lesser the evil. You will not worry about a twinge of pain in one foot of an ant because you tower above it. Take your position on the sun, and this earth is like a baseball a mile away. Mount higher still and stand upon the heights of heaven; throw the stretches of eternity between you and your evils—and then what has become of them? A life of suffering is but a moment of pain; the carnage of war is a drop of blood; a devastating plague is a passing indisposition; "a thousand years but as one day."

You have the testimony of one who took his outlook from the pinnacle of heaven, anticipating that place before the time usually allotted to ordinary mortals. We must die to get out of our pin-hole entirely. This witness, however, "was caught up to the third heaven," and he weighed all the evils of time in the scales of eternity, and he discovered that our present tribulation is momentary and light, but "worketh for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory."

LITERATURE

The Ignorance of the Past

The modern intellectual is affected in either one of two ways when confronted with the achievements of the past: he ignores them through fear or passes them by in ignorance. Mr. Walter Lippmann, the author of "Drift and Mastery" (Kennerley), is a typical example of an acute modern radical who, through ignorance of the past and a refusal to consider the theological and economic creeds endorsed by the Catholic Church and practised in those centuries when Europe was Catholic, sees the flame of civilization flare for a moment in Grecian times and then die down, to flare up again in some future Collectivist State. He is one of those who sketch that vital period of great intellectual activity that spreads from the twelfth to the sixteenth century under the general title of the Dark Ages, in which period Philosophy and Science lay side by side in a kind of stupor, until the Reformaton "liberated the intellect" (I believe that is the phrase) and finally achieved perfection in the philosophies of William James, Professor Bergson, etc., etc.

Thus Mr. Lippmann does not realize that that poverty which is inevitable in capitalistic society, and which he, like all other men who are neither fools nor knaves, cordially detests, practically did not exist in the Middle Ages. The organization and care of labor by the gilds, the system of peasant proprietorship, made the creation of a proletariat impossible. Yet this democratic organization of society, which was gradually being perfected under the inspiration of the Faith, our author discards, not deigning in many pages devoted to suggestions for a radical remedy for the evils of Capitalism to consider it. Here is a conspiracy, if only an unconscious conspiracy, of silence in regard to Catholic solutions for economic ills. We would not mind if our opponents would state our solutions and correctly, and then attempt to refute them. But our opponents have lost their memories and can not even remember what our side of the quarrel is. G. K. Chesterton once remarked that Europe had a nasty knock on the head some years ago and that its memory of past ages is only now coming back. But surely it is now time to be done with these bad dreams and delusions about the Middle Ages that have haunted Europe's slow recovery; these false explanations of the past, these crazy pictures of the future.

I find the author stating that "the sanctity of property, the family, the dogma of sin—the rock of ages in brief—has been blasted for us," and an exclamation, "No wonder the churches are empty!" etc., etc. Now these accusations are justified when directed against the Protestant churches. "Go-to-church Sunday" is an admission of weakness. But here again Mr. Lippmann refuses to face the fact that the Faith exists, that it is alive, and not merely alive, but lively. It is not true that the various beliefs which Mr. Lippmann groups under the title of "the rock of ages" have been blasted for us. The explosive heresies of modern times have left the Rock which is Peter, untouched. The disintegration of Protestantism is not an argument against us, it is an argument in our favor. Europe is restating its belief in the dogma of sin, in the sanctity of property. Mr. Lippmann is behind the times. The increase of the Faith in England and America, the Catholic renascence in France, the possibilities of a new Catholic country in Poland at the end of this war, these things mean nothing to him. Educated in the non-Catholic tradition, he has no grasp of continuity in European affairs and is incapable of perceiving the flow of contemporary European thought in the direction of Catholicism. He sends a few modern heresies sprawling and then assumes that the world is his to rebuild according to his tastes. Noting a certain clever, if superficial, tone in his work, one would think that he would have experienced the fact that the one great opponent to the spirit that takes for granted that a new earth is going to be moulded, and a new society which will satisfy men without religion, is the Catholic Church.

Discarding Christianity which, in its assertion that those things which men have in common are more important than their differences, alone furnishes an argument for democracy, the anti-Catholic apologist for democracy is forced to resort to the poorest of all arguments, the argument on grounds of efficiency. So Mr. Lippmann. But this argument will not hold water. History teaches, with the possible exception of France, the impossibility of great masses of men being able to give adequate expression to their collective will. Cast aside Catholicism and you destroy all argument for democracy. Nor should Mr. Lippmann have overlooked the fact that the most democratic countries in Europe are the Catholic countries, and that the decision of the Irish and French and Polish peoples to remain nations of peasant proprietors; that is, free and democratic nations, is the direct result of their Catholic inheritance. It is not "the curse," as Lippmann asserts, but the blessing of Ireland and Poland and Alsace that they can not forget what they were. The democratic conditions in Catholic countries in the past and in the present is a curious commentary on his statement about the "undemocratic world which the Church dominated!"

"Had the Church achieved its full ambition, to be glorious and rich amidst poverty" . . . a perverted suggestion of that sort is difficult to answer. It is difficult to answer because practically the only answer is to call it a lie. There are accusations so futile and so false on the face of them, so intrinsically absurd when brought face to face with the facts of history, that the lie direct is the only possible reply. Imagine interpreting the activity of the Church in the Middle Ages as a great conspiracy to reduce her children to a state of pauperism!

I find on page 249 what Mr. Lippmann calls a "brilliant suggestion" of Freud's to the effect that men took refuge in monasteries to escape their sense of sin and their spiritual conflicts. One can only describe such a suggestion as sheer fatuity. Why one should feel less of a sinner because one takes the vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, and lives in community, is quite past my comprehension. Certainly this simple explanation of the growth of the monastic orders is not borne out in the writings of the monastic saints.

There are many definitions in "Drift and Mastery" which misrepresent Catholic doctrine. I quote from page 203: "The confessional where sin could be expressed and therefore purged; the vicarious atonement by which the consequences of human sins were lifted off men's shoulders." There is a crude misstatement of the Sacrament of Penance and an explanation of the Atonement which, coming from a non-Catholic writer, leads one to think that he has confused with Catholic doctrine the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith condemned by the Council of Trent (Session 6, Canon 11). Immediately after this quotation comes a very serious lapse in Mr. Lippmann's "scholarship." He quotes some sentences from a volume of meditations with the claim that they are excerpts from St. Ignatius' "Spiritual Exercises." It just happens that St. Ignatius never wrote a meditation on death. Then there is the amusing statement that the Church has always opposed the inventor and those who have helped mankind to a greater degree of self-government. Shades of Pasteur, Linacre, Mendel, Galvani and Müller!

I remember some phrases in an essay on "The Barbarians," by Hilaire Belloc, which are an excellent commentary on Mr. Lippmann's curiously naïve and conceited statement that the only people who can stomach a pluralistic philosophy are those who have grown strong enough to do without an absolute faith. As though belief in God necessarily involved weakness of intellect or morals! Belloc remarked:

> The Barbarian struts like a nigger in evening clothes when he has grown to be a "pragmatist," and believes himself superior to the gift of reason, or free to maintain that definition, limit, quantity or contradiction are little childish things which he has outgrown. . . . Discipline seems to him irrational, on which account he is forever marvelling that civilization should have offended him with soldiers and priests. . . . The Barbarian wonders what strange meaning may lurk in that ancient and solemn truth, Sine auctoritate nulla vita.

How true!

LOUIS H. WETMORE.

REVIEWS

The Book of the Bayeux Tapestry. Introduction and Narrative by HILAIRE BELLOC. With 76 illustrations in color. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

There is something peculiarly apposite in this presentment of the Bayeux Tapestry, for Mr. Belloc, representative of both England and France, who has been an English Member of Parliament and a French gunner, sets forth the event which was to bring the two countries into such close relationship.

Hastings saw England and France opposed in arms: to-day sees the two nations in arms against a common foe.

The Tapestry, which is preserved in the main room of what was once the Bishop's Palace at Bayeux in Normandy, is a complete pageant of the Conquest of England, by William of Normandy, in 1066. The Tapestry has been held to be contemporary with the Conquest, and on the supposition that it was woven by the wives of those who fought in the Battle of Hastings has been called "Queen Matilda's Tapestry." Mr. Belloc proceeds to destroy this tradition, and, so it appears, by very sound arguments, and places its construction somewhere in the twelfth century. This is the academic interest of the Tapestry.

The historical feature of the Tapestry is that in giving the story of the Conquest it places Harold in the light of a perjured traitor, and William as the hero; thus it is a justification of the Norman cause. But in the popular mind it is Harold who is the hero; William is the foreign invader. Both in "Ivanhoe" and "Hereward the Wake" the dying Saxon cause has been set forth as the cause of the people; though, as "every schoolboy knows," the Norman Conquest was but an incident in the fusion of that mixed race known as the English. Two incidents stand out in the Bayeux story of the Conquest, incidents that were calculated to carry weight with those for whom the pageant was designed. They are the oath which Harold swore on the Blessed Sacrament and the relics of the saints, and his coronation as king by Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the former is the pivot upon which turned the Norman accusation of treason and perjury. With regard to Stigand, his position was certainly irregular and even schismatic. The true Archbishop of Canterbury, Robert of Jumièges, had escaped to the Continent after the return of Godwine, and Stigand was intruded into the Metropolitan See. From the Catholic point of view, the only one, as there were no Protestants in those days, the case of Harold was hopeless. He had broken a most solemn oath, he had received his sacring at the hands of a schismatic prelate, and therefore in the eyes of Christendom the Norman cause needed very little justification. This is the light in which we must read the Tapestry, although the popular mind has immortalized the last of the Saxon Kings falling, his brain pierced by an arrow, on the field of Hastings.

H. C. W.

The World Missions of the Catholic Church. A Text Book for the Teachers of our Parochial Schools, Colleges and Academies. By Rev. FREDERIC SCHWAGER, S.V.D. Techny, Ill.: Society of the Divine Word. $0.40.

This book may be looked upon as a novelty in our Catholic pedagogic literature; but the novelty is a timely and happy one. As one of the consequences of the war the support and even the very existence of many of our foreign missions depend entirely upon us and upon the children we now educate. This indeed is in itself a sufficient reason for following the suggestion, made at the last missionary congress by Archbishop Quigley, of Chicago, that the study of the foreign missions should find a place in our Catholic schools. But such a study has likewise its purely educative value which is not to be underestimated. Father Schwager rightly says:

> We look upon the hero tales of the ancient Greeks and Romans as ennobling and inspiring; but how much more ennobling and inspiring the story of the Christian martyrs of our day! Is there any better way of learning to appreciate the ethical and cultural influence of our Church than, by contrast, getting an insight into heathendom.

The author has no thought of introducing a new branch of learning into our curriculum. We are encumbered with too many branches already. Neither is the book intended for the use of pupils, but for the direction of teachers. It is meant to suggest, under headings parallel to the matter treated in the text-books, valuable mission information which can be used in connection with the teaching of catechism and Bible history. A second volume, which is to appear in January, will serve the same purpose for the teachers of history and geography. These books are not, of course, exhaustive, but will prove inspiring and suggestive. They will be a new source of interest as well as of apostolic zeal in the classroom.

J. H.

The Struggle for Scutari. By M. EDITH DURHAM. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $4.00.

Quidquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi seems as true of modern Albanians as of ancient Greeks; and, so far as Miss Durham is concerned, the world need be under no illusion in the matter. When Nikola, of Montenegro, made himself king we were given beautiful pictures of the Montenegrin people. They were a happy, innocent lot, unspoiled by too much civilization. They had, of course, little quarrels over sheep and such like. But these they carried to their beloved prince, who, sitting under a tree before his palace, would do justice in the manner of the ancient world. They were brave, too, holding their cherished Christianity in their mountain fastnesses against the Moslem for centuries. They loved their Albanian neighbors as brothers, yearning to free them from the Turk that they might make them sharers in their Christian liberty.

Miss Durham, who has lived among the Albanians as their guide, philosopher and friend, and their nurse and surgeon, too, on occasion, tells another tale. The Montenegrin is a swaggerer, achieving great things in word, but a failure in action. King Nikola is a crafty politician, and his State, in proportion to its size, yields to none in the peninsula in the excellence of its graft. He is as skilful in winning imaginary battles, in capturing castles in Spain, in slaying hosts of enemies over and over again, as those greater than he inside and outside the Balkans, and as able as they to explain a defeat in terms of a triumph. His subjects, therefore, are not disinclined to revolt. The love for the Albanian is a fiction. What Montenegrins love is Albanian land; and their notion of settling with its possessors is Cromwell's Irish method carried to its highest and simplest perfection. Prince Danilo is said to be so vigorous an advocate of such a pacification of Albania, as to have won the title of the Montenegrin Nero. The Montenegrin religion seems to have this, in common with Orange Protestantism, that it consists in great part of a virulent hatred of Catholics.

Miss Durham is a partisan of the Albanians. She corrects a good many errors regarding their tribes that the newspapers have made current, but she does not hide their shortcomings. Her book impresses us favorably as a faithful record by one capable of discerning the truth, with abundant opportunity to do so. Incidentally the Servians come in, and what she has to say of them is not flattering. Had her view taken in other Balkan peoples one can hardly doubt that she would have been equally outspoken. Probably the true view of them all is, that they are as yet decidedly elemental, given to torturing and slaughtering hereditary enemies without restraint, unfit as yet to be allowed the free use of guns and gunpowder, the tools of higher powers, open and concealed. A few decades of paternal government seeking only their good, bringing them under the most efficacious influences of religion, would make a great people out of them, for the material is noble. But who is to give them that government? They are still waiting for it, and in the meantime are pawns of the Russian, the German, the Austrian, not to mention the revolutionary committees and their rulers, just as they were of the Turks in the past. They remain to-day among the most cruelly wronged peoples the world has ever known, and their cry must go up against their successive oppressors to the throne of God. The wrongs of the Balkan peoples are being avenged at this moment from the North Sea to the Vistula. But will they be redressed? H. W.

Criticism. By W. C. BRONWELL.

On Acting. By BRANDER MATTHEWS. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $0.75 each.

These are two slight brochures of attractive appearance. "Criticism" is more comprehensive than philosophical. It attempts to cover the whole field. "On Acting," better advised, feeling it could not compress a whole theory into a brief space, touches lightly on a few aspects of its subject. It is more interesting and far more clear. Its principles are not entangled in a web of words but often are embodied in a sparkling anecdote. "Criticism" presents a sane and sound theory of its topic, and on such subjects as impressionism and realism it is quite satisfactory. In demanding only a tincture of philosophy for critics it is not correct, unless it understands by philosophy, as perhaps it does, theorizing. A tincture of Taine's false theorizing on environment is enough, as "Criticism" seems to admit. But if by philosophy is understood a right understanding of man's frailties and the way to reach them through language, then a tincture of such philosophy is unhappily all that most critics do possess, but not all that they ought to possess. In their style these two companion books differ widely. "On Acting" leads its reader on easily, delightfully, without a halt. Its sentences are short; its illustrations to the point, and its stories new. "Criticism" demands patience. Occasionally, to the reader's great relief, its discussion crystallizes into an epigram, but, as a rule, "Criticism" is too much inclined to the Henry James type of sentence, the discursive sentence, which leaves New York for New Orleans and arrives at Boston by way of the Suez Canal. F. P. D.

Essays on Books. By WILLIAM LYON PHELPS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

The essay is to prose what the lyric is to poetry. Its dominant note is subjectivism. It is the vehicle of personal thoughts and feelings about a subject or event. In these "Essays on Books" Professor Phelps entertainingly tells us many of his own thoughts and feelings about authors and books of lasting interest. The world will ever be ready to listen and to learn when Richardson, Dickens, Jane Austen, Lessing, Herrick and other authors of their calibre are the subject matter of discussion. But the personal attitude of mind of the literary critic is oftentimes more interesting and important than anything, however excellent, he has to say. Professor Phelps has said much in this volume which is excellent, and in the saying of it, he has indicated an unmistakable attitude of mind on a fundamental problem which is still more admirable. His outlook is sufficiently rare in these days of artistic and literary Philistinism to provoke both comment and commendation, for he shows an uncompromising belief in the need of morality and religion, both in real life and book life.

In "Conversations with Paul Heyse," the German litterateur evidently deeply impressed the author, when he said to him:

> I used to think perhaps we could get along without it (religion). . . . Now I know . . . there is absolutely no substitute for it. . . . Science and Monism can never fill any place in the human heart. Religion alone can satisfy human longings and human aspiration.

As for the need of morality and religion in books, Professor Phelps enunciates a solid literary dogma when he says in his thoughts on Dickens: "The moral attitude of a writer, his grasp of the religious and moral basis of life is of the highest importance, for out of that flows the stream of his works, and its quality and flavor are largely determined by it." The author makes unerring application of this principle when he puts his finger on the sore spot of much modern literature, the "absence of the central fire of faith," wherefore "a large number of brilliantly-written novels and dramas in our time betray not merely weariness, gloom and heart-sickness, but above all bewilderment and uncertainty."

Professor Phelps is so sure in his grasp on certain principles, that we read with regret such a statement as this: "A formal creed in art is as unsatisfactory as a formal creed in religion." Surely, the whole history of religion triumphantly demonstrates the fact that creedless religion is emasculated religion, that the rejection of formal religious creed inevitably leads to the assumption of religious scepticism with all the sad effects in life which the professor so skilfully depicts in modern literature. I. W. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Catholic Mind for November 22 is meant to be a convert-maker. In it is printed "The Architect's Plan," a line of argument which the author, Father John A. Cotter, S.J., has found by experience very effective for bringing intellectual conviction to those seeking the true Church of Christ. In this same number the late Mgr. Benson tells, as few better can, of "The Happiness of Catholicism"; Father Woods writes luminously on "Infallibility," and Father Dwight answers briefly the question, "Was St. Peter in Rome?" The pamphlet should, perhaps, bear in red ink the warning, "Dangerous to Protestants!" but those who have prospective converts to deal with will find a well-stocked armory in the current Catholic Mind.

"Modern Lovers" (Richard G. Badger, Boston, $1.25), is a novel by Viola Meynell, whose name, it will be remembered, Francis Thompson wove so prettily into his poetry. A carefully written story of the leisurely, analytical kind, the book is chiefly concerned with the fair but deceitful "Effie" and her two lovers. The author describes with skill an unamiable, middle-class English family, and the heroine's success in conquering a radical weakness in her character. In novels like this it is customary to give detailed accounts of humdrum conversations and familiar psychological processes. The author's "artistry" does much to keep such pages from growing tiresome, but withal the peril is not wholly absent. As was to be expected from a Meynell, the literary finish of "Modern Lovers" is high.

"Hugh Carton," the author of "The Grand Assize" (Doubleday, $1.35), is said to be the pen-name of an "English clergyman of high rank," who is well known both as a preacher and as a "student of affairs." He brings before Our Divine Lord for judgment individuals representing the varied classes in modern society, such as the plutocrat, the drunkard, the prostitute, the actor, the politician, the "cleric," etc. They all make a sincere confession, guardian angels say what they can for the culprits, then the Judge, on questioning each, finds that they are victims of their environment or bad bringing-up, so He consigns all to a kind of mild purgatory. The publishers describe the work as a "truly reverent conception of the Last Judgment." With this assertion the Catholic reader will not agree. Sinners compelled at the "Grand Assize," even in the teeth and forehead of their faults, to give in evidence, will not be the composed creatures of this book, nor does the Judge portrayed in Holy Writ resemble the one presiding over this author's court. Many of the chapters are powerfully written and contain pitiless descriptions of the men and women who now prey on society.

The cartoon on the cover of the Boston Truth for November 19 is a particularly good one. Grim-visaged war is about to behead a tiny, winged babe, who awaits the blow bound and kneeling, but with a smile and a wink for the beholder. The picture is entitled "Finis" and means that Truth has had its last issue; "at least for the present," as the war has cut the paper's "income in halves, making it impossible to continue." The announcement will bring keen regret to the readers of that bright and fearless little weekly. Mr. George R. Conroy, its editor and publisher, excels in the art of telling the truth with a smile, and has valiantly defended, during the two years of his paper's existence, "our civilization, the home, and all that Christianity holds dear." When the war is over, Truth, we hope, will rise again. It has died "game," moreover, "owing no man a dollar which it is unable to pay," and with a clever parting shot at its "chief mourners."

"From Dublin to Chicago" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50) is an amusing volume of impressions gathered during a brief American tour by the Irish Protestant novelist, George A. Birmingham, who in private life is Canon Hannay. The book should be pleasant reading for Americans, as the author admires nearly everything he saw over here, and writes with enthusiasm of many things that are criticized, as a rule, by tourists from Europe. He found New York the cleanest city he ever saw, considered St. Patrick's Cathedral and the Graduate College buildings at Princeton the finest examples there are of modern Gothic, did not think we use nearly as much profanity as Englishmen, was struck by our "reverence" for women, and liked immensely our sanguine, companionable spirit. In his last chapter on "The Irishman Abroad," which is perhaps the best in the book, the author dwells feelingly on the success his countrymen have had in whatever they undertook in every country but Ireland.

The readers, critics and contributors, with whom Mr. MacGregor Jenkins, the publisher of the Atlantic Monthly, has had business relations, furnish him with matter for an amusing little book called "The Reading Public" (Houghton, $0.75). The author knows just what sort of literature appeals to "the man in the street," he can predict with uncanny accuracy the contents of next week's periodical, he has a noble scorn for "machine-made novels," inveighs eloquently against the so-called "women's publications" with their "tawdry make-believe," "literary cant," "sickening sentiment" and "doubtful sex-consciousness," assures us that the Atlantic accepts but 250 of the 12,000 manuscripts submitted every year, and quotes the following titbit from a breezy Westerner's criticism of the magazine:

> Your articles are weak and vapid, your essays nonsense, your stories utterly without interest, and your poetry is rotten. If you would only listen to reason, and try to learn how to make a magazine, but you Easterners know it all, so h——! what's the use!

It is letters of this kind that keep editors well supplied with the humility that is so necessary for men of their calling.

Artistic panel calenders, entitled "The Catholic Church," "Dominus Vobiscum," "Madonna" and "Cheer Up," have come from E. P. Dutton & Co. The first is for Catholics, the second and third for Anglicans, the fourth for the melancholy. Another is called "Merrie Thoughts," with a jest, presumably a fresh one, for every day of the year. But it will take courage to keep pulling off that slip regularly.—Benziger's "Home Annual" for 1915, is now ready for its patrons. Among the illustrated articles is Father Campbell's sketch of Le Moyne D'Iberville, and the magazine's frontispiece is a portrait of Benedict XV. It is a copy in black and white of John F. Kaufman's recent painting of the Holy Father, of which excellent reproductions in color are being sold by Benziger for fifty cents each. The picture is twenty-four by eighteen inches in size, and is very suitable for framing.—Next year's "Catholic Calendar" ($0.50), with its well-chosen daily quotations from authors who belong, for the most part, to the household of the Faith, has lately been published by the Mt. Carmel Guild, 50 Franklin Street, Buffalo, N. Y. Whatever profits are made on the Calendar will be used for the charitable work of the Guild.—Some of the most artistic and appropriate Christmas cards there are can be had from the Benedictine nuns of St. Bride's Abbey, Milford Haven, South Wales. Dame Catherine Weeks, the community's gifted artist, offers the public a wide choice of designs. From Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco, comes their artistic "Impressions Calendar" ($0.50) for 1915. On each panel, which number fifty-two, are printed helpful lines from a poet or moralist.

The lamentable state of Belgium has inspired Mr. Stuart P. Sherman to write the following sonnet, which is published in the New York Nation:

> White mouths that clamor for the unreaped wheat,
> Frail hands that clasp the unresponsive dead,
> Brave Belgian hearts, unconquered in defeat,
> Dispeopled, exiled King: be comforted.
> Though we close not the assaulted gates of sense
> To shrieking towns, the gurgle of great ships
> In drowning agonies, the fields immense
> Horrid with shuddering limbs and writhen lips,
> Yet since your woe has wrought this lift and swell
> Of world-wide pity, love and chivalry,
> We say the awful sacrifice is well.
> The old law holds; on this new Calvary
> Humanity, uplifted, crucified,
> Still draws all hearts unto its wounded side.

And the shelling of Reims Cathedral made Katherine Tynan send the London Tablet these verses:

> Reims is down in fire and smoke,
> The hour of God is at the stroke.
> Round and round the ruined place,
> (Jesu, Mary, give us grace!)
> There are two riders clad in mail
> Silver as the moon pale.
> One is tall as a knight's spear,
> The younger one is lowlier,
> Small and slim and like a maid:
> Steeds and riders cast no shade.
> Who are then these cavaliers?
> There was a sound as Heaven dropped tears.
> Who are these that ride so light,
> Soundless in the flaming light,
> Where Reims burns that was given
> By France to Mary, Queen of Heaven?
> Oh, our Reims, our Reims is down,
> Naught is left of her renown.
> Hist! what sound is on the breeze,
> Like the sighing of forest trees?
> Or a great wind or an army,
> Like the waves of the leaping sea?
> The tall knight rides fierce and fast
> To the sound of a trumpet blast.
> The little knight in fire and flame,
> Slender and soft like a dame,
> Rides and is not far behind,
> Her long hair floats on the wind.
> And e'en the tramp of chivalry
> Comes like the sound of the sea.

This is Michael, rides abroad,
Prince of the Army of God.
And this, like a lily arrayed,
Surely this is Joan, the Blessed Maid.
Reims is down in fire and smoke,
And the hour of God's at the stroke.

When the best of the poetry the Great War has already evoked and will call forth, is gathered into an anthology, it ought to be a "possession forever."

BOOKS RECEIVED

Allyn & Bacon, New York:
First Year Science. By William H. Snyder. $1.25.

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
Modern Lovers. By Viola Meynell. $1.25.

Columbia University Press, New York:
A Pageant of the XIII Century. Text by John Erskine.

Devin, Adair Co., New York:
Your Pay Envelope. By John R. Meader. $1.00.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The Unknown Guest. By Maurice Maeterlinck. $1.50; Patty's Suitors. By Carolyn Wells. $1.25; The Mason Bees. By J. Henri Fabre. $1.50; Seven Years on the Pacific Slope. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. $3.00.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
The Catholic Library. Vol. XV. Down West: Sketches of Irish Life. By Alice Dease. $0.30; The Gospel of St. John. With Notes Critical and Explanatory. By Joseph MacRory, D.D. $2.25.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
The Juvenile Court and the Community. By Thomas D. Eliot. $1.25.

Oxford University Press, New York:
Essays. By Matthew Arnold.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
France Herself Again. By Ernest Dimnet. $2.50.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
"And So They Were Married." A Comedy of the New Woman. By Jesse Lynch Williams. $1.25; The Poems of Edgar Allan Poe. Edited by E. C. Stedman and Professor G. E. Woodberry. $2.00.

Fred'k. Stokes Co., New York:
Through Siberia the Land of the Future. By Fridtjof Nansen. $5.00.

Joseph F. Wagner, New York:
Sermons for the Children's Mass. By Rev. F. Reuter. $1.00; Short Sermons on the Gospels. By Rev. F. Peppert. $1.00; The Sunday Gospels Explained to Children. By Rev. M. Parks. $1.50; Conferences for Boys. By Rev. Reynold Kuehnel. $1.50.

EDUCATION

His Own Master

Utendum est tempore cito pede labitur tempus. We read the inscription on the old gateway, and pass under the arch into the dormitory quadrangle. It is a place of dreams. Dreamy is the golden air, dreamy the gray old walls, a castle of dreams the far hills, asleep in the purple haze of Indian summer. Over the doorways quaint scrolls of Latin twine themselves about the sculptured arms. Litteræ sine moribus vanæ, the pilgrim reads; aut inveniemus viam aut faciemus. Truly there is much good moralizing graven here in silent stone. But the dreams pass, as do all things beautiful, and one awakens to realities when, on drawing near to decipher a moss-covered inscription, Hic patet ingeniis campus, one comes upon a living example of an ingenuus. He stands in the doorway, his garb a riot of dissonant color. There is a short pipe between his teeth; upon his head a cap, bearing mystic numerals. Desiring closer inspection of the visitor who has strayed into this academic close, a bulldog tugs at his leash. An ill-regulated university, forsooth, where Freshmen may smoke pipes in public unrebuked, and play a straining bulldog at the end of a chain! But even as wisdom is justified of her children, so by this scene is Doctor Fitch, of Andover, justified in the charming picture which he sketched last spring for the undergraduates of Williams College. "College opens," writes the author of "The College Course and the Preparation for Life," "and he, once a schoolboy, now an undergraduate, stands, his own master, at his dormitory door." Sure enough; here he is. We have seen him with these eyes.

The Genus Freshman

His own master! There is charm in the phrase for all of us, even though we know it is not true. But it flatters old age; and it flatters particularly the callow youth who comes up from the country to partake of the glory that beats about the "college man." Until to-day, when he matriculates, proceeds Dr. Fitch in his explanation of the genus Freshman, "his life has been summed up in terms of a mediatized experience." This is a dreadful and alarming phrase.

("Harold," says the delightful Simeon Strunsky, "do you feel the sacred innocence of childhood brooding in you?"
He was alarmed, but bravely attempted a smile.
"Ah, father!" he said.
I looked at him severely.
"Do you know what I ought to do to you in the name of the New Parenthood?"
"Ah, father!" and his lip trembled.
"You are a disgrace to the Eternal Spark within you," I said.
He lowered his head, and began to cry.
"Go into the next room," I said, "and stand with your face to the corner for ten minutes.")

This parenthesis is merely to show that Terms can be Alarming without meaning much. Let us now rejoin Dr. Fitch. "The keynote of all wholesome boyhood," he instructs us, "is obedience." "Life is known to him only in its accepted and accredited expression." But with the triumphal passing of the Entrance Examinations, life takes on a new aspect. The curtain rises upon a new scene. Or rather, if one accepts Dr. Fitch's view, the old playhouse is darkened forever, and the lights flare up in the College Theatre for a new play, drama or comedy, as the fates may choose to turn the action. With eager hand, Dr. Fitch draws up the synopsis. The four years of college life "contain a maximum of privileges with a minimum of responsibility." They are "years of unparalleled opportunity and extraordinary stimulus." "The college deliberately releases him from the restraints and traditions of a provincial and domestic life. He is given a large measure of leisure and independence to use that leisure as he sees fit." "Above all, these years offer to the youth spiritual and intellectual freedom, the one thing which in the final days of his schooling he did most passionately desire."

Misjudged Reggie

Ah, Reggie, Reggie, uncertain of voice, awkward of gait and gesture, how cruelly we parents, we high school teachers, have misjudged you! Madame, take a look at your boy. Your eyes may find him beautiful, your heart may say that never was there such a paragon. But, did you not think, even you, that food and football, and a little cigarette smoking on the sly, and his "crowd" and his chum, and a sneaking fondness for his sister Nancy's fudge, and perhaps, a fondness which betrays itself by being gruffly disowned, for the little girl next door—didn't even you think that these were the main activities of Reggie's venerable years? How dull your eyes, Madame! All the while, the whole being of your child of sixteen winters, was crying aloud for that which he did most passionately desire, "spiritual and intellectual freedom." And you, most purblind masters, I perceive you move uneasily as you listen to Dr. Fitch. You, who in ten years at the desk, have moiled and parried with Reggie and his thousand brothers, what can you say to palliate the cruelty of the sentence you were wont to pass upon him? When Reggie proclaimed, verbis et re, that Euclid was a bore, Latin a mistake, and Greek a crime; when Reggie used a "pony" and was caught at it; when Reggie developed strange ailments unknown to the fraternity, yet of sufficient gravity to remove for the nonce his smiling countenance from your range of vision; what were the hard words that sprang to your unthinking lips? Did you not say most brutally, that Reggie was a "sharker," a trifler, a good-for-nothing; did you not darkly prophesy that he would come to no high place in the Republic of Letters? O, blind generation, why could you not see in your contact with squads of Reggies, that each youth was another Patrick Henry, who, though mute for want of fitting academic language, yet was bursting with inarticulate yearnings for that which he did most passionately desire, i.e., spiritual and intellectual freedom?

THE NEW FREEDOM

But happily, Reggie's most passionate desire for freedom, spiritual and intellectual, is gratified to the full in Dr. Fitch's typical college. Yet "even more significant" is the fact that "ideas and convictions are no longer imposed upon him from without. In the critical and neutral atmosphere of the classroom, everything is questioned, nothing is taken for granted." When one recalls the ordinary Freshman of romance and reality, with his fondness for shirking intensive work, and his notorious lack of that independence of judgment which, in the nature of this world, can come only with years of experience with men and affairs, it is difficult to believe that Dr. Fitch wishes to be taken seriously. Père Hardouin, in the seventeenth century, argued acutely that the majority of the classics were the forgeries of thirteenth century monks. Is our Freshman to reopen this question, by pursuing an independent inquiry into the authenticity of Horace, before he will deign to construe his Mæcenas atavis? Is he to regard with distrust Euclid and his hoary axioms, and turn his mighty intellect to test the validity of a geometry of four and, possibly, five dimensions? Will his passion for independent thinking lead him to observe in himself the reactions usque ad mortem of strychnine and prussic acid? In the critical atmosphere of the classroom, Dr. Fitch assures us, nothing is to be taken for granted. All this is said with an admirable air of intellectual austerity. In reality, however, Dr. Fitch must know that he is setting a task for his Freshman of seventeen summers, which neither he himself nor any mortal ever attempted. No man, even were he gifted with the sum of the industry and the intellectual gianthood of Aristotle and Aquinas, could review and prove the whole field of human knowledge. Life is not long enough for a religion of inferences, wrote Newman, wearily elaborating a dictum of common sense. Nor is life long enough to allow any individual mind to gather for itself, by independent investigation, a respectable body of information, or the whole truth concerning even one small art or science. "We shall never have done beginning," affirms Newman, "if we determine to begin with proof. We shall ever be laying foundations—we shall never get at our first principles. Resolve to believe nothing, and you must prove your proofs and analyze your elements, sinking further and further, and finding 'in the lowest depth a lower deep' until you come to the broad bosom of skepticism."

FINDING HIS SOUL

But Dr. Fitch's idea of what Reggie can bear goes even beyond this. True, he admits that this new wine may be somewhat heady, but it is necessary for Reggie's growth. "No one can carry boys through adolescence into manhood in a perambulator, no decent boy would endure the experience." But there is nothing even faintly reminiscent of the perambulator or the nurse in Dr. Fitch's ideal college.

> If the keynote of every good school is obedience, then the keynote of every good college is freedom, freedom to investigate everything for one's self. The boy now is not merely permitted, he is expected, to find his own soul and his own view of life.

Madame (or Sir), take another look at Reggie. Next year you will send him to college. We know he is a fairly good boy. But that is precisely the difficulty; that he is only a boy. To pass unscathed through Dr. Fitch's college, he must needs have the intellectual and moral poise of an archangel. For in the non-Catholic college pictured by the President of Andover, he will be cut loose from "domestic tradition." He will be taught "to question everything, to take nothing for granted," the faith taught by Christ included, Though obedience is the foundation of civilization, he will be told that "freedom," not "obedience," is the "keynote of every good college." Finally, he will be allowed to believe that he is "his own master."

Do you think that this atmosphere will help Reggie to "find his own soul"? that it will make him the son you would wish for your old age? that he will come out of it a better citizen, a truer Catholic?

Is this the college you want for your boy?

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

A "Don't" for Sociological Workers

Catholic students in non-Catholic schools of sociology are at times referred to the "Encyclopedia of Social Reform," edited by William D. P. Bliss and published by Funk & Wagnalls. Beyond doubt the book contains much valuable information, notably in an article on the Church and Social Reform by Dr. William J. Kerby, of the Catholic University. But as a whole, the volume is decidedly unsatisfactory, not only from the historical but from the scientific viewpoint. Of recent years compilers of school histories have been forced to the admission that the Catholic Church has exercised some influence in civilizing Europe. They have begun to realize, faintly, perhaps, the truth of Newman's saying that those who glibly rail against the ignorance of the Church of Rome, are too benighted to be aware that the learned world owes the Bible and the classics to the care of the Church's ignorant sons, the lazy medieval monks. Writers on sociology have not as yet reached this stage of enlightenment. They, or many of them, are obsessed by the idea that what is now termed social work began with them, and that the part played by the Church during nineteen centuries was, in the main, destructive of the temporal happiness of men and nations.

To note all the faults, negative and positive, of this encyclopedia would serve no good purpose. Briefly, the work does the Church the double injustice of omitting all mention of most of the social work which her children have accomplished, and of misrepresenting, or damning with faint praise, the Catholic factors to which it gives space.

SINS OF OMISSION

Let us first consider the facts which the encyclopedia omits. We find no article on St. Benedict, whose venerable monastery at Monte Cassino Gladstone once called the cradle of European civilization, nor on Francis of Assisi, whose Third Order, as even non-Catholic writers admit, was one of the strongest social forces ever evolved by a single man. It is almost incredible that an "Encyclopedia of Social Reform" furnishes the student with no article on the modern apostle of charity, St. Vincent de Paul. Justinian, Charlemagne, Nicholas of Cusa and St. John de Matha are mentioned "incidentally." Frederick Ozanam, founder of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, is not deemed worthy of special treatment. Lacordaire and Windthorst are passed over in silence. Lamennais, who left the Church, is honored with a special article, but de Maistre and de Mun, who remained true to her, are ignored. Among German social leaders, Huber and Stocker get more space than Bishop von Ketteler, while Father Kolping, the founder of the Gesellenverein, is not even mentioned. Father Mathew is omitted, and the space thus saved is devoted to a relatively insignificant temperance worker named Murphy. Why is no credit given to the great social work of the various religious orders? Why is there no mention of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Little Sisters of the Poor, and the many communities of the Sisters of Charity? It is obvious that the great social services of the religious orders of the Church are treated with something very like contempt.

Compare the vast achievements of the monks of St. Benedict, embracing nations and extending through centuries, with the influence of a present-day social settlement. Of the former, nothing is said. Some of these settlements, however, have pages devoted to them. Even the Chicago Anarchists monopolize six columns. In anything like a just proportion of space, the work of the Benedictines should cover twenty or more pages, while the Chicago Anarchists, if mentioned at all, should be dealt with in a few lines. To show the absolute want of proportion in this matter, it is sufficient to state that more space is given to Chicago and Chicago Anarchists than to the entire social work of the Catholic Church for nineteen centuries. In fact the editor, a retired minister and a Socialist, seems supinely ignorant of social work of past ages. The only facts worthy of recording seemed to revolve around the narrow circle of his own limited vision.

SINS OF COMMISSION

Let us come to the sins of commission. Not a single important article that touches the Church can be relied upon. It is simply a waste of time to go to this encyclopedia for any subject even distantly related to the Catholic Church. The articles on divorce, on education, on the family, on woman and on crime are inaccurate, and often hostile to Catholic teaching. In these accounts will be found many of the old lies and calumnies against the Church. We select but a single example. In the article, "Woman's Position," on page 1295, we read:

> The influence of monasticism and asceticism on the ordinary life of a woman was almost wholly bad. To conceive of marriage as a sin was to give it over to sin. The terrible reactions of asceticism and the corruption developed by monasticism are well known. Nevertheless the nunneries did enable some women to escape the violence of the times and develop saintly lives. In connection with this was the development of Mariolatry. The worship of the Virgin has probably more connection with the romantic and partly sensuous ideas of medieval chivalry than all writers are willing to admit.

So much for the Catholics who considered marriage a sin and worshiped the Virgin. What must be thought of the ignorant contributor who writes such nonsense, of the editor-in-chief who approves it, and publishers who print it?

On the same page we read of the glorious achievements of Protestantism in behalf of woman:

> The effect of the Protestant Reformation on the social status of woman was undoubtedly good, though not an unmixed good. Its greatest effect in this respect was to condemn celibacy, the false praise of virginity, and the condemnation of marriage. Second only to this was its effect in freeing woman from the subjection to the confessor and the priest. The sanctity of married life, the inviolability of the home, are almost distinctly Protestant conceptions.

Pages might be filled with extracts equally untrue, equally insulting. It is some consolation, however, to know that the writer of these lines is a violent suffragette. But we would ask: Why did the editor and the publisher allow such irresponsible and unqualified creatures to contribute articles to an "encyclopedia"?

Students who wish to know the truth about the Catholic Church and social reform should not consult the "Encyclopedia of Social Reform," edited by William D. P. Bliss and published by Funk & Wagnalls.

Loyola University, Chicago. HENRY S. SPALDING, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Father Bernard Vaughan has undertaken the task of issuing a Flemish newspaper for the refugees in England. At present De Stem België (The Voice of Belgium) is issued once a week, but Father Vaughan hopes soon to make it a bi-weekly. "I can conceive of no better means of keeping up the courage and spirits of our unfortunate guests from Belgium," writes Father Vaughan, "than the circulation among them of a paper which will appeal to their domestic, social, patriotic and religious instincts." It is said that there are in London alone nearly seventy thousand Belgians who neither speak nor understand English. A paper in their own language will be a great boon to the refugees, although if it contains as little real news from the Continent as the London Times, for example, it will not be particularly enlightening.

Within the present year, Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran and Episcopalian clergymen, have spoken on the danger of irreligious schools. In some sections of the country, Lutheran parochial schools flourish, and the Episcopalians have a few schools and colleges in which religion is taught. The other religious bodies, unmindful of the warning given by some of their leaders, seem content to put up with the present non-religious, which in practice is irreligious, system of schools. In the current "American Jewish Year Book," Dr. J. H. Greenstone writes that more than two-thirds of the future American Jews "are allowed to grow up outside the sphere of any religious influence or guidance." London, with an estimated Jewish population of 150,000, provides religious instruction for nearly 25,000 children. New York, with a far larger population, cares for scarcely one-fifth of that number. The present annual expenditure for elementary Jewish education in the United States is estimated at something more than $1,000,000.00. If all children of school age are to be reached, Dr. Greenstone calculates that, at a minimum rate of $8.00 yearly, an annual expenditure of $3,200,000.00 will be required. The New York Kehillah (Jewish Congregation) established a bureau of education in 1910, and has been laboring with some success to further religious education. But progress has been slow.

To a certain extent, one may look indulgently upon the doddering zoophily of Our Dumb Animals. But that periodical as a teacher of Scripture and Church History is intolerable. On the first page of the November issue, the Rev. A. A. Berle, D.D. is permitted to utter, among other inanities, two supremely foolish statements. The first is, that there is absolutely no evidence that Christ ever taught dogma, or required the acceptance of dogma for membership in His Church. In reply, it may be submitted that Dr. Berle's very assumption that Christ founded a Church to which we must submit is a dogma. Next, Dr. Berle's attention may be drawn to the scriptural fact, that Christ promised damnation to all who refused belief to His teaching and to the teaching of the Apostles. This is a fair proof that the acceptance of dogma is necessary for fellowship with Christ, and eternal salvation. Dr. Berle's second statement is that the catastrophe of Christianity was wrought by the Council of Nicea in the year 325 A. D. Dr. Berle's nicety in adding "A. D." is superfluous. There were no councils of Christian bishops before the coming of Christ. Again Dr.

Berle's attention is drawn to Christ's promise to be with His Church all days, even to the consummation of the world. Possibly Dr. Berle's reading of the text is "Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the year 325 A. D." One notes with grief that Dr. Berle writes "D.D." after his name. The proposed investigation of the theological schools by the Carnegie Foundation is indeed greatly needed.

A social force of great importance was given definite shape in New York recently, when the Catholic "Big Brother Movement" was organized under the name of "The Catholic Boys' Protective League." Delegates from the Knights of Columbus, the Holy Name Society, the Laymens' Retreat League, and other societies, were present at the meeting. The work will be carried on under the able supervision of the Rev. Thomas J. Lynch, and in order to reach all neglected or delinquent boys, the city will be divided into districts, each with its chairman and committee. A League of this kind, aiming mainly at preventive work among boys, will do an immense amount of good. The plan has been tried with considerable success under Catholic auspices in St. Louis, Cincinnati, Chicago and a few other cities. It should be put into effect, and at once, in every city of any size in the country. Everywhere neglected Catholic children are being consigned to non-Catholic and even anti-Catholic guardianship. Juvenile court judges, as a rule, are not inclined to be unfair to Catholic interests. But if Catholics take no interest in Catholic strays, providing neither homes nor guardians for them, the juvenile court authorities have no choice but to commit the child to a non-Catholic institution or guardianship. This is not unfairness on the part of the judge. He is merely following the provisions of the law. It is a shameful, and sometimes a criminal, negligence on the part of the Catholics of the community.

Representatives from the alumnæ associations of a hundred Catholic colleges and academies met in New York on November 27, for the purpose of forming a National Alumnæ Association. The object of the Association is "to unite the alumnæ of our colleges and academies for the purpose of constituting a moral, religious and social force."

> We plan to serve our schools by making possible an interchange of ideas; to compile a complete descriptive catalogue of Catholic schools, to establish an eligible list of Catholic normal graduates, to strengthen the social life of our alumnæ associations, and to encourage the reading of the Catholic press.

The Association is undertaking a great and much-needed work. The good which can be done by a group of Catholic women in each community, who will take a firm stand against the paganism of prevailing popular opinion, is beyond calculation. As has been pointed out more than once in the columns of AMERICA, Catholic women, for the most part, have held aloof from the various clubs and societies which have been formed within recent years for the purpose of influencing public opinion. Considering the tone and purpose of the majority of these societies, no other course was open to them. In the society planned by the National Alumnæ Association, these objectionable features will, of course, be absent. The movement has the approbation of their Eminences, the three American Cardinals.

It was not so long ago that the Belgian Catholic was considered in American public opinion or, at least, in that section of public opinion represented by the press as a brainless sort of clod, good enough perhaps for priest-ridden Belgium, but by no means desirable as an American citizen. The events of the last few months have changed that view. Albert is spoken of as the bravest King in Europe, and Americans are learning that Belgium has an art and a literature, too, perhaps, which America probably never will equal. Belgium, her King and her people, have been recognized by the modern world. Clippings taken from newspapers in six different States indicate this changed feeling. Should the war make migration necessary, the Belgians will find a warm welcome in this country. "We want farmers who know their business as thoroughly as do the farmers of Belgium," says the Charlestown News. "The present looks like an opportunity to get immigrants of a particularly desirable kind." "The Belgians are the best gardeners in the world," is the opinion of the Knoxville Sentinel. "They would be a great acquisition to Tennessee or any part of the South." "We need just this type of people," adds the Baltimore Sun. "Not only would these unfortunate but extremely worthy people make good citizens," writes the New Orleans States, "but they would become wealth-producers, both for themselves and the State. We hope Louisiana gets her share." "There are few people in the world with greater thrift, industry and skill than the Belgians," says the Dubuque Telegraph. "They will teach native-born Americans much in agriculture that can not be learned from books, and in the industries and sciences they will be equally welcome." The Birmingham Age-Herald notes that California and Minnesota are offering inducements to the Belgians to settle among them, and adds, "The Belgians are thrifty, industrious and law-abiding. In fact, they seem to have practically all the virtues and none of the faults of citizens." This praise, which is not at all exaggerated, must be very gratifying to those Belgians who hear it. But it is to be hoped that, as far as possible, the Belgians will remain at home. Whatever the outcome of the war, their country needs them.

The following letter, addressed to the editor, recently appeared in a modest corner of a Philadelphia newspaper:

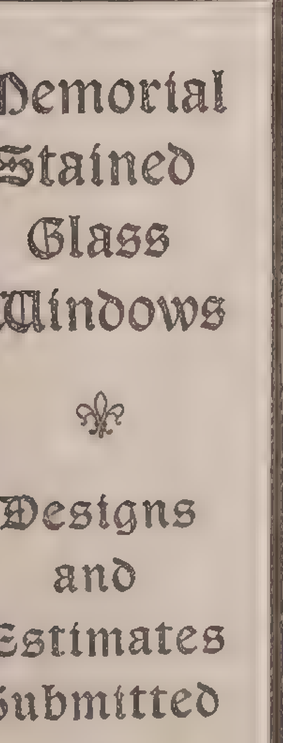
> To the Editor:
>
> It would be superfluous for me to say that the entire nation looks with approval upon your efforts in behalf of Belgium. I would, however, bespeak your aid—material as well as editorial—for some victims nearer home, and with an appeal to not only our heartstrings, but to our very sense of shame and common decency, viz.: to the outraged priests and nuns of Mexico.
>
> Surely the American people can not know of what is occurring in Mexico, otherwise they—Protestant, Jew, infidel and Catholic—would enter such a protest at Washington as would be felt in Mexico.
>
> Even in poor Belgium we do not hear of such beastly crimes against innocent, pure women, as is of record in Mexico. The United States has aided and abetted those incarnate devils, Villa, Villareal and his following, but for the United States no such orgies—outdoing those of the French Revolution—would or could have happened in Mexico. Can we now look on with indifference upon not ordinary offences, but crimes that cry to heaven and to every decent man's heart for punishment?
>
> I send you a marked copy of the Casket, telling of these horrors in Mexico. Will you kindly do something to lay before the world what is doing there?
>
> Scranton, Pa., Nov. 10. D. A. WEBB.

Perhaps, in the editor's judgment, the limits of toleration were passed by the insertion of this appeal; for, as yet, he has not seen fit to "do something to lay before the world what is doing there." A correspondent suggests that Catholic societies frankly buy advertising space in the daily papers, to bring these horrors, for which the American Government is largely responsible, to the notice of the American people. That this seems to be the only practical way for Catholics to obtain a hearing, is a sad commentary on the American newspaper's boasted "fair-mindedness."

CARNEGIE HALL—DEC. 9th

The

Dream of Gerontius



Composed by Edward Elgar
Poem by Cardinal Newman

The Oratorio Society of New York, Louis Koemmenich, Conductor, will present this immortal Catholic work for the sixth time as their 232d regular concert on Wednesday, Dec. 9th, at 8.15.

This great poetic conception of the condition of the soul, made known by the theology of the Catholic Church, has for its musical setting one of the most sublime Oratorios written—a truly inspired work, dramatic, soulful, unforgettable. "One can not help being a better Christian after having heard it," as a priest recently said.

Seats, 25c. to $2.00 at Box Office

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

WE OWN AND OFFER

First Mortgage Real Estate Serial Notes

OF

Sisters of St. Francis

(A Corporation)
TACOMA, WASHINGTON
GUARANTEED BY
Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis GLEN RIDDLE, PENNSYLVANIA
(Mother House of Order)

Denomination of Notes Five Hundred Dollars $500 Rate of Interest 5½% Per Annum

These notes are worthy of the utmost consideration, and we recommend them as being a high type of investment.

DETAIL CIRCULARS DESCRIBING PROPERTIES COVERED BY THIS MORTGAGE SENT ON REQUEST.

MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY

Real Estate Loan Department
SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI

Capital and Surplus $9,500,000

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

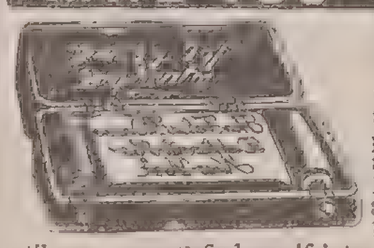
Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

Wanted Position as Housekeeper



FOR PRIEST BY REFINED MIDDLE AGED WOMAN. TEN YEARS EXPERIENCE AND REFERENCE.

Address

Housekeeper, Care America

55-59 East 83d Street, New York

HAVE YOU GOT ONE ?

We mean a Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator, with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll, that ideal assistant, always ready to quickly make 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), costs $5 but we don't want your money until you are satisfied, so if interested just write us to send it on 10 days' trial without deposit. That's fair enough, isn't it? Then send to-day.

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains several articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, NOV. 22.
This Issue is a Convert-Maker. Father JOHN A. COTTER, S.J., supplies in a paper entitled

The Architect's Plan

a guide for finding the true Church. Then follow Mgr. Benson's reflections on the "Happiness of Catholicism." A short article by Father Woods on "Infallibility" comes next, and the number ends with a brief answer by Father Dwight to the query "Was St. Peter in Rome?" This number of the CATHOLIC MIND will prove of great value to those who have converts to instruct. It should be distributed at missions and circulated widely among non-Catholics.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Eethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion.

1912

Joseph Husslein, S.J.
1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
12. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. Charles D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
18. The Index. Peter Finlay, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

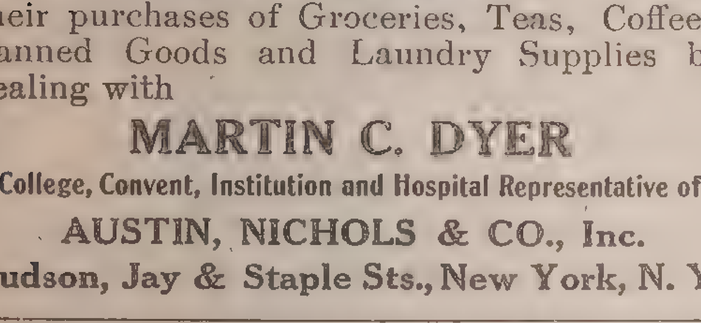
City..... State.....

Globe-Wernicke
Sectional Bookcase

A LEGACY for the future is a growing library in a Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcase. Built to grow, it costs no more than the ordinary kind, and lasts generations

Sections with glass doors of the "Quality First"—"Built-to-Endure"—Globe-Wernicke Construction, $2.25 and up. Catalog RR 111 and the World's Best Books sent on request.

On sale by 2,000 agents.



The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati
Makers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Steel and Wood), Globe Safes, Stationers' Supplies.

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on their purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
Hudson, Jay & Staple Sts., New York, N. Y.

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA
WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP
ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE,
SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

How To Reach Us:

2 Blocks from Chambers St. Ferry
3 Blocks from Barclay St. Ferry
3 Blocks from Brooklyn Bridge
2 Blocks from 6th Av. "L" Chambers St.
9th Av. "L" on Corner Warren St.
4 Blocks from Hudson Terminal Bldg.
3 Blocks from City Hall Subway Station

JAMES S. COWARD 264-274 Greenwich St (Near Warren St) NEW YORK
Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS
Inc.

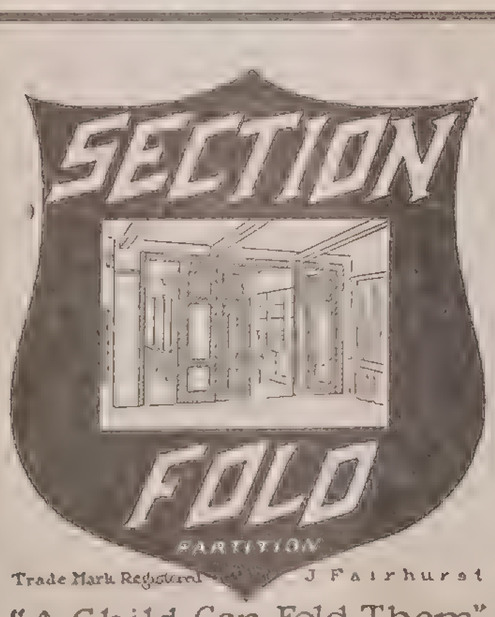
Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

116-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York



AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

"A Child Can Fold Them"

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

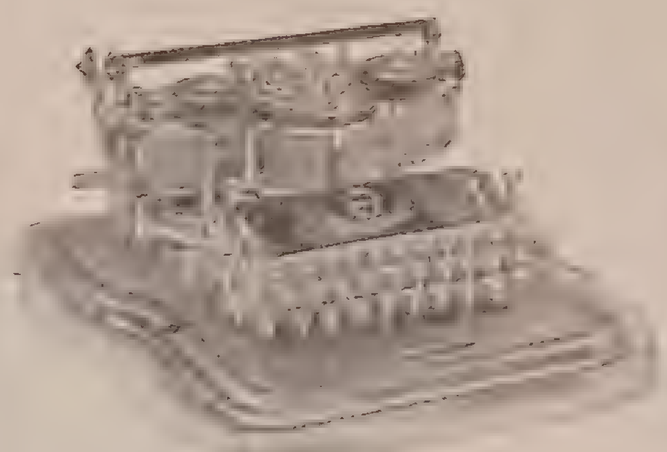
Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.



Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

CLERGYMEN
LINGUISTS

LITERARY WORKERS
PROFESSORS

The

MULTIPLEX HAMMOND

"Many Typewriters In One"
is the machine especially adapted for YOUR use.

Two styles of type, such as Pica and Italics, or two languages, such as English and Greek, are carried on the machine AT ONCE.

"JUST TURN THE KNOB"
and change instantly from one to the other

OTHER WINNING FEATURES

TAKES ANY WIDTH OF PAPER
HIGHEST SPEED
GREATEST DURABILITY
SIMPLE CONSTRUCTION
PERMANENTLY PERFECT ALIGNMENT
MOST portable standard typewriter

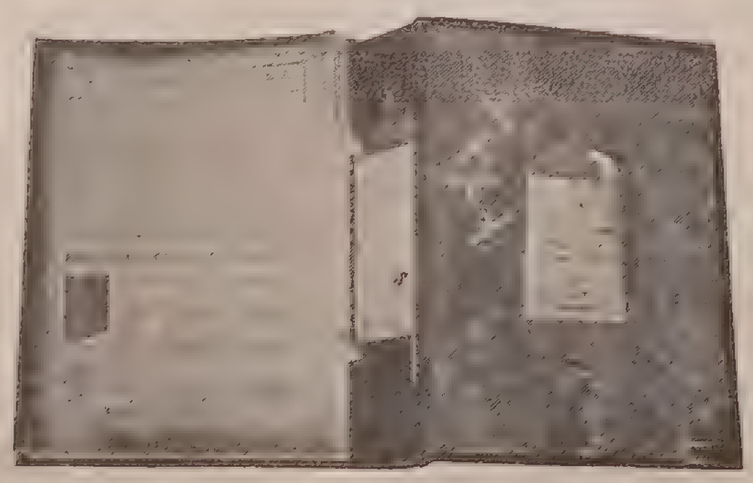
Important Multiplex Hammond Users



President Wilson,
Cardinal Merry del Val,
King Alfonso XIII of Spain,
King Ferdinand of Bulgaria,
The Caliph of Morocco,
Cardinal Gibbon's secretary.

Note:—Special proposition to the Clergy

Write TODAY for Multiplex Literature and beautiful half-tone reproduction of photograph of Cardinal Merry del Val using his Multiplex Hammond to

The Hammond Typewriter Company
69th Street and East River — New York, N. Y.

In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

BIND YOUR COPIES OF
AMERICA A Catholic Review of the Week

In Book Form For Future Reference

"BIG BEN" BINDER Is handsome and durable
Opens flat to any page

Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, NEW YORK, N. Y.
I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "BIG BEN" BINDER

*NAME*_____ *CITY*_____

*STREET*_____ *STATE*_____

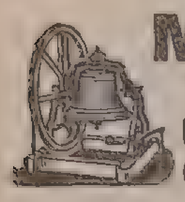
Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.



I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box X, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

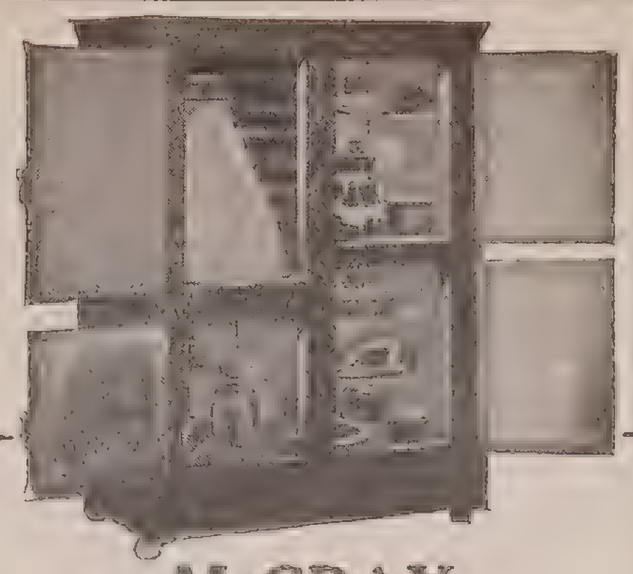
MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York



A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

McCRAY Refrigerators

are used in the best Catholic Institutions and in thousands of the finest Private Residences.

Any McCray can be arranged to ice from the outside. Hundreds of Catholic Institutions use McCray Refrigerators, either stock sizes or built in, and find them the greatest convenience and comfort as well as big savers of ice.

Send us a floor plan with dimensions and our designing department will work out the best and most economical solution of your refrigerator problem, furnishing blue prints, or suggesting a suitable stock size without cost or obligation.

Write for Catalog
No. 50 for Catholic Institutions. No. 91 for Residences.
The McCray Refrigerator Co.
682 Lake St., Kendallville, Ind.
Branches in all principal cities

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM
EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each
Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

It is in fact a very stirring call for recruits to the highest life, written throughout in a style that will catch the boyish ear, and it might almost be termed a sermon with the Decree of July 15th, 1912, as its text. Father Cassilly makes the most of his case, and does not forget to bring in that eminent member of his Society, Father Ribadeneira, whose vocation took its rise in the very unpromising occasion of a fight with another boy. We wish his pamphlet a large circulation and much fruit, and should like to see a reprint for use in our own country. — The Month.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times.

Cloth 30 cents — Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70 — 12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50 — 100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Priests, Brothers and Sisters are much needed in all parts of the United States. Is it not to be feared that many boys and girls who ought to give themselves up to God and to work for souls miss their vocation because they are not properly instructed? Father Cassilly in this "Chat for Young People" explains vocation to religious life and to the priesthood in a simple, attractive way that ought to appeal to our youth.—The Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Now Ready

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT
Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York
HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES
Conducted by the
Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary
Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City
PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES
European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.
For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute
For Girls and Young Ladies
Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.
Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph
IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.
Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University
PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE
Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings
Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music
A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.
Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.
Largest Catholic College in America
Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.
Send for catalogue to
PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY
Adjoining Bronx Park, New York
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city
Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS
Classical and Scientific Courses
St. John's Hall for Younger Boys
School of Law — 140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine — Fordham.
School of Pharmacy — Fordham.
Write for catalogue
Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest.

College of Saint Teresa
Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.
Winona, Minn.

CARLTON ACADEMY
SUMMIT, NEW JERSEY
A boarding school for boys under Catholic auspices, with laymen as teachers. Resident Chaplain. A country school in the Jersey hills, 21 miles from New York. 7-acre campus, beautiful residence and school buildings. Excellent standing in athletic sports. Small classes individual training. Prepares for college or for business. Catalog on request.
CHARLES H. SCHULTZ, A.M., Headmaster.

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN
College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK
DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS
Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station
PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST
COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students
WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS
PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA
The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.
A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.
Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS
COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS
74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year
Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.
FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

Made from

Grape Cream of Tartar

NO ALUM

Just Ready. A New Novel by Dr. Egan

THE IVY HEDGE

By MAURICE FRANCIS EGAN

Crown 8vo. Colored Jacket | A FINE GIFT | Net $1.35 By mail, $1.45

Dr. Egan's new novel, "The Ivy Hedge," is a picture quiet in tone, but rising at times to very noble heights, of life in the United States among both the rich and the poor. The character of the Canadian girl is a new type in fiction, and Dr. Egan's analysis of the effects of Socialism on well-meaning people who suffer from conditions which they can not analyze is absolutely true to life.

Competent critics have declared this to be the very best work of fiction yet published on those present conditions which lead to Socialism.

Subscribe to Benziger's Magazine. $2.00 a year; 3 years $4.00

BENZIGER BROTHERS,

NEW YORK 36-38 Barclay Street | CINCINNATI 343 Main Street | CHICAGO 214-216 W. Monroe Street

Nativity Group, with Panoramic Scene of Bethlehem. Made entirely of stone composition, beautifully decorated in oil tints. Size, 8′ x 5′8″ x 3′2″. Price, Rich Decoration, $165.00; Extra Rich, $185.00.

THE BERNARDINI STATUARY CO.

28 Barclay Street New York City

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 8
WHOLE No. 295

DECEMBER 5, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Nov. 24, p. m.-Dec. 1, a. m. — France and Belgium — Fighting at Arras — Lodz and Lowicz—Wielun, Soldau—East Prussia and Cracow—Naval Operations—Turkey—The Balkans. Austria-Hungary: The Shadow Upon Servia. France: A Minister Misinterpreted. Germany: Economic Provisions. Great Britain: A British Envoy to the Holy See—Army, Navy and Finance. Ireland: Chaplains for Irish Soldiers. Mexico: An Important Letter—A Sad Affidavit. 181-184

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Soldiers of Fortune — Into the Future — The Mission of the Catholic Press—Writers—Father Pardow — Mission Movement among Protestant Students 185-193

COMMUNICATIONS
Church Extension Society and Mexican Refugees —The Italian Question—Help for the Mexicans —Help for War Victims—Concerted Action—Opinion of an Expert—Russians and the Church. 193-197

EDITORIALS
Wary Theatregoing—A Grateful Acknowledgment—The First of Many Brethren—Belgium's Answer—A Warning to Parents—Antipathy and Sympathy 198-200

LITERATURE
The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry, IV, Louise Imogen Guiney.

REVIEWS: Cathedrals and Cloisters of Northern France—Westminster Abbey—Life in America One Hundred Years Ago—Through the Grand Canyon from Wyoming to Mexico—Down West —The Sunny Side of Diplomatic Life—Chemistry—The Dread of Responsibility.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: October's "Best Sellers"—Governor Walsh's Thanksgiving Proclamation—The Latest Pax—"The Book of the Blue Sea"—"May Iverson's Career" — "Patty's Suitors" — "The Wonderful Romance" — "Lady Rum-Di-Doodle-Dum's Children" — "The Curly-haired Hen"—"The Eskimo Twins"—"The Secret of Pocomoke"—Recent Music.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....200-205

EDUCATION
Medical Schools and Their Critics.....205

ECONOMICS
Finding the Remedy.....205-207

NOTE AND COMMENT
The Anti-Profanity League—Catholic Spirit of the Belgians—Rosary for the Souls in Purgatory —A Revival of the Classics—Hearing All Sides —Heroism of Priests and Nuns on the Battlefield — Old-Fashioned Methods of Teaching — Proselyting Social Workers—A Modern Instance of Catholic Heroism—The Convincing Answer to Defamers of the Church.....207, 208

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Belgium there has been comparative calm throughout the week. Infantry attacks were very rare and the opposing armies contented themselves for the most part with intermittent artillery fire. The same is true of the line of battle in France, except at Reims, where the Germans have been continuing a heavy bombardment; and in the Argonne region, where the Germans have repeatedly made infantry attacks, which, however, have been repulsed; and in Alsace, where the French have been prosecuting a vigorous offensive. The reasons assigned for the lull in the fighting are the severity of the weather, the condition of the land in Flanders, and the exhaustion of both sides.

Bulletin, Nov. 24, p. m.-Dec. 1, a. m.

In particular Germany, no doubt, has been transferring all the troops that she could spare to Poland, waiting for the outcome of the eastern campaign before resuming vigorous operations in the West. France, on the other hand, has played a waiting game so long that she can well afford to rest until she has received the heavy reenforcements that Great Britain is sending to the front, both from England itself and from the Colonies. England is probably voicing the sentiments of the Allies in her repeated statements that the war will only begin in the spring, at least in this sense that they are content to delay anything like an active offensive until they have had time to muster, equip and train enough troops to give them an overwhelming superiority in numbers. It is certain that the longer the war drags on the stronger grow the hopes of the Allies. The amazing strength that Germany has shown in being able to keep the war almost exclusively in the enemy's country has been due largely to the fact that she was prepared, and the Allies were not. In this matter her advantage is lessening every day. Germany seems to realize this, for there are indications that she is preparing to make another strong attempt to break through the Allies at Arras, where she is reported to be massing many thousands of men. Her victories throughout the war have been gained by her ability to concentrate more soldiers at a given point than her enemies; and her weakness, especially in France, has been due to the lengthening out of the line of battle to such an extent that such concentration became impossible. Arras in some ways is the key to the position of the Allies, and if the Germans should succeed in carrying it, the situation in France might quickly change. This, together with the fact that the Germans at Arras have renewed a heavy artillery fire, and made some daring infantry attacks, apparently with the object of testing the strength of the enemy, gives color to the statement that desperate fighting will soon be begun again. As for the rumors, which are so common just now, that the Germans are soon to retire from France into Belgium, they may safely be discredited. There seems little doubt that Germany has fortified a very strong line of defence in Belgium against the day of possible retreat, but no solid reasons are forthcoming to prove even the remote necessity of such a movement. The mere fact of the cessation of the offensive, which she has been so long maintaining in France and Belgium, has ample explanation in the state of affairs existing in the east.

France and Belgium

Fighting at Arras

Reports from Berlin and Petrograd have been so much at variance and at times so completely contradictory that it is very difficult to form a clear idea of the situation in Poland. At the centre, west of Warsaw, both sides claim very large captures of the enemies' troops and guns; as many as 60,000 men were reported on the same day to have been taken prisoners at the same place by each side. It appears now, however, from the names of the towns mentioned by the Russian official dispatches that the line of battle has shifted its position very little during the week, and that very severe fighting is still going on at Lodz and Lowicz. Judging from the dispatches of Petrograd it would seem that the German armies at both these places are in considerable danger of being surrounded, three parts of the circle at Lodz having been already completed. Communications, however, are still open, and reenforcements are being hurried to their aid. As these places, together with Gombin, marked the furthest points of the German advance a week ago, and as even the Russians admit that they are still in the possession of the Germans, one will not be far wrong if he puts down as gross exaggerations the reports that have been current about an overwhelming German defeat. It looks now as though this defeat meant nothing more than a turning back of the German advance guard or a successful effort on the part of the Russians to stop the German progress; or at most that the Russians were able not only to halt their own retirement but even to take up a strong counter offensive movement. Berlin is less detailed in her reports; one gathers from them, however, that the Germans are now on the defensive, but continue to hold their ground. A crushing victory for either side grows daily more unlikely with two such able strategists in control as Marshal von Hindenburg and the Grand Duke Nicholas.

Lodz and Lowicz

East of Wielun a German army is making great efforts to fight its way north to the relief of the army at Lodz. In southern East Prussia, near Soldau, another German army is making the same desperate attempt to fight its way south to reenforce the army at Lowicz. If they can succeed in both these movements the tide of battle will probably turn once more in favor of the Germans. At present, however, at both Lodz and Lowicz the Germans are outnumbered and in danger of being outflanked; but so far, in spite of heavy losses, have not given ground. On the eastern border of East Prussia there has been comparative quiet, but in Southern Poland, parallel to the Silesian border, severe fighting is reported at Novo Radomsk, and all along the line from Czenstochowa to Miechow, which is about twenty miles distant from Cracow, where the Austrians are making vigorous efforts to push back the Russians from their fortress. Over to the south, in Galicia, they are resisting the Russians, who have again assumed the offensive and have crossed the Donajec river and advanced to within twenty-five miles of Cracow.

Wielun, Soldau

East Prussia and Cracow

Another naval disaster has resulted in the destruction of the British pre-dreadnaught Bulwark. A sudden explosion took place as the warship lay at anchor in the Thames off the Sheerness dockyard. Of the crew of 815 men only fourteen were rescued. No explanation has as yet been given. Some think that it was the work of a German submarine, others are inclined to attribute it to the work of a spy, but nothing certain is known of its cause. Needless to say this new loss, within thirty-five miles of London, has come as a great shock to the British people. The following day two British steamers were torpedoed by German submarines in the English Channel and sunk. On the other hand, the Germans have lost a submarine, which was destroyed by a British destroyer off the coast of Scotland, and also a destroyer which was accidently rammed and sunk by a Danish steamer. In addition they are reported to have lost six submarines in the bombardment of Zeebrugge, their naval base on the Belgian coast. The reason assigned for this bombardment is the recent naval activity of the Germans in the Strait of Dover and the English Channel and the consequent anxiety for British shipping and for the safety of the transports that are conveying Territorials in large numbers to France. Two other losses are reported, though unofficially. It is said that the German battleship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and the German cruiser Hertha struck mines, the former in the Baltic and the latter off Libau, and that both have sunk. Neither report has been confirmed.

Naval Operations

The campaign against the Turks has not yet assumed a very important character. Apparently the Allies have not thought it necessary to send large bodies of troops across the Mediterranean. Two engagements of a very minor character have taken place near the Suez Canal, in which the Turks are said to have had the advantage. The danger, however, is increasing, because an army of 76,000 Turks are on the march toward Egypt. The British are confident that Egypt can not be invaded. Their troops are reported to be in strong positions and to be prepared to resist the Turks before they reach the Canal, while the Canal itself is an almost impassable barrier. Italy, too, has signified her intention to keep the Canal open because of existing treaties and trade.

Turkey

There are persistent reports of diplomatic agitation in the Balkan States, and rumors of proposals for territorial concessions to be made as the reward for their entrance into the conflict. Russia especially is said to be very active; and there is talk of another Balkan alliance, the motive being the old and hitherto thwarted but never abandoned ambitions for expansion. So far, however, there appears to be little likelihood of their entering the conflict. If they should do so, however, it would be on the side of the Allies. Servia claims, and the claim is admitted at Vienna, to have partially checked the Austrians south of Belgrade.

The Balkans

Austria-Hungary.—The results of the trial of the murderer of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand and of the abettors of the deed were not confined to the sentence which condemned five of the chief accomplices to death and limited the punishment of two other criminals and of the murderer himself to twenty years' imprisonment, because of their youth. The principal disclosure was the complicity of Servian officials in the plot. The details which now reach us in great fulness, show that this deed was the climax of long revolutionary conspiracies in which the Servian Crown Prince seems to have been personally a participant. It is, of course, known that he had given a special audience to the bomb-thrower, Cabrinowitsch, who was introduced to him by the director of the Servian state printery. The last named is a leader of the Narodna Odbrana, whose head is General Jankowitsch. Under the egis of this organization, as the witness Grcor testified, there existed a Belgrade society whose purpose was to weaken Austria-Hungary by assassination, espionage and revolution. Similar student societies were said to have existed likewise in the dual monarchy itself. The fact that mere Servian striplings freely discussed among themselves the intended murder of the Archduke is horrifying. A still darker shadow is cast upon the Servian Crown Prince by his previous relations with Luka Jugitsch, the would-be assassin of the Ban or Governor of Croatia. Jugitsch, we are informed, had likewise been favored with the personal acquaintance of the Crown Prince. When the trial took place a Servian university professor delivered the greetings of the Prince to the accused. The Belgrade Government had previously given money for the Agram student movement of which the attempted murder was the culmination. Visiting students were always received at Belgrade, we are told, by the Crown Prince in person or by one of his generals. The complicity in the murder plot against the Archduke on the part of the chief of the royal Servian detective force and the chief of police was testified by a witness upon his deathbed. There is no need of further multiplying the instances which have led to the statement of the Austrian press that murder was apparently part of Servian state politics. This matter should be carefully studied, since it is of the utmost importance in deciding upon the cause of the great world war.

The Shadow Upon Servia

France.—Claiming that his previous letters on the subject of religious ceremonies had been grievously misunderstood and misinterpreted, M. Millerand has addressed a circular letter to the military commanders. The Minister asserts that his purpose was nothing more than "to safeguard liberty of conscience," and that he merely wished to prohibit "such religious services as would entail on the military hospitals the obligation to take part in the services." This hardly explains the Minister's dislike for the ordinary insignia of religion, and it will still be felt that the previous orders of the Minister exhibited no striking desire to safeguard the liberty of conscience of France's Catholic soldiers. Even his latest communication orders that "all the provisions of former circulars be strictly enforced." The Minister then adds:

A Minister Misinterpreted

> But in no case are the wounded, or persons attached to the sanitary corps, to be deprived of the right to perform religious ceremonies, or to receive religious blessings, precisely as they would at their own firesides.

Thus, it would seem, one must be wounded or attached to a sanitary corps, before he may, as a soldier of France, exercise his liberty of conscience by performing religious services, or receiving "religious blessings."

Germany.—Countless economic provisions have been taken to prevent a possible shortage of food. Articles which are likely to be soon exhausted are to be sparingly used, while only those which are present in sufficient abundance are to be freely consumed. Thus likewise the slaughter of cattle not yet full grown is restricted by definite laws. Rye bread is as far as possible to take the place of wheat bread. The latest decrees of the Bundesrat fix the price of potatoes. For this purpose the country is divided into four sections within which the prices are variously assigned according to the different qualities. The buying or selling of the gold coin of the Empire at prices above the nominal value is punishable with imprisonment and fine. The time for protest on bills of exchange in Alsace, Lorraine, East Prussia and a few cities in West Prussia is prolonged to thirty days. This extension, in addition to the regular time, now gives a protest period of 150 days. Special decrees are likewise made in regard to the use of wheat flour for certain sections, while it is forbidden to place wheat bread freely at the disposal of guests in hotels and restaurants. Such regulations are not an indication of weakness, but a wise provision against future danger. It is evident that a long continuance of the war is expected. Germany remains confident of success, but will leave nothing to chance.

Economic Provisions

Great Britain.—Sir Henry Howard, K.C.M.G., K.C.B., formerly British Minister to the Hague, and one of the English envoys to the Hague Peace Conferences of 1899 and 1907, has been accredited British Envoy to the Holy See. While he is ostensibly charged with

A British Envoy to the Holy See the mission of congratulating the Holy Father on his accession to the Pontificate, it is thought that the appointment will be permanent. The new envoy, who is a Catholic, entered the diplomatic service in 1865. His wife, who died in 1907, was Miss Cecilia Riggs, of Washington.

Army, Navy and Finance

In his speech to the House of Lords on November 26, Lord Kitchener expressed his satisfaction with the conduct and with the results of the operations of the Allies. Lord Kitchener emphasized Sir John French's successful resistance to the advance of the enemy, in spite of the fact that German supports had been pushed up in large numbers. Addressing the House of Commons on the following day, the First Lord of the Admiralty said that there was every reason for complete confidence in the power of the navy to give effect to the wishes and purposes of the Empire. It was because of the navy that supplies had been freely received from every quarter, and that troops had been transported without a single mischance, wherever required. England could lose one superdreadnaught monthly for a year and still retain her numerical superiority. Against Germany's three, the Government proposed to build fifteen ships of the highest type in 1915. Financially, it would seem that the Government will have almost a free hand. According to the London Daily Chronicle, the war loan of one billion, seven hundred and fifty million dollars has been over-subscribed by a billion and a quarter dollars. Confidence in the ultimate success of the plans adopted by the Government is unimpaired.

Ireland.—As the result of a lengthy agitation, sixteen additional Catholic war chaplains have been appointed, of whom eight have been named by Cardinal Logue.

Chaplains for Irish Soldiers

Previously there had been but one priest with the six cavalry divisions of 32,000 men, and seven with the eighteen infantry divisions of 360,000. There is now one chaplain for each of the twenty-five divisions and four for the twelve general hospitals. This does not bear out the statement officially sent by the War Office to the Irish Catholic that "the basis of allotment has been altered to allow of one Catholic chaplain for each such regiment as well as one for each General Hospital." As the appointments made are for divisions and not for regiments, a large proportion of Catholic soldiers are still unprovided for. The Irish Catholic, which terms the War Office's previous conduct of the matter "heartless and cruel," finds conditions still more appalling in the navy, which has 223 Protestant chaplains and but one commissioned Catholic chaplain. The Bishops of Ireland had protested against the neglect of the spiritual interests of Catholic sailors as well as soldiers, but so far the Admiralty has apparently taken no measures to remedy it.

Mexico.—This letter has been received from the Department of State:

November 27, 1914.

MR. R. H. TIERNEY, Chairman,
Committee of the Federation of Catholic Societies,
59 East 83rd Street, New York City.

An Important Letter

SIR:—The Department acknowledges the receipt of your letter of October 17, 1914, with which you enclose a statement outlining conditions in Mexico. You ask this Government to rescue the priests and nuns who took refuge at Vera Cruz, and also that this Government withhold its recognition of any government in Mexico which does not grant real freedom of worship.

In reply you are informed that the Department has carefully considered your letter and its enclosures.

With reference to the priests and nuns who had taken refuge at Vera Cruz, the Department would advise you that orders have been issued by the Secretary of War to General Funston to convey all priests and nuns who desire to leave, to the United States, and it is the understanding of the Department that this order has been complied with.

Regarding your request that this Government withhold its recognition of any Government in Mexico that does not grant real freedom of worship, the Department informs you that it will defer final decision as to whether or not to accord recognition to a Government in Mexico until the time shall have arrived for making such a decision. When that time arrives, the Department assures you that the question of religious freedom in Mexico will receive due consideration.

The Department has shown your letter with accompanying enclosures to the President, and it has received from him a written reply in which he says: "I am distressed that our Catholic fellow-countrymen do not more fully realize how frequent and serious our attempts have been to act in the interest of their people in Mexico."

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

W. J. BRYAN.

The following statement, which was made under oath, tells a story of incredible brutality:

A Sad Affidavit

The sad and lamentable situation of our Mexican Republic compels me to state under oath the conditions which exist in Mexico as a result of the diabolical persecution of the Catholic Church. Our temples are closed, our churches profaned. On our altars the Holy Sacrifice is no longer offered. Our confessionals have been burned in the public squares and there is hardly one who dares to approach the Sacrament of Penance, even in the most remote corner of a house. . . . Homes are desolate, mothers cry over the death of their sons, fathers are torn from their families for service with the troops while their children weep at bidding their parent a last farewell. Our priests are persecuted. They wander about without anything to eat. . . . The blood of our brothers runs in the streets. Nuns are taken to barracks and robbed of their virtue. It appears as if hell were unbarred and devils had taken possession of men. . . . Anarchy and revenge have seized their hearts. . . . In some churches Carranzistas have inpersonated priests saying Mass and have occupied the confessionals, hearing confessions and disclosing what has been told them. (Of all this I have been witness) . . . Immorality has spread to such a degree that not only have virgins been violated, but even nuns have been taken away by force and are being subjected to the most horrible suffering. . . . In a great many cases young women after having been compelled to lead this life (of shame) were thrown out into the street, some being killed as though they were animals. . . .

The revelations will be continued in next week's issue.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Soldiers of Fortune

You will confer a favor upon me by replying to the following questions through your columns. Is a citizen and resident of a neutral country who enlists in the cause of a belligerent nation, with the sole object of gratifying his desire of excitement and adventure, morally answerable from the standpoint of the Catholic religion for any deaths he may inflict? What is the position of one who enlists for the sole reason that he believes the cause which he espouses to be just and desires to fight for it? Kindly give reasons.

C. F. CAVANAUGH.

JUSTICE is the first thing to be considered in a war. No one may take part in a war he sees to be unjust: the accomplishment of justice should be the chief intention, though not necessarily the most explicit, of every soldier. To exclude every consideration of justice would make one guilty of most grave injustice, even though he should pass through a war without shedding a drop of blood. Besides, he would be guilty "in the cause," as we say, of all the usual accompaniments and consequences of war. Hence, to enlist, either at home or abroad, with the sole object of gratifying the desire of excitement or adventure, without consideration of the justice of the cause espoused, would be gravely illicit.

There are two kinds of military service, compulsory and voluntary. In both each individual must have his conscience clear that he is not violating justice. Service in this country is voluntary; and one may have enlisted before a war, or during it. In the first case his condition is similar to that of one under compulsory service. He is bound to obey orders not evidently unjust. This obligation is proximate and grave. Unless, therefore, the injustice of the war is clear, the more pressing duty of obedience binds him, and he can leave the responsibility on those whose function it is to declare war or make peace. Should he propose to enlist during a war, he is bound theoretically to assure himself of its justice. Practically, however, his position does not differ from that of one already enlisted. His country has a claim on him; and this suffices to allow him to take up a cause not evidently unjust, leaving the responsibility to those who are chiefly answerable, and who can determine best the question of justice, since they are fully acquainted with the cause.

But now comes the case of an alien. Neither side has a claim on him. He is, therefore, bound to examine the justice of the matter very seriously. His doubt may be positive or negative. It is negative when he sees no reason for either side; and so simply does not know whether the cause is just or not. In this case Suarez would allow him to trust a good, upright ruler under whose banner he would enlist. However this may be, things have changed since Suarez's day; and, though rulers may try to be good and upright personally, the principles governing their political action are too often such as have called for the condemnation of the Holy See. Practically the doubt becomes a positive one. There are reasons on both sides that must be examined. One can not do this himself, as a general rule. He can not take the newspapers as his guide. Their principles are too often unsound; not infrequently they are subsidized, and it happens sometimes that they are moved by thoughts of profit rather than of justice. Public opinion is generally the reflection of the daily press; and many people, even good Catholics, are not free from the revolutionary ideas that have filled the air for a century. They will hold à priori that the cause of a revolting nationality is just, and that the presumption is always against emperors and kings. The examination, therefore, must be made by one skilled in sound ethics and sufficiently acquainted with the facts.

The result of the investigation will be, very probably, that the reasons on both sides will appear about equal. In this case one, who purely of his own initiative would enlist, must follow the safe course. The question is a practical one. He will have, on his own responsibility only, to undertake the infliction of injury on the goods and the lives of others. This infliction is lawful only when done under the authorization of a supreme authority that has acquired the right to inflict such injury on an unjust aggressor. If the acquisition of such a right is not clear to the alien in question, then for him the condition of the other side as the possessors of goods and life must be held the better one. But what if both sides should be enlisting regiments of mercenaries? In this case it seems clear that the alien enlisting would no longer be acting purely of his own initiative. Rather, the first impulse would come from those who invite him to their standard. Two things, therefore, must be noted. First, each contending power, by using this means of warfare, grants implicitly to the other the right to use the same, provided it can find in its cause a just title to do so; and second, though a war can not be materially just on both sides, it may be so formally; or, in other words, though the right, objectively considered, can not be on both sides, yet each party through a closer and a continuous consideration of the reasons favoring its side of the question, and the natural inclination one has to justify himself, may reach the conviction that it is in the right. Hence both can engage lawfully in the war, and both can use mercenaries as a means of warfare. This being the case, the alien, under the implicit mutual concession we have noted, is relieved of the necessity of following the safer course. In former times the employment of mercenaries was common enough; and the case, as we have described it, seems to be the one contemplated by the theologians of the time in saying that, when the reasons for the justice of the war are probable on both sides, a soldier may enlist on whichever side he prefers. Some went so far as to hold that, at least in this case, he might rely entirely on the good faith of the ruler under whose banner he would enlist. But this opinion others rejected, since, as we have seen, it is the clear obligation of obedience in conflict with the doubtful obligation of abstaining from a war, that justifies such a course; and by that obligation of obedience the mercenary is not held to enlist. Moreover, if that opinion was held unsound in times when better principles of international ethics prevailed, it is absolutely untenable under existing conditions. We say, then, that in the case as now proposed, the alien wishing to enlist must have sound intrinsic reasons approved by competent authority in favor of the justice of the cause he would embrace. Some hold that in this case, provided such solid reasons be found, he is not bound to examine both sides. This seems reasonable. The only reason for such an examination would be the obligation to follow the safer course which, in this case, as now presented, ceases to exist.

The expression "desire of excitement and adventure" is ambiguous. It may mean that one goes to war as one goes to hunt big game in Africa, to gratify his desire of showing his skill in shooting, even of destroying life, or of the free, sensual side of military life, for which he is ready to endure its harder side of discipline, and even to risk his own life. Clearly such motives are not admirable. Or it may mean the desire of change of scene or occupation; or, if he be a soldier, to exercise and perfect himself in his profession. Or it may mean the desire to practise manly virtues, courage, fortitude, magnanimity, praiseworthy in the natural order, and in the supernatural order meritorious. As we have seen, the principal deciding motive for entering upon a war must be its justice, so that, if it be not just, nothing may induce one to take part in it. But, given the just war, there is no reason why such motives as those of our second category should not be the proximate impelling motives inducing one to enlist.

Lastly, another point must be considered, the character of the person going to war. War contains many occasions of sin. Will they be for him proximate or remote? If of themselves proximate, can he, and will he, make them remote by prayer and sacraments? One may not expose himself to the proximate occasion of sin. Still more care is necessary in an undertaking that keeps him in daily occasion of death.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Into the Future

THOUGH dark clouds of uncertainty are at present overhanging Europe, there are at least two small rifts in the gloom, through which tiny glimpses of the future may be had with some degree of surety. The first presage concerns the Catholic Church in France; the second, our popular perfectionist theories. Ever since Robespierre and his fellow extremists salaamed to the Goddess of Reason on the Champ de Mars, back in 1793, Christianity has been more or less snubbed in the land of Voltaire. For the spirit of the Revolution did not die with the leaders thereof. Rationalistic liberty, rising out of a sea of blood, carried seeds of new ideas in her reeking hands and scattered them on the air. They readily struck root in French enthusiasm. Positivism and infidelity sprang up, and bore as rancid blossoms some of the vilest affronts the Church of God has ever suffered.

Ernest Renan, "arch-Arian of the nineteenth century," coolly referred, with sarcasm crueler than swords, to our gentle Elder Brother as "that delicious young man from Galilee" and "that delightful charlatan"! But the climatic offence was achieved when, in 1907, the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of almost three to two, "put out the star of Bethlehem forever"! Such unspeakable contumely, combined with the revocation of the Concordat, consequent confiscation of church property, and subsequent exile of penniless religious, whose only fault was that they were making sordid France a little purer, constitute one of the most wretched pages of French history.

Bravely the laicized nuns turned to avocations for which they were in no wise fitted. God only knows how many poor little Sister Pascals encountered the world in its harshest aspects! Other nuns crossed the ocean rather than relinquish their habit, and sought in the land of strangers what was denied them in the country which had given them birth, and to which they had given their all. No resentment smoldered in their bosoms. The philosophy of the humble Galilean is forgiveness. Perhaps, at the time, such meekness pierced the conscience of the unique malefactors who had routed God from heaven, His servants from their homes, and, most important of all, simultaneously increased their own salaries. Human hearts, even such as theirs, are not stones. Still it remained for the present dire misfortune of the mother-land to heap burning coals on the heads of these infidel wielders of French fortunes. In less than four short months France has witnessed innumerable examples of Catholic patriotism, which must have impressed her with deep admiration and burning shame.

Not only have the laicized religious eagerly responded to her distressful cries, but also the exiles. Certainly these abused sons and daughters owed nothing to a country which had stripped them of everything. Had they judged according to the standards with which they had been judged, they would have let her lie sick and unaided on the rough bed which she has prepared for herself. But the religion which she elected to despise sanctions no such heartlessness, even toward the heartless. Shoulder to shoulder with their ci-devant enemies, priests are now sharing the perils with which the land is so besieged. And, in the midst of battle, gentle nuns are plying the services which, seven years ago, were so brusquely repudiated, but are now so piteously sought. From Saint Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Fathers Lava-tois, Baisnée, and Naimfort, men of high attainment and refinement, have crossed the Atlantic to mingle in scenes which must needs tear their souls. Theirs is the sacrifice of countless others.

Undeniably all this is patriotism of the superbest character. Truly there can not but be enkindled in even the coldest anti-Catholic French hearts a sincere respect for this splendid spirit, for the forgiveness which gave it birth, and for the Church which taught the forgiveness! Surely, whatever the issue of the war, new sentiments toward Catholicism will prevail in France; for, if she is overpowered, she can not but praise, even with her dying breath, the staunch fidelity of her wronged Catholic children; if she gloriously survives, she can not but reward it. The great pendulum of public thought sometimes needs only a touch of sentiment to be set in motion, when a typhoon of argument would fail. Who knows but that in France, under the soft influence of the newborn respect for things Catholic, it will begin to swing slowly back to the grand old religion from which it receded in the madding days of over a century ago? The idea is stupendous; God's designs are more so.

The next presage regards not only France, but all Europe, in fact, the world. Present-day theories of sweeping reform will be seen in a new light. For this titanic contest is a scathing commentary on the grandiose schemes so widely afloat, such as Socialism, universal peace, etc., and is yet another proof of that solid truth which theorists find so hard to digest: reform must begin not from without, but within. Theories can never conquer men until men conquer themselves; and that they are far from having done so, the present bitter crisis evinces. What glittering promises the Hague sent forth to the four corners of the earth only a few months ago! Men's hearts were then free from passion. But on the very eve of the silvery rising of universal peace, the skies darkened, rumbled, and flashed with the most fearful of wars. The cause of the storm is plain: peace should have begun in men's hearts and not in Holland. The world would have shrieked a protest if the builders of the magnificent peace palace had chosen a site of quick-sand; yet the quickest of sands are men's own unbridled tendencies. Schemes, no matter how noble, sink when placed on such a foundation.

All this likewise applies to Socialism. Exposition need not be made of such eloquent episodes as Lane's elaborate failure in South America, and the pitiful mal-adjustments in New Zealand; these are ancient history—black marks against the practicability of the system which can not be erased. But in its most recent hour of test, Socialism has again proved wofully unsuited to man. At a frown from human passion it became queasy and tottered. Quite oblivious of their avowed principles of fraternity and peace, the doctrine's adherents are now busily in the fray, slaughtering the men whom a few days ago they were so enthusiastic to save, filling Europe with the very economic problems which they boasted to have solved and dissolved, allowing their high-flown principles ignominiously to fall to man's basest moral plane, rather than exalting man to the level of those principles.

When fair peace once more dawns upon the dark, turbulent sea of human events, and social improvement is again whispering to the would-be leaders of men, it can not be doubted that these salient facts, so strikingly brought home, by the present mammoth engagement, will not be overlooked; theories must be suited to man and man to theories, if theories are to be effective; and the greater the scheme of betterment, the better man's nature must be prepared for its reception. Then will men be very apt to hearken anew to the voice of old from Nazareth; for the only successful improver of human nature which the world has ever known is religion.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

The Mission of the Catholic Press

"MISSION" means "a sending"; and properly the Catholic Press is not sent. Like Topsy, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," it is a thing that "growed"; a natural output of Catholic energy, a natural expression of Catholic life, imposing a mission on itself. For "mission," therefore, I must understand "proper aim and object."

Using "mission" in this sense, I should say that the mission of the Catholic Press is identical with the mission of the Catholic Church. The mission of the Catholic Church can be taken in a narrower or a broader sense. (1) In its stricter sense, the mission of the Church is to preserve and transmit the revealed message of Christian faith, morals and worship to mankind; and to persuade as many as possible to accept it and live up to it, with eternal salvation as the result. (2) But in its wider sense the mission of the Church is, in addition to the above, to encourage and aid every kind of human activity, mental or physical, material as well as spiritual, which helps to the betterment of mankind in body, mind and soul; everything which tends to a higher self-development and self-realization of man's nature as God intended it to be.

The Church's encouragement in this line extends not only to things which directly promote eternal salvation, but also to things which are merely innocent and indifferent thereto. Thus the Church can be deeply interested even in athletics or in trade, simply on the ground that they are both human things making in some way for the betterment of the race. The Church always retains in the background a consciousness of her higher aims, without always obtruding them or making them the only object of her life. Humani nihil a me alienum puto, says the Church. "My work is not only to lead men up the steep and thorny path to heaven, but to make that steep and thorny path easier by a reasonable and innocent enjoyment of this life as they go along. It is my hope, by encouraging such reasonable and innocent enjoyment, to stop mankind from indulging in unreasonable and vicious enjoyment, which makes for misery and ruin—in other words, to keep men from the primrose path of dalliance by making the steep and thorny path as pleasant as possible; to lighten the burden of self-control and mortification as much as may be, so that the weak shoulders, as well as the strong, may be able to bear it.

In defining the mission of the Catholic Church in its wider sense, I have already defined the mission of the Catholic Press. No Catholic paper is bound to cover the whole field. Some can take exclusively the essential work of enforcing the message of Catholic revelation, and thus enter the category of the strictly and purely religious paper. This section can be sub-divided thus: (1) those papers which appeal to the religious emotions and foster piety and devotion; and (2) those which appeal to the intellect and foster Catholic knowledge and principle. It must not be forgotten that if piety is one of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, knowledge is another of them; and one which requires special cultivation in these present days of education—and of rationalism. Now what I find is that papers and magazines which foster piety and devotion are extremely numerous and wide-spread, and varied enough to meet all needs. Everything which can be done is being done in this line. What we want is not to add to their number, but to secure a wider circulation of those which exist. The intellectual side of the Catholic Press is the one which, in my opinion, needs developing, both in quantity and in quality. Much is being done, of course; but there is much more to be done, if we wish to counteract the influence of a non-Catholic or anti-Catholic intellectualism which is pressing on the Catholic mind from all sides.

If I may speak personally, this is the idea which dominates my mind in the conducting of the Examiner here in Bombay. That large section of Catholics whose piety is proof against external influences is amply provided for by a whole world of devout literature. My sympathy goes out to those who are not naturally pious, and who need a strong foundation of intellectual principles in order to keep themselves up to the mark; who are constantly being flooded with all sorts of anti-religious ideas which upset their minds, destroy their grip of the faith, and drag them down—some into indifferentism, others into positive unbelief. Such men, I say, need fortifying intellectually. Their minds want filling with Catholic ideas and Catholic principles and Catholic knowledge—so that they can give a reason, to themselves and to others, of the faith which is still precariously lingering in them. I want to draw back those who have already gone far on the downward grade, and also, by anticipation, to keep back those who are in danger of beginning to slide.

Hence my own program is, first to furnish the more or less educated reader with a mindful of Catholic knowledge, both of facts and principles; secondly, to present this knowledge in so simple and entertaining a way as to make him feel interested and appreciative, and to wish for more. In this way the continuous reading of the paper is intended to become practically an accumulative Catholic education. In order to do this I adopt certain expedients as follows:

First, there is always before my mind a fine passage of Maurice Francis Egan:

> Why should I, who have cultivated all my life the art of saying serious things lightly, be accused of not touching the deeper currents? It seems to me that most writers in Catholic periodicals insist too much on a lack of humor. If a truth is not said ponderously it has no real importance for them.

Everybody knows how the scattering of half a dozen currants in a penny bun gives a marvelous piquancy to what otherwise would be an insipid mass of dough. The same applies to a serious article on a deeply intellectual or religious subject. Some literary instinct impels me to sprinkle my theological bun with currants of playfulness, whose homeliness and unexpectedness is sometimes greeted with astonishment by the staid purist. But who cares for the staid purist when hungry souls are at stake? Such brightening insertions have the effect of enabling an average reader to work through the stiffest of essays with ease, and to come to the end of it with a feeling of refreshment instead of a feeling of depression. I have watched the result of this instinctive expedient of mine for more than eleven years, and can not overestimate the value of the currant bun policy, as an aid to assimilating the most solid and serious Catholic instruction. Whether a given jeu d'esprit is always happy or not, I can not vouch. Of course, such a literary expedient must come natural and "to the manner born," if it is to succeed; and no amount of jeux d'esprit will avail unless the solid matter is behind it, clearly and forcibly expressed.

This, therefore, is the first item in the program for a Catholic paper—to convey every week some solid piece of strictly Catholic instruction, made appetizing and attractive; so that people will not only persevere in reading it, but will also enjoy it, and assimilate it and remember it.

(2) But this part must not be overdone. The dose of strictly religious matter must be limited to suit the capacity of the circle of readers. Sandwiched in must come articles of lighter interest covering the range of general culture—sometimes of Catholic bearing, sometimes purely secular in nature—which at the same time are instructive, and help to build up the Catholic mind on healthy and innocent lines. I refer to articles on points of history, or travel, or literature, or science, or art, selected for variety like the menu of a first-class dinner.

(3) Even articles of pure and simple amusement must be thrown in occasionally, so as to bring about the relaxation of a hearty laugh. I know of many readers of the Examiner who invariably look for the jokes first; which, like a hors d'œuvre, create an appetite for more solid dishes. Thus picking and choosing, they get into such a good humor as to end in reading the paper from cover to cover, winding up with some stiff and solid treatise which, except for this preparatory stimulation, they would hardly venture to face. In this way they manage to get the whole dinner down, and rise up from the table feeling that they have enjoyed it, and are better for it.

I take it that the above program is in itself the common property of all Catholic papers, and only varies in proportion or color according to local circumstances, or the individual mentality of each editor.

(4) Besides positive or expositive Catholic instruction, there must be, according to the environment, a certain amount of controversy—the refutation not only of direct attacks on the Church, but also of those counter-theories of unbelief or of crooked ethics which are struggling so hard for the mastery of the world. Such subjects possess a liveliness of themselves which does not need much rhetorical aid.

Several cautions are, however, forced upon my mind by the defective way in which such polemics are sometimes conducted. First, let the writer know the other side practically as well as he knows his own. Secondly, let him present the other side with absolute correctness, fairness and impartiality. Thirdly, let him, in spite of provocation, always remain the calm Christian gentleman, and always treat his adversary with courteous reserve, free from harsh vituperation or personal abuse—even enemies of the Menace type not excepted, though I half expect some disagreement here. It is possible to administer the severest public horsewhipping with a bow and a smile; and it becomes all the more telling because of the bow and the smile. Personally I always entertain the classic maxim: "Treat your enemy as if he were one day to become your friend." Wonderful to relate, in a large number of cases my enemy—taken apparently off his legs by my politeness—has actually become a friend; so much so that several strong controversies in the Examiner have ended in a cordial exchange of private correspondence between my enemy and myself. If not converted, he has at least been tamed; and that by "the soft" though by no means weak answer which "turneth away wrath." In short, there is a magical power in controversial self-restraint. Fourthly, let the writer never make use of bogus or weak arguments on his own side. They are always liable to a triumphant refutation; they fail to carry conviction; they give an appearance of weakness even to a strong cause. Take always the select argument which really goes to the root of the question and settles it; and see that it is hammered home in all its inherent strength. Fifthly, in practical points, where no principle is at stake, never defend your own side where your own side is clearly in the wrong. Rise serenely above mere partisanship. You may thereby secure for yourself, as one of my correspondents once put it, "the invidious reputation of being impartial"; and may be accused of "giving a handle to the enemy"; but your impartiality will be appreciated by the better minds on both sides, and will give you an authority and influence which is well worth the while. Lastly, let the writer realize that the most satisfying answer to a difficulty is the one which acknowledges the difficulty and, instead of brushing it aside by strong or evasive rhetoric, really faces it and goes to the bottom of it, and does not pretend to solve it beyond that point at which the argument stops. In short, let a Catholic apologist or controversialist make himself so obtrusively reasonable in all he says, that even those who are still unconvinced will recognize that at least he has "a case."

I am afraid it is rather egoistical to have devoted so much of this article to my own personal work. But "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh"; and after all, one grain of practical experience is worth a ton of abstract reasoning.

I will not leave out of count the idea of a Catholic paper which is in its substantial contents secular. The Catholicism of such a paper consists essentially in keeping out those things which are not for the betterment but for the "worsement" of mankind; thus making the paper negatively Catholic, with at most a tinge of positive Catholicism thrown in. Such a paper means at least the substitution of an innocent for a harmful thing. But besides this, it is capable of positive influence on secular thought and action, and on the tone of public opinion, redounding to the betterment of mankind; and therefore it falls within the mission of the Catholic Press taken in its widest sense.

ERNEST R. HULL, S.J.,
Editor Examiner, Bombay.

Writers*

OF all the mad social homeopaths, writers are the hardest to reach. That is chiefly because they are sensitive and proud. If a mother were exhibiting her child at a baby show, you would find it hard to criticise the child to her face, no matter how gentle the criticism. The more people were looking at the child, the more sensitive the mother would become. A writer's work is so much a part of him that it becomes almost like a child, and the larger his audience, the more he resents any slight or criticism. This is excusable, but unfortunate.

I once knew a well-seasoned author who underwent agonies at reading every unfavorable criticism. This was not wholly wounded pride; for the author in question was as modest a person as you could meet. But the story or article or novel was always a child, and it was something very near to the parental instinct which caused him to feel so much pain.

*The fifth of a series of special articles.

Yet the great message of the Church must be carried to writers among the very first. They have more influence over the public and over legislation than any other class of men. They are temperamentally inclined to exaggerate evils or to be one-sided in their views. It is their business, or trade, to make as much as possible of the small facts and suggestions of the life about them. In consequence, they take up easily with new ideas, propagate the ideas till the public is tired of them, and then, when their "child" no longer succeeds, they maintain for a while a mortified silence, followed by the adoption of a fresh idea.

I do not mean for an instant that the majority of authors who write either in fiction or articles on social subjects are maliciously insincere. But their appreciation of dramatic values often makes them espouse a cause for which, if they were blunter and more phlegmatic, they would care little. The typical white slave fiction which glutted most of our popular magazines a year or so ago was an instance of this. A good many authors found themselves, with considerable inward surprise, I imagine, writing on the most sordid subjects as cheerfully and earnestly as if they had been writing on New England country life. The editors accepted their work because it was novel and daring; so the authors, quite without malice, contributed a generous share of social poison to the community. For them white slavery was dramatic; a distorted view of psychology was enough to convince them that their stories could do good; falling into the bad habit of "sex" writing thus became very easy.

In the same way writers have seen the dramatic aspects of social revolution, of the fight of labor, of the domineering villainy of certain capitalists, and they have written of these things with the same avidity they would show in describing the French Revolution, or the Great War. Dramatically they are sincere, and since the average author measures his work by dramatic, rather than moral standards, they can not be accused of malicious malpractice. All the more reason, then, why they are sensitive to criticism, and why we must use abundant tact and wise self-restraint in carrying to them the message of the Church.

Catholic authors, on the whole, make by far the best couriers for this work. Catholic authors are like all other authors in appreciating dramatic values; and what is more, they have felt and can sympathize with an author's sensitiveness to criticism. Having experienced the constant guidance of the Church in their work, they know the crushing effect of the sentence: "Your work should not be published; it will have a bad moral effect." It is not pleasant to work up a dramatic idea, to become interested in the characters as they grow to life under your hand, to refine the ironical and forceful incidents, and then suddenly to realize that the whole plot and structure of your story is unwholesome and morbid. Yet this is an experience many Catholic authors have probably had at some time or another. They of all people, then, are the best qualified to use tact and moderation in criticising, either publicly or privately, the work of secular authors.

Some people seem to be convinced that all Catholic authors have to do is to contribute a lot of clean, healthy fiction and articles to the magazine as an antidote to the poison of sex-mad or socialist-mad or atheist-mad writers. This is not the case at all. If poison is in a man's system (let us say the poison of scarlet fever) you are often obliged to starve him. The old adage, "Stuff a cold and starve a fever," is now known to be only half true. You should starve both a cold and a fever. Even good food can be turned bad if the system is overstocked with impurities.

Good, healthy fiction would be lost if mixed in with much that appears in our magazines of to-day. The same is true of sound, healthy articles. You must drain off the impurities before good food can be beneficial. So, too, you must empty the magazine of sensational morbidity before people will come to enjoy the beauty of wet grass and the sunlight chasing the clouds above haystacks. Not that wet grass and haystacks are the only good subjects for writing. You can write of cities and great machines and big works of all sorts, and you can write with frankness and not attempt to conceal the truth that evil is and must be a part of life as we know it. You can be truthful and interesting, both, without being morbid; you can even make the good seem sensational (which it often is by contrast in these days), and the bad seem dreary and uninteresting. But it is useless to write like this and drown your work in bilge water. Your first efforts must be to withdraw the poison; and, to do this, your audience had better be one man at a time than thirty thousand, provided that man is a writer of popular or widely-read books, and himself one of the mad social homeopaths.

Make friends with your fellow-authors. Remember that you are not better than other men, though you may be working under better guidance. Suggest the dramatic value of goodness. Suggestion will work much better with sensitive writers than criticism. Suggest that their present work has fewer dramatic possibilities than healthy fiction. If they write a really good story, show by your pleasure in it that you like it much better than their other work. They will be quick to see the contrast in your manner. You need never openly condemn what they are doing now; that would be to lose their friendship and trust. Remember your own sensitiveness and be kind. Be tactful, and above all persistent, and the time will soon come when your own healthy work can find a prominent place in our magazines, and at least a breathing spell will be offered during which you can hope to reach the really guilty parties, the men who make the poison, of which the poor writers are only the combined victims and distributors.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

Father Pardow

IN the life of "William Pardow, of the Company of Jesus" (Longmans), Justine Ward has found material for an excellent book. In many ways it will give satisfaction to the friends and disciples and admirers of the noted preacher. The most casual reading carries the conviction that it was well worth the writing and as a biography is likely to win high praise. Although a tribute of grateful and devoted affection, it is not a panegyric, but a sober, unexaggerated and just appreciation. Father Pardow himself, could he have been brought to sanction such a work, would, one fancies, have given to this study his full approval. Not so much because of its artistic and literary merit, for it is rich in both; those who have known the writer's previous work expected nothing less. The plan, indeed, is carefully conceived and consistently developed, the prose is almost faultless, the matter is arranged with strikingly good taste, and throughout there is a fine appreciation of the real nobility of Christian life. And yet these are not the things that Father Pardow would approve of most in this record of his works and days, nor indeed will they who knew him intimately find in them the chief merit of the book. Its best feature is its simple, honest portrayal of the strong man of God. For this Father Pardow was above all else. Some found him cold, lacking in the quick tactful sympathy that is the language of heart to heart; others found him hard in his outlining and exacting of heroic ideals; but no one ever found him wanting in love for God, especially, as expressed in devotion to the person of Jesus Christ; no one could accuse him of being faint-hearted, or faltering or inconstant in his following of his King. This emphasizing of his strong soldier spirit makes his biography very valuable, for it lays bare his heart with the secret of his words and deeds.

The portrayal of Father Pardow puts before us not merely the sayings and actions of the man, but the man himself; and this not by way of a proposition to be proved, but as the inner content of every page. Many sides of his varied life are held up to view but in them all and through them all is subtly but irresistibly suggested as the dominating note, his character as the strong man of God. He had ardent desires but all for Christ; indomitable resolution that no difficulty could daunt; and great success, in which, however, he did not glory as if it were his own. Such is the meaning that will be gathered from the reading of his life: he was heroically faithful to high ideals and most of all to his special mission as the ambassador of Christ.

From his entrance into the Society of Jesus until his death with Christian courage in Saint Vincent's hospital, this was evident; and no less in the works that were hidden in God than in those that were open to the public eye. As an example we take his struggles in the matter of his preaching, for herein his courage was singularly striking.

Somewhere in his communings with the Holy Spirit, he had learned the particular form his service was to take. He has not told us whether this conviction was a sudden inspiration or a growth; but early in his religious life he seems to have realized that he was called to the ministry of the Word. To make Christ better known and loved, this was "the greater glory of God" for which he felt that he had been set apart. The mission was a glorious one, but it was a mission that demanded long continued sacrifice. If he would be a preacher, he must have learning. A protracted period of close and assiduous study would be required if he was to influence profoundly his generation. And yet violent headaches made the prospect, which is never easy, for him doubly hard. Father Pardow did not quail. He took his burning, throbbing temples between his hands, and by grim courage held himself to his desk; and this not for hours or days or months but for years. There were other disabilities also which at first sight seemed to shut him out from the career to which all his longings urged him. He was small, inclined to be awkward and frail; his voice was thin, high-pitched, without resonance, and not under control—defects enough surely to dampen any man's hope of more than ordinary success in the pulpit. They did not discourage Father Pardow. For although nature had not been kind, and had even refused to smile upon his aspirations, God had given him a will of iron, and he set out to acquire what nature had denied. It took years of frightening fidelity to exercises of physical development, years of pitiless profiting by drastic criticism before he won the victory, but he did triumph in the end; so that in the last fifteen years of his life there was scarcely in all the United States, a more obedient and more serviceable voice, or a pulpit orator of greater forcefulness and dignity.

In the beginning he adopted the formal kind of preaching once so popular with the great French orators, but he soon abandoned it for the more popular though always dignified style for which he was so well known. He himself said that he was incapable of the more exalted flights of impassioned eloquence; this was probably not altogether true, because he could and did stir the emotions when he wished. Apparently he deliberately set aside the more brilliant kind of preaching as being less effective, and of set purpose chose what was sometimes criticised as excessive simplicity of thought and language and illustration. Indeed a favorite part of the preparation of his sermons was to walk along the crowded streets, looking into the faces of the hurrying throngs and from their expressions learning the figures and the imagery with which to enforce his lesson. In all this, however, he cared for one thing only. He wanted to get people to translate into their daily practice the message he had been commissioned by his friend, Jesus Christ, to teach; and as a consequence he subordinated every consideration of glorification of self to the accomplishment of this purpose. How fully he succeeded is a matter of common knowledge. Wherever and whenever he preached crowds flocked to hear him, and if he did not always thrill his audience through and through, he seldom failed to produce a deep and lasting impression. To hear Father Pardow was to receive two or three resistless convictions which may or may not have made the heart glow, for this indeed he cared very little, but which almost invariably roused the will from lethargy into action. If the convents and chapels and churches and cathedrals up and down the land could speak, what a tale they would tell of permanent conversions from bad to good and from good to better, all wrought by the influence of his strong love for God!

The constantly growing insistence of his desire to spread the good tidings came to control almost every detail of life. His penance was regulated by it and the routine of his ordinary day, his rules of prudence also, his distractions and his interests. An instance in point was the principle that guided his choice of reading. Newspapers, magazines and books had for him but one recommendation. Unless they promised help for retreats or sermons they were cast aside unopened. The attractive side of literature no doubt appealed to him as to others, but he had a work to do and could not afford to turn aside even into innocent fields of pleasure. If he was tempted, he was too strong to yield. He held important offices in the Society and might easily have allowed himself to be absorbed in the work of government. He did not do so. Whatever obedience assigned to him, he did with all his strength; but his life work continued to the end to be the work of preaching; other occupations were rather incidents, interrupting but never obscuring his work of predilection.

Father Pardow's ministry of the Word has been dwelt on, not because it has been given a corresponding prominence in his biography, but rather because it is the best known of the many phases of his life, and at the same time the aptest illustration of the spirit that vivified all that he did. In his meditation, at his Mass, in his interior and exterior life, he was always the same. He never counted the cost. He was a generous giver. In everything and at all times he was the courageous, the dauntless, the strong man of God. J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

Mission Movement among Protestant Students

THE organized mission movement among Catholic students is still in its infancy. The parallel movement among Protestant students has already continued for more than thirty years. Its effectiveness in obtaining recruits and resources has been unquestioned. It will therefore be useful for us to draw whatever lessons we can from Protestant activities. The great means at their disposal and the remunerations which they can offer to their missionaries, considerations doubtless largely accountable for the success of the student propaganda, are, of course, not within our reach. But the Catholic Church, as the one divinely instituted missionary power which has Christianized the world ever since the days of the Apostles, has resources more mighty than any temporal advantages. It is the method of Protestant organization which deserves our study.

In various Protestant countries small academic missionary societies existed as early as in the seventies of the last century, but they never attained to much importance. The real origin of the broadly organized movement of to-day must be sought in the revival lectures delivered by the renowned evangelist, D. L. Moody, in 1882, to the students at Cambridge. The result of these lectures was that five students and two officers, among them C. T. Studd, the millionaire, all sportsmen of the first class, and then known and much spoken of as the "Cambridge Seven," devoted themselves to the missions in China. Before their departure they visited the various English universities. Their example and their fiery words at once aroused a lively enthusiasm throughout England. "No event of the whole century has done so much to bring home to the hearts of Christians the claims of the mission field and the sublimity of the missionary calling." (Andrew Murray, Key to the Missionary Problem.)

These happenings did not pass unnoticed in the United States, the less so, as a brother of Mr. C. T. Studd was visiting the American universities for the purpose of promoting by lectures on spiritual topics the religious life among the students. At one of these meetings at Cornell University he won over the highly-gifted John R. Mott, who was then preparing to enter the field of politics, but who became a co-worker in this religious propaganda. Of decisive importance, however, for the mission was a conference of American and Canadian students, convened for four weeks by D. L. Moody in Northfield, in 1885, at which Robert P. Wilder, then a young student, together with Ashmore, the missionary, and Dr. Pierson, who later on became famous in the missionary movement, pleaded so successfully in behalf of the mission, that one hundred students, among them John R. Mott, declared themselves willing to go forth to the distant country of the heathen, if it were the will of God. As an effective watchword they adopted the principle which originated in America, "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." It implied that the Gospel should be offered every person, without exception, during the present generation. This program will necessarily find its own limitations, but it is evident, from our own point of view, that our 300,000,000 Catholics could do incomparably more for the extension of the Faith, by their alms and their actual service, than they are accomplishing at present.

Such was the beginning of the "Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions," as this propaganda has come to be known. The movement at once made progress. Two delegates visited the higher seats of learning and aroused everywhere unbounded enthusiasm. At the end of the first year 2,200 young men and young women had offered themselves to the mission service as "Volunteers." In 1890 their number was 4,752.

The manner in which these young people were won over is remarkably American. According to Warneck even moral violence was used. Three, four, five meetings were held in succession, the one more emotional than the other. At some of them even the lights were extinguished, while all lay prostrate upon the floor in prayer. More and more urgent appeals were addressed to the young men, then already in a state of great excitement, until finally, one, two, then three, and more, of the artfully intoxicated students volunteered. (Allgemeine Missions-Zeitschrift, 1890, 273, 280.) The results of such intrigues were soon forthcoming. In June, 1889, 3,500 of these volunteers were confidentially approached with the question whether they were "faint-hearted or still firm in their determination." By March, 1890, 800 of them had sent a reply. (Ibid.)

Although very many students retraced their steps after so hasty a declaration, the Volunteer Movement has had a great success, and has produced the most far-reaching results. By the beginning of 1908 the movement in North America alone had sent forth 3,410 missionaries, men and women. And within a very short time its mighty waves had already reached the continent of Europe.

In England the Volunteer Movement gained a firm footing in 1891, and received an able leader in a young Scotchman, Donald Fraser by name. Before the year 1908, 978 men and 258 women students had enrolled, and by March, 1909, 1,385 "Volunteers" had already departed for the mission-field, having completed their course of studies. At the Liverpool Conference in January, 1896, where more than 1,000 members were present, students even from Denmark, Germany, France, Holland, Norway and Switzerland took part, and by the work of its representatives the movement soon spread over the whole of Protestant Europe. In Germany particularly a "Students' League for the Mission" was organized, calling itself "Prayer Recruiting League for the Mission." Within twenty years 6,000 Volunteers from various countries had joined the different mission societies. The fact that not many were received in Europe from the higher seats of learning is due in great part to the practice of sending out missionaries who have been educated in the seminaries for a period of only six or seven years. Of the students, however, who joined the missionary societies it was found that three-fourths had been attracted by this student movement. To instil into it still greater energy and uniformity the "World's Student Christian Federation" was finally organized in Sweden in 1895. By the year 1908 about 2,000 societies and 115,000 members had been affiliated.

The administration of the entire movement is entrusted to several secretaries, who from time to time renew the interest in the missions by a personal recruiting tour among the high schools and colleges of the country, where public speeches and private conferences are on the program.

Mission conferences on a greater scale are held every four years in all affiliated countries. Because of the thorough preparation for these meetings and the full attendance on the part of the student body, they visibly promote the mission cause in England and America. Over and above these great conventions smaller associations in the United States and Canada arrange annually seven meetings for the men and five for the women students. In addition to all this organized propaganda, summer conferences are held, which effectually promote the work, and are attended by all the home organizations. While these conferences are open to all students, the World's Student Christian Federation, moreover, conducts special meetings for the leaders of the movement. Such meetings take place in turn in different countries. General sessions for students are likewise held at them. It was the conference, opened at Tokio under the leadership of John R. Mott, which so forcibly impressed the Japanese public by its brilliant pomp and ceremony.

The impressions of these enthusiastic conventions soon vanish from the mind. If the interest for the missions aroused by them is to be kept alive, a steady occupation with mission affairs is indispensable. It is for this reason that the practical American branch introduced mission classes, to which the Student Federation invites all members with particular stress and success. In this movement also the American youth leads. During the winter months groups of from eight to ten young people form mission circles for the special purpose of discussing some of the many "mission" books, and of uniting in common prayer for the missions. In this particular regard the student movement has expanded to a mission movement among the young. About 200,000 young people, among them 150,000 students, are members of such circles. During the years from 1902-1909 no less than 710,350 of their text-books were sold. In 1910, England alone had about 2,500 mission circles, which soon spread to the Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, British India, and recently also to Germany. As their success generally depends upon the skill of enthusiastic leaders, the association has organized summer schools, as the independent institutions for the training of able leaders are known. The summer schools are generally conducted at the more prominent summer resorts, and will eventually form part of the summer conferences described above.

Thorough mission study naturally presupposes the production and spread of suitable mission literature. Along these lines the mission movement among Protestant students has been remarkably active, especially by issuing the text-books mentioned above and disseminating other stimulating mission literature. The various national organs of the World's Student Christian Federation also devote much attention to mission affairs. Among these the most prominent are the English Student Christian Movement, the French Le Semeur (Bulletin des étudiants français de Paris), and above all, The Student World, a quarterly published since 1908 by the international association.

However, the students inspired for the missions, especially the Americans, under the leadership of John R. Mott, did not rest satisfied with their home missionary endeavors. They were eager to carry their propaganda directly into the student-bodies of heathen countries. To achieve their object they did not found a special society, but the greater part of their "Volunteers" joined already existing societies, who were well experienced in such movements, a step lauded by the entire Protestant press. In America we have a special "Board for Mission Aspirants," which recommends worthy candidates to the various missionary societies. But in the great centres of heathen culture independent branches of the Young Men's Christian Association were established for the more studious natives, and of this Y. M. C. A. the Student Volunteer Movement is a mission-branch. The American secretaries appointed to the branch societies at Tokio, Shanghai, Peking, etc., by John R. Mott—in 1907, there were already 52—were men of great talents who had been selected with the utmost care and who succeeded in making their societies influential in the leading cities of Southern and Eastern Asia. These branches of the Y. M. C. A. offer the opportunity of a higher education to ambitious and promising young Asiatics, and put at their disposal all facilities of the modern gymnasium and field sports. Above all they are busy in spreading broadcast their Protestant literature. They also meddle with politics, as they did, not long ago, at the time of the Chinese Revolution, and thereby lower the prestige of the mission itself. More serious is the dogmatic uncertainty of some of the directors even in fundamental truths of the Christian Faith. In the Kaitakusha, the official organ of the Japanese branch, an atheist was permitted to air his views, while Harnack himself received unqualified praise. (Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft, 1911, 330; 1912, 76, 159.) We should state, however, that Protestant mission enthusiasts among the students regard private and common prayer for the missions and for the awakening of the missionary spirit one of the most important duties of their federation.

The energy with which the Protestant mission movement has been developed among students should certainly stimulate our own zeal to promote by every means in our power the missions of the Catholic Church, and to become instrumental in spreading most widely the knowledge of the one true Faith. How this movement can be organized among our Catholic students will form the subject of another article.

FREDERICK SCHWAGER, S.V.D.,
Motherhouse of the Society of the Divine Word.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

Church Extension Society and Mexican Refugees

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is a passage in the Mexican Chronicle, in your issue of November 21, which seems to some open to misinterpretation. The passage reads:

> At the present writing it appears that General Funston informed the Government that the Church Extension Society will attend to this matter (the transportation of priests and Sisters from Vera Cruz). This is an uncalled-for interference in a good work.

The passage no doubt refers to General Funston's action, but it is likely to be misinterpreted.

Chicago, Ill. D.

[Both in intention and in fact the passage refers to the General's action. The Catholic Church Extension Society has and has had AMERICA's entire sympathy, approval and, as far as possible, cooperation in every item of work done in behalf of the Mexican refugees.—Editor, AMERICA.]

The Italian Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My opponents affirm that the Italian immigrants "are to a large extent uninstructed in the very elements of their Faith, and that thousands upon thousands of boys and girls beyond the age of sixteen are so." It is not my intention to assert that all the Italians who come here are well instructed in their religion. In Italy, as well as in any other populous country, local or personal reasons may have hindered the religious instruction of a certain number. But the statement as given by my opponents is false. For the proof of my assertion I will rely mainly on the opinions of experienced men without omitting to say, however, that the Italians I have met in this country in ordinary life or as a Sunday-school teacher knew their religion. Bishop Dunne, of Peoria, Ill., who was for years rector of an Italian parish in Chicago, speaking of the most calumniated among the Italians, says: "The Southern Italians compensate in their working knowledge of the Ten Commandments for what they lack in secular education."

An experienced Italian missionary writing to me about the Italian boys and girls who come to this country says: "All know the things of their religion. But they find that they easily forget the prayers learned in a language which is no longer heard by them. Most of them know their prayers in Latin." Other letters of Italian priests working in this country agree with what has been said above. Whom, then, shall we believe? Priests who have been working for years among the Italians and know their language and their ways, or others who often repeat what they hear without weighing much its value?

As to statues, processions, heavy candles, emotionalism, etc., let me remind my opponents that as a Catholic priest I know as well as they do that religion does not consist in such exterior practices; often, however they are a sign of the Faith abiding in the heart and, moreover, are a real help in drawing people nearer to God. The Catholic Church approves of them.

The falsity of the assertion that the Italians in this country do not attend missions appears from the fact that at forty-two missions given by the four Fathers of the Italian Apostolate of New York, 19,570 person attended. In this country there are about 250 Italian churches. To these should be added many missions, chapels, basements of non-Italian churches and a large number of churches which, although not Italian, have Masses and other services for the Italians. Altogether we have a total of several hundred churches attended by Italian congregations. Nor is this all. Many Italians go to non-Italian churches. This is the case especially with the many thousands who know English, and with many others who live in places where there is no Italian church. From the reports of a number of Italian churches, I choose ten, representing different parts of the country, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland. These show that 47,570 are present at the different Masses on Sundays, that the number of Communions every year is 475,761 (an average of 15,858 Communions a month); that there are 9,970 members of pious sodalities. These ten churches therefore prove the absurdity of the assertion that 99 per cent. of the Italians in this country stay away from church. If the statement were true, only about 30,000 Italians would be church-goers. Really my opponents seem to be altogether misinformed about the religious conditions of the Italians in the United States. The Italian children in the Italian parish schools are at least 15,000, but there are many others who frequent the parochial schools of non-Italian churches. This is the case especially in those places where no Italian parochial schools have as yet been built. My conclusions therefore are as follows:

(1) There are many widespread prejudices in the United States against our Italians, even among Catholics. (2) Much of the evil that may be found among the Italians is due to indifference and neglect on the part of those who should assist them. It is to be admitted, however, that it is often difficult to have a sufficient number of priests for them. (3) The work of zealous priests among the Italians meets, usually, with a generous response. (4) There is an immense amount of good being done among the Italians which is practically unknown even to otherwise well-informed persons.

My ardent desire is that this little controversy may do away with many prejudices against the Italians and that many priests may be moved to work for them. The future prosperity of the Church in this country may depend a great deal on the Italian immigrants. JOSEPH M. SORRENTINO, S.J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On the Italian defection from the faith of their Apostolic See I want to say that the more clearly the question is brought before the proper authorities the sooner will the Church in America be freed from the present Italian problem. Along the railroad here you will find at intervals Protestant Italian chapels to gather in the Italians and turn them into scoffers at their faith and priesthood. In the "movie" theatres you will find everywhere whole Italian families from the father down to the youngest baby. They can find money for that every day of the week and on Sundays, too, but nothing on one day of the week for God's Mass-house. I know for a fact that many Italians in business let their children fall into the hands of the Protestant proselytizer in hopes of gaining a better foothold in business. Moreover they hold that good Catholics who support their churches are to be sneered at. Their attitude is a source of great disedification.

Westchester County, New York. A PRIEST.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is nothing more difficult to handle, more hard to refute, than general charges, which say much in general, but nothing very definite in particular. Mr. Hadley seems to revel in generalities. I would answer at length if space were allowed me in AMERICA. However, let him remember that Nemo malus nisi probetur, and that he is making wild and random statements without proving them. If priests and bishops informed him about the bad conditions of the Italians, why does he not give us their names?

As to "Forestiere," let him understand that a certain amount of religious instruction may suffice in one country, which would be insufficient in countries where dangers are greater. This explains Pius X's words with regard to Italians emigrating to other climes. I know that persecutions sharpen one's love for the Church, still how does "Forestiere" account for the millions of men and women of other nationalities here in this country who should be Catholics and are not. G. REALMUTO.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If an English-American may presume to observe the ways of the American-Italian, he may suggest at least one explanation for the apparent lack of Catholic practice discussed in AMERICA. The Italian emigrant is not, of course, a man in pursuit of the right to worship God according to his own conscience, for he has that at home. He is, rather, as a rule chiefly in pursuit of financial betterment. This being the case, acquisition is the first law of his energies, and his real economies usually begin with the Church. The European Catholic, like the American parent in our public-school system, is a little spoiled by State support. It used to be said of unhappy Mexico, that the chink of money in her churches was never heard save in the poor-box at the door. How great must be the surprise and indignation then of the thrifty Catholic immigrant to be confronted with such a thing as pew rent, or a regular tax for a chair in the House of God! It is the bane of all native-born, parsimonious Christians; doubly the bane of an economical immigrant. An Italian fruit vender once said to me, "I sell one hundred plates of ice-cream every Sunday." She said nothing about Mass. She was, in fact, too busy taking in money to hand it out.

Lost in the religious crowds of Naples, such a Catholic may or may not drop his small coin unobserved in a poor-box. But may the saints defend him! when that long-handled conspicuous American alms-basin seeks him out, sometimes thrice at one service, his mind recoils in what he considers a just repugnance. Humanly speaking, it seems to him cheaper to "miss Mass." It appears to him that the Catholic Church in the United States is made up of a howling mob of orphans, seminarians, dependent heathen, "euchres," festivals (whatever kind of beings those last strange syllables imply), bazaars and wheels of fortune.

I do not know of anything more annoying to a get-rich-quick Italian, or American, than that same inexorable long-handled alms-basin pointed directly at him; pausing, halting, before the gaze of a watchful congregation behind and on each side of him. He protests that he prefers to give his alms in secret; not to let his left hand know whether it is one cent or one dollar that he is bestowing. But under the test of the circulating basin, his charity is dragged to the light and the light exposes him. He also argues that he has grandmothers and sisters in Italy whom he wishes to bring to our free and happy shores. How can a fruit importer, still less the owner of a peanut stand do more than that? The "demand" on the Mass-goer seems to him an outrage. There is an old-fashioned Methodist hymn that runs:

I'm glad salvation's free.
Salvation's free for you and me.
I'm glad salvation's free.

It does not look that way to the Italian emigrant who has been provided with a free standing or kneeling space, and the unsuspicious alms-box for the poor, outside. He forgets that we are all bought with a price, the price of extreme self-denial; that the laborer, even in the priesthood, is worthy of his hire; that it profits a man nothing, though he sell all his goods, if he restores none of his gains to God and His Church on earth. In short, cherchez la portmonnaie of an indifferent Italian in the United States.

E. S. CHESTER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Our experience with the Italian immigrants accords very much, though in a different way, with that of the old French missionary as published in the American Ecclesiastical Review of May, 1889. We had not his advantage, much to our shame and regret, of even a half knowledge of the Italian language, but we nevertheless managed to interest them, without much difficulty, in attending Mass on Sundays and the reception of the Sacraments two or three times a year. We secured the services of members of a religious order to visit them and hear their confessions in the church. As they grew in numbers they gravitated to one of our galleries, of which in a few years they took complete possession. During the incumbency of our scholarly and zealous Bishop Becker, our Italians could be counted on the fingers of one hand. It was in the early 80's, under the saintly Bishop Curtis, that their number increased in different parts of our city and diocese. Fortunately, at the same time, newly ordained priests who had made their studies in Rome began to arrive, and they furnished most timely and valuable aid. Annual retreats were preached in their own language by missionary Fathers, of which the majority of the Italians, the mothers particularly, who came with their little children, whom they placed on the floor of the aisles while their infant babies nestled in their arms, availed themselves enthusiastically. At the advent of our present most devoted bishop, he established a special Mass for the Italian people and appointed his present zealous chancellor, their chaplain. Under his wise and benignant service of nine years the work prospered wonderfully. As mentioned in our "Dedication Memorial," he gathered some four or five hundred persons, chiefly men, at his Sunday Mass. He had instructions given, he established catechism classes, sodalities and other religious associations which meet regularly, he organized a Ladies' Cooperative Association, composed of intelligent and zealous zelators, whose duties engage them in visiting the Italians in their homes, in teaching catechism and other branches of knowledge in our school halls and in various other kinds of spiritual and corporal works of mercy. Upon his appointment as chancellor and his removal to the bishop's residence he was succeeded by two Roman students, though natives of our diocese, whose efforts have been crowned with marked success. This good work has been described by Cardinal Falconio and his Excellency, Mgr. Bonzano, the Apostolic Delegate, as positively ideal. We leave to others to tell of the successful work done for the Italians in the other parishes of the city and diocese. Suffice it to say that our good and indefatigable bishop, finding the number of immigrants increasing very rapidly had another church partially built for their needs in the section most thickly populated by them, and had two other Roman students to supply their needs. In the adjoining parish another Roman bestows his services when needed. In our cathedral the Rev. Dr. Grant, their affectionate and able chaplain, and the zealous Father Ryan, also of Roman training, while not neglecting their work as assistants to the bishop and rector, have labored so constantly and made such sacrifices, that their apostolic success is a matter of common knowledge throughout the country and in Rome itself. In twenty-five years our sodalities of young men and women have been renewed three times, because the marriage of previous members led to their establishing homes in different parts of the country. One-third of our school is composed of Italian children. The same may be said of most of the other city parishes, while that of St. Thomas contains a majority of Italians. There are four other associations whose members averaging eighty in number receive Communion once a month. Many Italians assist at our daily Masses and evening devotions and receive Holy Communion daily. In all these years we have never asked the people for money beyond passing the collection baskets at the offertory. Yet we have always received sufficient funds to pay the salary of the reverend assistant and other expenses. All people are amenable to kindness, right principles, right conduct and right sacrifice, and all things are possible to God's grace.

Wilmington, Del. JOHN A. LYONS, V.G.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have taken a keen interest in the discussion carried on in AMERICA concerning the religious condition of the Italians. It seems that Rev. Father Sorrentino and Mr. Hadley are arguing on entirely different premises. Father Sorrentino confined his first remarks exclusively to the religious conditions in Italy, while Mr. Hadley in answer took his data exclusively from the religious conditions in this country, and significantly asks whether the immigrants threw their faith into the Bay of Naples on coming to America. This arguing from different premises naturally led to a confusion of ideas, so that the original intention of Father Sorrentino, of merely describing the religious conditions in Italy, is completely ignored, and the whole question is now turning on the religious conditions of the Italians in this country. Light is thrown on the discussion by the opinion of one whose life's work was among the Italians of lower New York City. I refer to the late Father Russo, S.J., who founded the Mission of Our Lady of Loretto. In answer to the question: How is it that people coming from the very centre of Catholicity are so indifferent to religion as to sacrifice it for a paltry gain, Father Russo wrote:

> Some say it is because they were neglected at home. I used to think so myself, and spoke, and even wrote in that vein. Experience has taught me differently. When these people are brought back to God after years of almost pagan life, you hear them say that the last time they went to confession was when they left their country. Moreover, this indifference is as great, if not greater, with regard to those who came here quite young, and were brought up in this country. As to their ignorance, it is evident no opportunity was given them at home to improve themselves; but if we prescind from secular knowledge, you find that most of them know practically enough on the main points of our holy religion. We must bear in mind that these people come from the lowest class, and are familiar only with the dialect of the province they come from. They understand good Italian fairly, but can not speak it; hence when they have to answer questions on religion, they make a very unfavorable impression. But if you know their dialect, and know, moreover, how to be plain with them, this impression is oftentimes removed. The neglect at home may be one of the reasons for the situation, but is inadequate to account for the full extent of the evil.

Far be it from me to cast blame on anybody; but I can not help believing that things would not be in so bad a shape now, if more care had been bestowed upon them, and if they had been taken in hand in due time, when the evil was recent and more easily remedied. Look back to the first years of Italian immigration. Who was there to help them in their first difficulties, to warn them of the danger, to console and comfort them? Was it even known how many of them were without a pastor? I have heard it from their own lips. They were inclined to believe this a land of freedom with regard to religion as well as everything else. Add to this the infamous talks of some of their better educated countrymen, true disciples of Mazzini and Garibaldi. These agents of Satan lost and lose no time or occasion for vilifying the Church, for ridiculing all religious practices, and for slandering the ministers of God whom they represent as clerical merchants looking more to the purse than to the soul of those confided to their care. We must not omit what contributed more, perhaps, than anything else to render them callous to religion. With the exception of those who come here to escape prosecution for their political or other crimes, the main purpose—the only purpose, I might say—of their coming is to better their condition. Their labor, however, is poorly remunerated; to make ends meet, and save something—they take good care to do this—they work like slaves, oftentimes even on Sundays. Money is the object of their ambition, and the treasures which will last forever are left to be gathered by a few. This lesson is quickly learned by the new comers, and when you speak of religion to them they answer, "I have no time."

Thus far Father Russo. To my mind the whole discussion is useless, and altogether uncalled for; especially since it will tend to rouse unwarranted prejudice which often causes the good qualities of the Italians in this country to be viewed through the wrong end of a telescope.

Granite, Md. AN INTERESTED ITALIAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In connection with the remarks made by Mr. H. Hadley and "Enotriæ Amator," on Father Sorrentino's article, concerning the religious condition of the Italians, I have just read in the November number of Truth, a confirmation of Father Sorrentino's assertions, by the Anglican Vicar of Gorleston, in a little article entitled "A Hater of Lies." As the witness is not an Italian nor a Catholic, his testimony may not be suspected of partiality. I quote from the article the following lines:

> In my youth I read the statement that men on the Continent desert the churches, for it used to be widely advertised in religious journals. . . . A few visits to France, Italy and Switzerland showed me that the statement was untrue. The churches in Italy were well filled with men. One Sunday last year I visited in Rome the Jesuit church. It was packed with men, and only a few women were present. I have always found this church crowded with men. In St. Peter's there were at least a couple of thousand men—worshipers, besides a number of sightseers. S. Maria sopra Minerva was packed to the doors with men; at S. Maria del Popolo men largely predominated and the church was full. On another Sunday I visited the Lateran and Santa Maria Maggiore. These are huge churches—again I found crowds of men. I hold no brief for Rome. but I do hate lies. They form a poor foundation for anything.

This is worth noting.

Pendleton, Ore. JOSEPH PERRON, S.J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recently I was one of a company of priests who discussed AMERICA and the controversy about the Italians. Some items of the conversation will, I am sure, prove interesting if not instructive:

"What do you think of the controversy about the Italians?" ejaculated Father A——. "This Father Sorrentino, I wonder what his credentials are? It would be interesting to know how old he was when he left Italy—you know some of those men enter religion very young and inexperienced." "In how many parts of Italy has he been anyhow," said another, "and for how long a time, and lastly, what experience has he had among Italians in the United States? Certainly his observations differ from those of many others. What do you think, Father B——?" At this the conversation became general.

Here are some disconnected shreds of it: "The Sisters in charge of our Italian children tell me they know no catechism when they arrive." "Five years ago one Protestant sect alone reported that it had thirty-two churches for Italians, east of the Mississippi." "I have an immense number of Italians in my parish," said a member of a well-known religious order, "and I find the old people hopeless." "What did you think?" asked Father C——, of an experienced Italian missionary who loves his countrymen. "There is something wrong," he replied. "As a rule only about 10 per cent. of the Italians attend Mass and the sacraments. Sometimes the percentage is higher, but not often." At this there was a lull in the conversation; then somebody remarked, "It is very interesting. Let us wait for the next AMERICA."

New York. TRIOBOLUS.

Help for the Mexicans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a reader of the papers and especially of AMERICA, I am dumbfounded at the very many outrages heaped upon the Church and her children in Mexico. I am no less dumfounded at our silence. A short time ago prominent Catholic names were on a letter of protest to Russia against the wrongs of her poor Jewish subjects, and we were proud to see them. Now across our border wrongs, burning wrongs, crimes too unspeakable for print, are perpetrated on fellow-Catholics that in the days of our need opened to us generous purses and not one word of protest has been heard. Yet one of our New York papers published and brought proof to bear that some of our Federal officials were deeply implicated in this shocking condition of affairs.

Oh, for a voice to arouse from the Atlantic to the Pacific the honest indignation of every American, irrespective of creed or race, against these cut-throats and their abettors, and to compel our Government to do its duty! It can not be that the puny wail of the Guardians of Liberty has frightened those who should be the protectors of the wronged and oppressed.

If, however, it would not be prudent to urge the Administration to right the wrong for which it seems responsible, at least it would not be imprudent to take up a collection in all our churches for the unhappy victims of these wrongs. This charity may be yet returned to ourselves. In anticipation of this collection please find the enclosed check.

New York. C. F. D.

Help for War Victims

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I note from recent numbers of AMERICA that a certain degree of doubt exists as to the spirit in which many of the donations for the benefit of the refugees in Belgium and France are going to be used. I have never seen a suggestion that there is ready-made an efficient instrument for Catholics to use in distributing this relief. I refer to the St. Vincent de Paul Society which, of course, is thoroughly organized in France and Belgium and sufficiently well organized here to have entire charge of the collection and distribution of funds and supplies for the unfortunate French and Belgians now in misery and want.

J. R. DE LA TORRE BUENO.

Concerted Action

To the Editor of AMERICA:

No one with a spark of humanity in his being can remain unmoved when he reads your soul-harrowing descriptions of the wrongs and outrages perpetrated in Mexico by the dastardly ruffians who, with the help and connivance of a supposedly Christian Government, pose as liberators. Why is not something done? Are we afraid of embarrassing the Government? It is high time the Government were embarrassed if embarrassment will accomplish anything. Let the Government be embarrassed by all means, by such a universal chorus of righteous indignation that for very shame of upholding such manifest and frightful injustice, it may take some action to prevent the repetition, at our very doors, in the full noonday of American civilization, of all the awful horrors of the French Revolution.

You have been printing a great deal lately about the apathy of Catholics. Some of your correspondents have sought the cause of this apathy in the lack of authoritative leadership. There is no lack of leaders, but there is too often a lack of unity in aim and purpose. Too often Catholics do not know what they want. It has always been so. But in this matter of outrages in Mexico not only our common heritage of faith but common humanity should unite us. I think that the effort is worth while.

Why not issue and send broadcast an appeal urging upon each and all the necessity of taking some steps to alleviate the suffering and redress the wrongs of our fellow-Catholics in Mexico?

Suppose every pastor should recommend his people to read, and should read himself the pamphlet, "Justice to Mexico." Let "Justice to Mexico" be the slogan of this modern crusade. Let the various parishes prepare protests and appeals in writing. Let copies of these signed by members of a representative committee of citizens and voters chosen from among the parishioners be forwarded to the President, Secretary of State, Senators and Congressmen. Let conditions in Mexico be commented on from altar and pulpit, and in this way let the matter be brought forcibly and intelligently to the notice of our sixteen million Catholics. Isn't it worth trying? Doesn't the cause of religion, humanity, public morals, justify such a proceeding? Certainly the need is urgent and pressing. I know it has never been done before. I know it is a departure from old-fashioned, time-honored, conservative traditions. But what of that?

I believe that if the insults and outrages to which our consecrated priesthood and sisterhoods, the profanations to which our churches and sacred vessels, are subjected, were aired in this manner in our churches, an army of men and women would spring up in this country, so strong, so determined, so full of zeal for the rights of our holy Faith, that no power on earth could withstand their reasonable demands. If not, then this boasted Catholicity of ours, this enlightened American Catholicity, is a cold, heartless thing, and not worth the snuff of a candle.

Northbridge, Mass. M. T. SLATTERY.

Opinion of an Expert

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A reader of your review from its first number, few of its pages have been more interesting and amusing to me than those on which you are printing the views of the critics who feel called upon to say something in regard to the news you chronicle of the shocking state of affairs in Europe. It may be balm for your lacerated feelings to read the following editorial note that the editor of our local Catholic weekly, the Casket, makes on this topic:

> AMERICA is still being accused of being German, and French, and British; and is printing the various letters side by side; a striking illustration of the folly of extreme partisanship which mistakes everyone who will not be one's own partisan for a partisan of the other side.

From all this it would seem that like the now-famous "Long, Long Way to Tipperary," it is still a long, long way to that coign of vantage from which the gentle editor can issue a paper that will be satisfactory to everybody—including himself.

Antigonish, N. S. T. S.

Russians and the Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The communication from the Austrian consul-general in a recent issue, in which is set forth the alleged efforts of the Russians in Galicia to impose their state religion upon the Catholic population, deserves very careful consideration.

There have been numerous indications lately of an attempt to work up sentiment for the Austro-German cause among American Catholics, by picturing their Galician co-religionists as in danger. The present citations from Petrograd and Cracow newspapers seem on their face convincing that Russia is trying to force the Orthodox rite and the Schismatic religion upon the Catholic Uniates of the conquered territory. But press accounts from interested sources, it is well understood, are to be received with a great deal of reserve. There is much information bearing precisely the opposite stamp from that of your Austrian correspondent. I quote for instance, from an article in to-day's newspaper from a Petrograd correspondent which is headed "Czar to Aid Catholics":

> The Russian Emperor, who to-day (Nov. 14) visited Ivangorod, announced his intention to grant the necessary funds for the reconstruction of the Catholic churches in villages around the city which were destroyed by German shell fire.

This to be sure refers to Poland, not to Galicia. But, I submit, it is inconceivable that Russia which is making such a strong play for Polish support, which has every interest in attracting to its cause the Slavs of Galicia and Bukowina, should at this critical stage start a flagrant, wholesome anti-Catholic campaign such as we are asked to believe is now under way. We may credit or discredit the good faith of the Czar's bid for Polish loyalty, we may or may not accept his pledge of complete religious liberty. But we can not deny that the Poles to a man have stood firm for the Russian cause under the most bitter trials of the recent German occupation.

We read many press dispatches, besides, which assert that the Russians are greeted with joy by the Slavic element as their armies push through Galicia. These things are incompatible absolutely, with the idea that Russia is openly and officially attacking the Church. If a proselytizing campaign has been publicly announced in Galicia, the people of Poland can not be unaware of it. How then can we account for the heroic loyalty of the Poles which is one of the most astonishing facts of the whole war?

It is a bad thing to try to create sentiment for either side by raising the religious issue. Suppose even that it is true that a bishop of the Orthodox Church celebrated in the Cathedral at Lemberg. We Catholics would be properly shocked by all that this would mean. Yet as an incident of war it can not compare with the desecration of the Belgian churches by the German military, where these churches have been despoiled, and used often as barracks.

New York. STUART P. WEST.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Wary Theatregoing

THERE is an interest far beyond the ordinary in this letter of a correspondent:

"Wary reading is required of those who would safeguard the purity of their faith." Many a reader of yours will breathe a hearty amen to this, from out the consciousness of his own daily experience and peril. The very word "faith," in the sense in which you use it. is a byword and reproach, an anachronism to be mocked at by those who supply the matter for our daily reading. But if wary reading is imposed upon Catholics, how much more so wary theatregoing. The acted play has in it a greater potency for evil than the printed page. Many a base insinuation, a covert sneer at faith escapes the attention of the average reader. Not so upon the stage. If there is a false conception of life to be upheld, an attack to be made upon religion and morality, this can be done under the guise of a defence of the very virtue to be assailed. By an appeal to the senses, to the pride of intellect and to the so-called artistic sensibilities, black can be made white or, at least, given an attractive shading. The converse, of course, holds good. There are great books of which we need not be wary. There are plays, true and sound at the core, to which, we can give ourselves up unreservedly and from which we can safely encourage those near and dear to us to derive much pleasure and even inspiration.

New York. ALFRED YOUNG.

AMERICA endorses these sentiments without reserve. It is undoubtedly true that the theatre can be, and often is, an agent for great and permanent evil. If the present decadence of the drama were due entirely to the managers of playhouses, it would be useless perhaps to raise a protest. But the patrons share the responsibility with the managers. The latter may have started the polluted stream on its way, but the multitude that come to bathe in it joyously encourage these traffickers in souls, who care naught for sin and art, but much for "the thirty pieces of silver," the price of immortal souls.

And the shame of it is that Catholics are no less guilty than others. They frequent Mohammedan-like dramas, sit through them complacently, as if they had not been taught that faith and purity are above all earthly goods, pleasure, and even life itself included.

Imagine men and women who hold their heads high at solemn Mass on Sunday allowing a vulgar money changer to coin gold from them with danger to their virtue! Such people pass their souls through the grating at the box-office on Saturday, receive a ticket for an hour's unlawful pleasure in return, and on the following morning chant "Holy God We Praise Thy Name." Their action belies their words. It would not matter so much if they alone were involved. But their example is a stumbling block, a scandal to others. The play they patronize, the play of which they approve, sometimes by express words, is taken to another city, and when it is protested as unfit, the managers are able to defend themselves truthfully by quoting "prominent" Catholics. In such cases who is the more to blame, the manager or the prominent Catholic?

The answer is clear. If not, God will make it plain on judgment day, and if the "prominent" Catholics are saved at all, it will be so as by fire. If they are not too "prominent" to read this paper, AMERICA advises them to reflect on this subject, to reckon the cost of the scandal they give, and get ready to pay a price that is apt to be an eternal process. In the meantime Catholics who are not "prominent" would do well to remember that standards of morality are set by God, not by their "prominent" brethren.

A Grateful Acknowledgment

THE works of mercy taught by Jesus are not dead; they can never die. For although the cleansing of the lepers and the raising of the dead are things of other days; the poor we have always with us, and the blind must be made to see and the deaf to hear, if not personally at least vicariously through the ministry of kindness. Alms are still given out of almost empty purses; larders, pitifully slender, are still shared with hungry strangers; misery and sorrow make their appeal and constantly they meet with a ready generous response. And this is true no less of the tiny hamlet than of the mighty city. Wherever the Angelus is rung, wherever the Blessed Sacrament is adored, Christlike charity finds a home. Compassion is never absent from hearts that know and love the Lord. And yet there are times and places in which the little ones of Christ find a more tender sympathy. Not so long ago the persecuted priests and nuns and laity of poor lacerated Mexico stretched their hands in wringing supplication to the God of all for help in their dire need, and far away in a diocese of New England a bishop told his clergy and his people of the call that had come so many miles across the continent. Their answer was prompt and unstinted. The rich gave out of their riches and the poor out of their poverty, and already six thousand six hundred and fifty-five dollars are on their way to lighten a burden that is almost too heavy for the bearing. That bishop and his people are the shepherd and the flock of Springfield. They have made themselves angels of consolation, they have rejoiced the Heart of Christ, and we have no doubt that God will richly bless them for their deed of love, rewarding them a hundredfold, both in this life and in the next.

The First of Many Brethren

THE United States is taking a large place among the Apostolic nations. It has indeed in many ways been living up to the ideal set before it by the Apostles, but hitherto it has been content, for the most part, to receive rather than to give. Priests from the Apostolic schools of Europe have long been coming to our shores, and they have spent the flower of their years, and at times their very heart's blood, in sowing the seed of the Gospel on what, thanks be to God, has not proved uncongenial soil. Nor have we in turn been selfish. We, too, have sent brave young men to foreign lands to evangelize the natives of pagan countries. And yet it has been under the impulse of the zeal of the individual or at the bidding of the superiors in religious communities that our missionaries have gone forth. There have not been among us, though the wish for them has not been absent, many schools for the Foreign Missions. The example of Théophane Vénard has burned in the heart of many a lover of the Cross, but it has not always been possible to imitate him in the fullest sense of the word, for throughout the length of our broad land there were but few seminaries devoted exclusively to the cultivation of those heroic vocations that make men forget their father's home and the place of their birth, and drive them over sea and land in search of benighted people who have not heard of the coming of Christ. The difficulty is disappearing. The number of our apostolic schools is growing. One of them, Maryknoll, has sent forth its first priest to the harvest field. May Maryknoll be the nursing mother of many sons, and Father McShane the torchbearer to many brothers!

Belgium's Answer

A FURTHER development in the scheme for bringing over to the United States children who have been made orphans by the war has come to light in the answer of the Belgian Government to the proposal of the Chicago Tribune. It runs as follows:

> The Government is much touched by the generous offer of American people expressed through the Chicago Tribune to care for and adopt the Belgian orphans. The Government prefers to reserve for the moment its decision. Please transmit through the Chicago Tribune with our heartfelt thanks, this acknowledgement of the offer.
>
> Minister of Foreign Affairs.

No one who knows the character of the Belgian people will be surprised at the tenor of this message. As long ago as the time of Cæsar public testimony was rendered to their courage and to their unfaltering determination to fight for their hearths and homes; and the world will never forget how valiant have been their recent efforts to defend all they hold dear. There was, therefore, from the very first but little likelihood of their accepting the first offer of a sympathetic people to give a foreign refuge to their little ones. In no land have tiny fingers twined stronger cords around the hearts of fathers and of mothers, nowhere has the love of country and of countrymen a tighter hold on the thoughts and aspirations of both young and old. Belgium and Belgium's people are nothing if not attached to the land that gave them birth. Is it not, therefore, unkindly kindness that would make aliens of the orphans of such a nation's dead?

A Warning to Parents

CHRISTMAS is approaching, and its coming is heralded by a thousand and one books for children. There are story books and books of poetry and books of science, all delightfully printed and illustrated. Some are interesting and quite harmless; others are interesting and quite dangerous. Among the latter are many attractive volumes that teach by word and picture the crudest kind of crude, materialistic evolution. Children are told in honeyed words that their ancestors were apes, and to drive the hateful lesson home the imaginative process of development is laid before the youthful eyes in a series of colored pictures, beginning with a low-grade ape and ending in a chubby, laughing babe, produced by a magic method which the soi-disant scientists call evolution.

This is neither the time nor the place to discuss this problem biologically and psychologically. AMERICA has not been remiss in this duty. But it is both the time and the place to warn parents who care for their children's souls, against allowing such books in their homes. The child's soul is a sacred gift from heaven, the result of a special creative act, not an upgrowth from a lower form. It is a product of heaven, not of earth. Sad and grievous it is, then, that parents should cooperate in the destruction of their offsprings' soul, by putting into their hands books which rank the child with the brute. Teach the baby that it is a brute and it will act the brute in youth, in virile manhood and in old age.

It is bootless, fatuous to argue that the books do no harm. True, the letter press may not be understood, but somehow or other the pictures are burned into the imagination and remain there, both to haunt the soul and to direct it later to volumes of similar content, until at last there is spun therefrom a philosophy of life whose fruit is spiritual desolation, unfaith, unchastity, a swaggering, blatant infidelity, all the more invincible because it is based on half-truths, the most dangerous of all lies.

Kempis warns us to resist evil in its every inception, lest the remedy be prepared too late. Parents would do well to hearken to these words and to ward off evil by guarding their children from dangerous Christmas books, which, while pretending to spread joy abroad in continuance of Christ's mission, blaspheme the Christ Himself, by denying Him His rightful place, and by corrupting the souls of the "little ones" whom the Master loved.

Antipathy and Sympathy

ANTIPATHY is mysterious in its origin. Why is it we do not like Doctor Bell? "The reason why we can not tell," says the old rhyme, but there is no doubt about the feeling. Antipathy is like tastes for certain foods, or like prejudices for or against nationalities. Touching a dry sponge, or cutting a dry cork, or scratching a slate-pencil on a slate, are for some people so many ways of making them feel like "pin"-cushions for icicles. That creeping, crawling sensation is called goose-flesh. Antipathy is goose-flesh of the soul. It is upon delicate organisms that antipathy exerts its greatest force. Some are so callous that their sensitiveness seems protected by an alligator hide. They are all heel, while others are all sole, and go into hysterics if touched by a feather. The great Cardinal Newman was so sensitive that he appeared to wear his skin outside of his clothes.

Antipathy is no light matter in life, and deems no place sacred. It not only stops hands across the sea from clasping; it will not let hands clasp across the counter. Ribbons won't look at Bows in the Department Store. Cousins take opposite sides of the street while antipathy walks on the trolley-tracks. It is the voice of Clarinda which makes her sister Claribel wince; and Claribel's walk is something which Clarinda simply can not stand. Our age is famous, or rather infamous, for two discoveries, nerves and the divorce court, and those two discoveries reveal to us the world's immense supply of antipathy. Even the habit of the religious is not proof against the shafts of antipathy. One special reason for believing that monasteries are guarantees of a short purgatory is the large amount of antipathy religious life suffers patiently and conquers successfully. The closer the rough surfaces the greater the friction. "See how they love one another" made converts to early Christianity. From that principle and that fact we conclude that the community life of the Catholic Church ought to convert the world.

Antipathy comes from the Greek, and it is a word which may be freely translated, friction of the soul. Fortunately when we imported antipathy we brought in, too, its natural enemy. Sympathy also comes from the Greek, and it can be said to mean oil of the soul. Sympathy can remove in an instant all horrors of antipathy. Sympathy will shear the fretful porcupine of its bristling quills. It was sympathy in the mother frog which induced her in the old fable to enter her child in a beauty-show. Sympathy can not see the spots on the sun, because its sensitive eyes grow misty and tearful in the brilliancy it beholds. Sympathy is like a good appetite, where one has a fastidious taste. A starving man forgets his delicate tastes; a sympathetic man forgets all antipathies. Sympathy invites a tramp into its Department Store and turns him out bathed, shaved, clothed and blooming as proudly as a bridegroom.

It is a mistake to think antipathy is necessarily a vice or a fault. Feeling is not willing. Antipathy is more frequently the fuel which feeds the flame of virtue; it is often the admission price you must pay for enduring friendship; it is the roughness and the bitterness of the rind which sympathy throws away to keep the luscious fruit. If close proximity develops antipathy among men, you may estimate the length, width, breadth and depth of that divine sympathy which overcame the immense antipathies that arose between such infinitely opposed and incompatible objects as God and man, and brought them together in most intimate union. "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry

IV. LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY*

WE like, naturally enough, to cite Miss Guiney as an American poet, and yet we know full well that the chosen solitude of her life at old Oxford is the one perfect setting for her scholarly and cloistral muse. What has she in common with our modern rush, our "efficiency" and noisiness? What, save only her fine, free courage, has she in common with any world that is new?

And even this high-heartedness comes flaunting a Celtic genealogy. The father of "our" Louise Imogen Guiney was General Patrick Robert Guiney, a particularly gallant gentleman of Irish birth, a lawyer and editor, as well as a soldier; who died in Boston at the age of forty-two, from a wound received more than ten years before at the battle of the Wilderness. His influence upon the young only daughter who adored him and companioned all his final years would be hard to overestimate. Upon her life and her poetry it stamped something of his own militant valor, much of his own large vision and inspiration. She has written, in exquisite prose, the sum of her debt to him. And then, in the poem upon Donatello's Saint George she has gathered into perfect words his prayer and her own; the prayer, albeit often inarticulate, of all those who are not afraid of living largely—and paying the price:

> Spirits of old that bore me,
> And set me, meek of mind,
> Between great dreams before me,
> And deeds as great behind,
> Knowing humanity my star
> As first abroad I ride,
> Shall help me wear with every scar
> Honor at eventide.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> Oh, give my youth, my faith, my sword,
> Choice of the heart's desire:
> A short life in the saddle, Lord!
> Not long life by the fire.

If ever the Valkyrie cry rang through modern English verse, it was when Louise Imogen Guiney first gave her voice to song.

---

*The fourth of a series of literary papers by the author of "The Poets' Chantry."

We have said more than a little, in discussing Mrs. Meynell and Mrs. Hinkson, about the relative preponderance of art and domesticity. In Miss Guiney we have small cause to puzzle over any such dualism. Rather are we confronted by a singularly definite concentration, the artist's unswerving preoccupation with a starlike and austere ideal.

> Because man's cry, by night and day,
> Cried not for God, I broke away.
> On at your ruthless pace! I'll stalk, a hill-top ghost, with you!

There is something terrible as well as beautiful in this uncompromising fealty. It rings with the high, immortal music of the Valkyrie turned Crusader, and signed with the chrism of the cross, and speaking the language of the saints.

Concentration is the mother of detachment: and detachment spells, for poetry, both loss and gain. It leads beside still waters, very deep and very clear; but it will have little of the wild flowers—nay even, of the passion flowers—growing peradventure, by the way. Nor are we to confuse Miss Guiney's abstinence with the reticence of Alice Meynell. In the latter's work, we are aware of the wish not to cheapen certain experiences by too much talk about them. But with Miss Guiney, there would rather seem a positive and serene determination not to feel too deeply the passional side of life.

> For so, alas,
> With Love, alas,
> With fatal, fatal Love a girlhood goes.

Such is the plaint of her little verses upon "Joan's Youth"; a curious plaint for the poet, who must be, first of all, a harp. So, too, with her well-known "Song of the Lilac," an exquisite lyric, but a lyric of romance well in the past. Eh bien—so far as human records go, Brynhilda was the sole Valkyrie who ever learned to sing love songs, and that burning knowledge appears to have added very little to her peace. There is something unique and challenging in this refusal of a poet (and save the mark! a woman poet) to bow before Eros. Very sure must she be of music and message, too, who will so bring to terms "that little, infinite thing, the human heart!"

Every one who knows Miss Guiney's work at all knows that in it there is no lack of tenderness. There is a tenderness as old as humanity and as large, in her musings upon the dead, upon those who fail, upon mothers and little children. And for the "timid, sweet, four-footed ones of earth" there is a tenderness as fresh and as vehement as youth. Never will dog-lovers forget her heart-shaking little poem of "Davy." nor the lines "To a Dog's Memory," nor the haunting masterpiece of love and hope, "St. Francis Endeth His Sermon." Very gently does this strain of bird-love and beast-love enter into Miss Guiney's devotional verses—as it was found so many times entering into Mrs. Hinkson's—so that one of the most exquisite of her Christmas carols is half a carol of Brother Ox and Sister Ass:

> Still as blowing rose, sudden as a sword,
> Maidenly the Maiden bare Jesu Christ the Lord;
> Yet for very lowlihood, such a Guest to greet,
> Goeth in a little swoon while kissing of His feet.
>
> Mary, drifted snow on the earthen floor,
> Joseph, fallen wondrous weak now he would adore
> (Oh, the surging might of love! Oh, the drowning bliss!)
> Both are rapt to Heaven and lose their human Heaven that is.
>
> From the Newly Born trails a lonely cry.
> With a mind to heed, the Ox turns a glowing eye;
> In the empty byre the Ass thinks herself to blame:
> Up for comforting of God the beasts of burden came,
>
> Softly to inquire, thrusting as for cheer
> There, between the tender hands, furry faces dear.
> Blessing on the honest coats! tawny coat and gray
> Friended our Delight so well when warmth had strayed away.
> Crooks are on the sill; sceptres sail the wave;
> All the hopes of all the years are thronging to the Cave.
> Mother slept not long, nor long Father's sense was dim,
> But another twain the while stood parent-wise to Him.
>
> The Ox and the Ass.
> Be you glad for them,
> Such a moment came to pass
> In Bethlehem!

Miss Guiney's verse has more than a little in common with the classic grace and restraint of Lionel Johnson: a poet, by the by, whom she greatly loved, and about whom she has written with illuminating sympathy. But her music, and her viewpoint, too, are essentially native and original. She is a perfect exemplar of Edgar Poe's assertion that the true poet never sees—and consequently is incapable of ever saying—the obvious thing. Even of common things it is impossible for her to speak without some touch of quite uncommon beauty. Many and arresting are the treasures of her single lines: the description of Pascal, as "Rich in all forborne felicities"; and that other description, five words never to be forgotten by those who have dreamed in forest silences.

> The free,
> Innocent, magnanimous tree!

There is, indeed, something of this tender and eternal rightness in all Miss Guiney's nature poetry, whether it be such a verbal pageant as "The Squall," or such an ecstasy of outdoor music as "Bedesfolk," or so consummate a blending of sensuous imagery and ethical motivation as, for example, "Cobwebs." But nature, after all, is never so superb as when supernaturalized—just as life is never so absorbingly interesting as when measured and interpreted by the mysterious canons of eternity. So, it is not enough to say that there is no more pure, no more authentic vein in all contemporary poetry than that of Louise Imogen Guiney. It is not enough to say that she has captured and made her own a lyric note of silver beauty. These virtues must needs be granted her artistry. But she has added to them, has built upon them beauties of the spirit rather than the flesh. Deo Optimo Maximo has been the war-cry of this Christian Valkyrie. Hers has been, and is, the Vision as well as the Voice!

KATHERINE BRÉGY.

REVIEWS

Cathedrals and Cloisters of Northern France. Two volumes. By ELLIE WHITLOCK ROSE and VIDA HUNT FRANCIS. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.00.

Westminster Abbey. Two volumes. By HELEN MARSHALL PRATT. New York: Duffield & Co. $4.50.

The happy collaboration of Mesdames Rose and Francis had already resulted in three most interesting sets of double volumes on the Cathedrals and Cloisters of the Isle de France, and of Midland and Southern France; the present richly illustrated octavos conclude with satisfying completeness the story of the marvels of France's art and architecture in the ages when her faith and piety awakened genius and inspired it to the attainment of sublimity. The cathedrals and great cloisters are not a tithe of the story. Wherever in the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth centuries there was Christian fervor, there was genius; and faith and fervor were universal, striving daringly to express themselves in terms of stone and marble and glass and tapestry, in vaulting arch and lofty dome. And so in the villages and through the remote districts, as in town and city, arose a multitude of churches of an artistic beauty that our modern architects marvel at but can not reproduce. They were built and adorned by no noted architects nor artists. The trades-gilds of the place, the priests, people, townsmen, peasants, yearned to build around

His altar a monument to God, as they conceived of Him; and as their conception was as nearly adequate as humanity can compass, their execution was correspondingly sublime. When we consider that hundreds and often thousands of local craftsmen were engaged for generations in producing those medieval marvels of varied and perfect workmanship, we get some measure of the enlightenment of those ages; and also of the glib but shallow scribblers who dub them "Dark."

Our authors profess to record but the most striking specimens of French medieval architecture. The last two volumes contain some forty, selected from Brittany, Normandy, Maine, French Flanders, Lorraine and Nivernais. Hence they present all the developments of Gothic and Romanesque, and many have the additional interest that they are situated on the long battle line that has made their names familiar to the public in quite another connotation. Boulogne, Arras, Cambrai, Châlons, Verdun, Toul, Nancy, Metz and Strasbourg, have much more than strategic value, a value inspired long ago by the Prince of Peace; and so have St. Omer, Therouanne and St. Dié whose age-hallowed fortresses of prayer and piety stand also in striking contrast to the sanguinary scenes of conflict that now surround them. These and Le Mans, Lisieux, St. Malo and many another that deserves to be better known, are described always interestingly and with the simple appreciation of an untechnical admirer, but with a too frequent interlarding of alleged medieval atrocities that Protestant writers seem always to carry around with them as an antidote against Catholic beauty. They forget that they must go to Catholic lands and times to find such beauty, and the atrocities they could find at home.

The same remark applies, though in less degree, to the two volumes of 863 pages that tell the story and explain the marvels and monuments of Westminster Abbey. The pages are none too many, yet several of the French cathedrals would require still more to be treated adequately. The long and instructive story shows that it was Catholic faith and genius that gave to Westminster all that is worth writing about from the artistic viewpoint, and that Protestant additions are either monumental encumbrances, or lamentably inferior restorations of Protestant despoilments. Both sets have special interest for Catholics, but it is a pity that the writing of such books is left, for the most part, to those outside the faith, who, however well intentioned, necessarily omit the deeper things of Catholic and even artistic interest, for they can not fathom the rich and pregnant meanings of Catholic symbolism. It is true we build the great monuments to God and worship in them to His glory; but we might increase it by explaining them. The volumes before us have done this as creditably as could be expected from non-Catholic writers, and the 225 fine photogravures and other illustrations of "Cathedrals and Cloisters," and some fifty of "Westminster Abbey" are even more instructive than the letter-press. Both have excellent bibliographies. M. K.

Life in America One Hundred Years Ago. By GAILLARD HUNT, Litt.D., LL.D. New York: Harper & Bros. $1.50.

This book presents to us in a series of twenty-seven essays a historical account of that period of our national existence, during which our country strove successfully to establish and render permanent its position among the nations of the earth. Writing to commemorate the century of peace between Great Britain and the United States, Mr. Hunt has produced a volume that will be of value both to the student of history and economics and to the voracious "general reader." To mention a few of the varied chapters: in that on "Religion" the author gives an adequate and impartial account of the different sects flourishing in this country one hundred years ago; in the chapter on "Webster's Speller," he sketches the character of the education imparted in those days, while in the one on "Reading and Writing" the statement that "The printing press was considered the vehicle for depicting mankind washed and in good clothes," should give food for thought to publishers and readers of the twentieth century. The numerous sources cited by Mr. Hunt indicate the wide range of his reading. L. T. B.

Through the Grand Canyon from Wyoming to Mexico. By E. L. KOLB. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

The simplicity of the narrative is the chief charm of this new book of travel and description. It tells of a daring journey through dangerous passes, and all with an absence of boastfulness, which looms clearer for the felt presence of unostentatious modesty. The whole is a mass of poetry in the rough. Past hills, "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun," over dashing rapids, beside death-dealing boulders, "upon the masterful river which had carved the hearts of mountains and slashed the rocky plateaus, draining a kingdom and giving but little in return": such was the course taken by Ellsworth and Emery Kolb, with a courage to reach a hard-earned goal, that spells a lesson to him who reads. Leaving Green River City, Wyoming, September 8, 1911, and arriving at Needles, California, January 18, 1912, they crowded into one hundred and one days, adventures that had in them the thrill of danger, without which no incident is enjoyable for the truly bold. The purpose of the expedition was chiefly to collect photographs and moving pictures of the remarkable region traversed. Seventy-eight times camp was changed, rain often visited them in their sleep, they met a thousand kindnesses from people along the way; all these simple things are told, as well as the dangers overcome and left to be but a memory. The forty-eight pictures in the book are beautiful and graphic. The reader will wonder if the "movies" met with all the success they deserved. C. L. B.

Down West. By ALICE DEASE. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.30.

In the 120 pages of this latest number of the excellent "Catholic Library" series, there are seven tales of Irish life, any one of which is well worth the price of the whole. The fruit of the author's experiences in Connemara, they are true in color and in substance. The writer, unlike some alien exploiters of the Connacht peasantry, set out with no preconceived theory that the Irish are all comedians or melancholy dreamers or angels or villains; she simply describes them as she found them, and being a Catholic and in sympathy with their ways and feelings, she knew how to find them as they are. She has written much else that is of high literary as well as religious value, but nothing that is at once as dramatic, simple, pathetic, amusing and altogether satisfying as these revelations of the heart and soul of the western peasants. Their faults are laid bare, but with them their sterling virtues; above all their great philosophy of life, "Sure God is good and His blessed will be done." With the "Friday Woman," who had been a sinner, they like best the sermons on God's wrath, for "haven't we His mercy with us every day, and where'd we be at all without it? But the fires of hell, God help us! don't we forget them in our sins?" The humor and pathos of "A Second Hand Mission," and the sublimity of unconscious heroism in "Between the Sandhills and the Sea," and "Vespers and Complin" rank them high among the best short stories of the language, both in form and in content. M. K.

The Sunny Side of Diplomatic Life. By L. DE HEGERMANN-LINDENCRONE. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2.00.

Madame Lilie de Hegermann-Lindencrone is the American wife of a Danish diplomat. For more than thirty-five years her distinguished husband was his country's representative at Washington, Rome, Stockholm, Paris and Berlin, from which last post he was retired in 1912; and in the present volume the author gives to the public some 337 pages of letters, which she wrote during this long period of diplomatic service. Most of the letters are addressed to her mother, her aunt or her sister; and have been carefully selected with a view to the title of the book. They picture a life of uninterrupted pleasure and amusement. Not a shadow is allowed to linger across the bright path they follow. Balls, soirées, high teas, brilliant court functions succeed one another with such bewildering rapidity that the writer "hardly has time to do anything but change from one dress to another." Here and there are pleasant sketches of the home-life of royal persons, and interesting glimpses of really great men. But to find these the reader must toil through long descriptions of Worth's gowns,weary dinners and the empty details of luxury. No doubt all these trifles were of absorbing interest to the writer and recipients of the letters, but a more compassionate editor would have spared the unoffending "general reader" a great deal of such twaddle. The author is the self-complacent centre of all she describes, and seldom brought sunshine into the lives of her less fortunate fellow-creatures. The book is fully illustrated. V. M.

Chemistry. By RAPHAEL MELDOLA, D.Sc. The Home University Library. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $0.50.

This treatise will appeal favorably not only to those for whose benefit the series has been undertaken, but also and especially to the student of general chemistry. Nearly every teacher of this branch of science knows how difficult it is at times to get all his pupils to have an intelligent grasp of the fundamental laws and principles governing this science. The author, himself a professor of chemistry, has probably experienced this difficulty and therefore has spared no pains to insure clearness in the expression of his ideas. Omitting all that belongs to what is known as descriptive chemistry, he confines himself to the explanation of terminology and to proof of the fundamental laws and theories. Without belittling the importance of experiment, he accepts the facts made known by experiment and draws such conclusions only as are warranted by the premises. Careful, moreover, not to overstep the province assigned to him, however interesting to the reader such a digression might be, the author contents himself with indicating those avenues along which further reading might be pursued with profit. To help in this pursuit, a select bibliography is appended. On page 230 there is a very slight inaccuracy easily corrected by the reader: the words "right to left" should read, "left to right." The book is commended both to teachers and students of elementary chemistry. M. C. B.

The Dread of Responsibility. By ÉMILE FAGUET of the French Academy. Translated, with Introduction, by EMILY JAMES PUTNAM. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

Horror of all responsibility, the author holds, is the characteristic of the modern Frenchman. French courts of justice, he tells us, are a mere travesty of justice. Judicial power has ceased to exist because judges do not decide according to equity, but according to law, and so escape personal responsibility. The law itself is of no consequence where it would oppose the action of the Government, and the Government seeks to throw its own responsibility upon other shoulders. The jury when it actually condemns a criminal, instead of finding him merely unaccountable, will still avoid incurring responsibility by recommending him to mercy. Murder, he believes, is about the safest profession to follow, and, together with political office, the most reposeful.

Cynical as the author is, his lance is often directed against real social evils; yet he himself is without the slightest moral principle that would suggest the ultimate and only supreme responsibility, the responsibility toward his Creator. It is precisely the absence of this responsibility which, as a necessary consequence, has brought about the loss of every other sense of responsibility. His remedy of substituting aristocracy, an aristocracy of responsibility and not of wealth, for pure democracy is therefore nugatory unless it likewise supposes the supreme responsibility toward God from which all human responsibilty flows.

Jesuits receive their due share of misrepresentation. Catholicism in general and even Protestantism and religion itself fare no better. Catholics, he holds, shirk their responsibility by delegating their thinking to others. We have still to learn that St. Augustine, St. Thomas or even Dante were dwarfed intellectually by submitting to the divinely instituted Church of Christ. They were saved from error that they might think the more freely and cogently. A little such thinking would have greatly improved the present volume, without depriving the writer of any true freedom either in word or thought. J. H.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

According to the Bookman, the six works of fiction most widely read in this country during October were these: "The Eyes of the World," "The Prince of Graustark," "Bambi," "The Auction Block," "The Wall of Partition" and Saturday's Child." This list of novels, all of which have been noticed in AMERICA, indicates that there has been some improvement in the "general reader's" taste since the first week of October. For the foregoing "best-sellers," with the exception of the first and fourth, the reviewer did not find objectionable, and with some reservations, gave words of praise to them. Last month, however, four out of the six in the list had to be banned.

The Governor of Massachusetts, David I. Walsh, had an unusual experience last month. At the enthusiastic demand of the people in the "dear old Commonwealth," his Excellency actually had to issue a second edition of his Thanksgiving Proclamation. That sort of document is not in great request, as a rule, nor are its readers numerous, but the felicitous way in which the Bay State's first Catholic Governor words this year's call to "public thanksgiving and praise" may explain in a measure that remarkable "second edition." The Proclamation ends thus:

> On that day, and on all days, let us with reverent minds and hearts pour forth our gratitude to Him for the peace, prosperity and happiness which is our priceless possession; let us ask a continuance of those innumerable blessings which have made Massachusetts great and honorable; and as we strive to preserve and perpetuate the liberties that have been handed down to us, let us commend to the mercy of God and to the prayers and patriotism of our fellow-citizens the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, that it may continue to stand firm and strong as the defender of justice, dispenser of mercy. preserver of law, promoter of industry, keeper of knowledge and guardian of civil and religious freedom.

And this from a graduate of a Jesuit college! Shades of John Endicott and Cotton Mather!

The fall number of Pax, the Caldey Benedictine's quarterly, opens with a "community letter" from Abbot Aelred Carlyle, who recently completed his novitiate at Maredsous Abbey in Belgium, where he was ordained priest, and made his solemn profession. The Abbot appeals to Catholics to supply the places in the ranks of the "Caldey Helpers" left empty by Anglicans when the monks became real Catholics and Benedictines, for the resources of the abbey are now very meagre. In closing his letter Dom Aelred writes:

> Surely I need not say what it means to us all to be true members of the Catholic Church and legitimate children of the Order of Saint Benedict. People say many wicked and stupid things about converts; but the wickedest and stupidest of all, and the most untrue, is the insinuation that every convert finds what he least expected, that he is not understood, and that he is doomed to a life-long process of disillusionment. Indeed the very contrary is the truth. When the struggles of private ... gment are over and one stands upon the Rock and ... ks round upon the Catholic Church from inside, the feeling of relief and freedom from the stiffness and unnaturally cramped point of view of those outside the Church is unspeakably comforting.

This number also contains a most interesting account of how the Irish Abbot of Maredsous escaped to Holland, and "Some Reflections on the War," by the late Mgr. Benson. The latter's "intellectual deterioration,"—a common result of conversion—was so marked that this autumn hardly a Catholic periodical could be scanned without finding in it either a paper signed by him, some reference to a recent or coming lecture or sermon of his, or the announcement of a new book from the pen of that zealous and tireless worker.

Many of our readers will doubtless be glad to learn that the series of children's story-books which Andrew Lang edited is being continued, for "The Book of the Blue Sea" (Longmans, $1.50) has just been added, by Henry Newbolt, to the twenty-five variegated volumes already published. These sea tales, as the author explains, are not fiction, but a record of fact. He tells what adventures an English midshipman of the early nineteenth century must have had, brings vividly before the reader the naval heroes of the Napoleonic period, and ends with the story of Admiral Farragut's career. Boys who wish to know just how a forty-eight-gun line-of-battle ship used to sink a seventy-four, should not fail to read this book. Norman Wilkinson furnishes numerous illustrations in color or in black and white.

Having taken her heroine through the convent school, Elizabeth Jordan now tells us of "May Iverson's Career" (Harper, $1.25). May thinks she has a vocation to the religious life but she also thinks she would like to be a journalist. Her father asks her to "play fair" with her mother and herself and urges the journalistic career as the lesser of two evils. "Fair play" with the Creator doesn't seem to enter into their thoughts. Of course May has wonderful adventures. Although she wanders alone about New York streets at midnight, nothing happens to her. By the expedient of making May a journalist the author is able to weave in a haunted house story, a Virginia feud, a runaway marriage, a suffrage lecture trip, etc., etc. "Patty's Suitors" (Dodd, Mead, $1.25) is the latest of Carolyn Well's "Patty" books. Though the story is clean, it is not wholesome. The "full-fledged" Patty is a vain, brainless girl, the account of whose actions, language and sentiments will scarcely benefit the young reader for whom the book is evidently intended.

"The Wonderful Romance" (Dodd, $1.35), is the book "Pierre de Coulevain," whose real name was Mlle. Fabre, finished writing just before she died. Protesting that a "free believer" is quite different from a freethinker, this very "advanced" Modernist now "attacks frankly," as she expresses it, "the great questions of life," religion being that with which she is chiefly concerned. After aptly naming the Catholic Church the "Great Misunderstood One," the author proceeds to show how thoroughly she herself misunderstands the Church's character. Pierre de Coulevain has conveniently at hand a natural explanation for every miracle, every triumph in the history of Catholicism, and serves up once more, in an appetizing way, many an ancient misrepresentation and calumny. It is hard to see how a woman, once a Catholic, can believe such things. The author teaches that the world is governed by a sort of fatalistic Providence, which actually leads men into sin. "The Wonderful Romance" is a dangerous book, for its author, who writes with considerable literary charm, will give Protestants an utterly false conception of the Church, and will weaken the faith of "wish-bone Catholics." At this moment, perhaps, Mlle. Fabre is not very proud of her last legacy to the world.

The Desmond Fitzgerald Company, New York, has added two more to their "Mother Dear" books, "Lady Rum-Di-Doodle-Dum's Children," by S. B. Dinkelspeel ($1.00), and "The Curly-haired Hen" ($0.75), a translation from the French of A. Vimar. The former consists of fifteen stories, in which a gifted narrator named Flip marvelously intermixes fairies, mortals and Rum-Di-Doodles; and the latter recounts, with numerous and most amusing illustrations, the ludicrous evolution of the only hen that had hair. They are well brought out, the illustrations of M. Vimar's book being worth the price of both, but they lack the literary charm of Mr. Leamy's "Golden Spears" and "Fairy Minstrel" in the same series. Lucy Fitch Perkins, who is writing for children an attractive set of books about twins of various nationalities, has now described the amusing adventures of "The Eskimo Twins" (Houghton, $1.00), as Menie the boy and Monnie the girl look and dress exactly alike, you can not possibly tell them apart, nor their two dogs, Nip and Tup, either. This, of course, causes endless confusion. The clever pictures the author has drawn will increase little readers' enjoyment of the book. In "The Secret of Pocomoke," Mary T. Waggaman entertainingly relates for Catholic schoolgirls the adventures of the sterling "Miss Pat," who would not allow her Church to be calumniated, and who turned out to be an heiress after all.

By way of preparation for Christmas, J. Fischer & Bro., New York, have published musical settings of "Lætentur Cœli" ($0.12), the offertory for the first Mass on that day, and "Tui Sunt Cœli" ($0.12), the offertory for the third Mass, both written for chorus of mixed voices by René L. Becker. While joyous in character, these selections are not necessarily confined either by words or music to Christmas, but may also be used on many other feast days in the year. From the same firm the following pieces also came recently: a "Mass in honor of St. Barbara" ($0.80), of pleasing character and of no serious difficulty, written for chorus of mixed voices, by René L. Becker; also a "Mass in honor of St. Benedict" ($0.80), for chorus of mixed voices, by Jos. I. Muller. "In a Flower Garden" ($0.75) is a cantata for juvenile voices, the words by Edith M. Burrows, the music by W. Rhys-Herbert. The composer is quite well known as a writer of cantatas and operettas, his "Sylvia" having been frequently presented. "In a Flower Garden" has for its theme a day in a garden, beginning with the Bird's chorus, "Peep, Peep," the chorus of the Dews, and the song of the Sunbeams. The popular flowers, Clover, Daisy, Buttercup, star as soloists, as do Fair-weather and Noon. The climax comes with the Wind song and the "pitter-patter" of the Rain's ditty, Storm Cloud, no doubt, being the villain. The dénouement is provided by the Rainbow song, "Song o' Sunset," and Fireflies' song, "Blinking a Lullaby." The music, of necessity limited in its scope, is in touch with the story throughout, the solos and choral numbers, in unison and in two parts, being effective and pleasing. Credit is due the librettist for providing an interesting text for the piper to pipe to.

BOOKS RECEIVED

American Book Co., New York:
Practical Talks with the Christian Child. By Louis E. Cadieux. $0.20.

Ave Maria Press, Notre Dame, Ind.:
Round About Home. By P. J. Carroll, C.S.C. $1.00.

Benziger Bros., New York:
Rambles in Catholic Lands. By Dom Michael Barrett, O.S.B. $2.00; Die Jesuiten in der Schweiz 1814-1847. Von Augustin Sträter. $0.20; The Ivy Hedge. By Maurice Francis Egan. $1.35.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston:
Civilization and Health. By Woods Hutchinson. $1.50; Songs of the Outlands. By Henry Herbert Knibbs. $1.25; A Century's Change in Religion. By George Harris. $1.25; The Early Life of Mr. Man. Told and Pictured by E. Boyd Smith. $2.00.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
The Hand of Mercy. By Richard W. Alexander. $1.00; Uncle Pat's Cabin. By William C. Upton. $1.25.

Mission Press S. V. D., Techny, Ill.:
The Ex-Seminarian. By Will W. Whelan. $1.00.

Scott, Foresman & Co., Chicago:
A Great Soul in Conflict. By Simon A. Blackmore, S.J. $1.50.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.:
The East I Know. By Paul Claudel. Translated by Teresa Frances and William Rose Benét. $1.25.

EDUCATION

Medical Schools and Their Critics

IN an article which appeared in AMERICA for May 23, 1914, "Veritas" offered the following criticism of the Carnegie Foundation and the American medical schools:

> The greatest efforts, on a grand scale, are being made to discredit and destroy professional schools conducted under private auspices, especially by Catholics and the religious orders. The unauthorized investigation of the medical colleges made by the Carnegie Foundation tried to put out of existence many medical colleges. This agency of elimination is closely followed by the American Medical Association, which rates the existing medical institutions and thus turns the students away from the so-called inferior kind. To suppose that this rating is done according to strict merit and justice would demand the simplicity of an innocent babe. In fact this rating should be carefully examined and verified in the name of justice and fair play.

This opinion, shared by many professors and practitioners, is strengthened by the action which the American Medical Association recently adopted in the case of the Ohio State University. Last February, the Starling-Ohio Medical College became the medical school of the State University, and thereupon was rated Class A plus, by the Association. Much amazement was expressed at the time by those conversant with medical education in Ohio. "It is not too much to say," remarked the Cincinnati Lancet-Clinic, "that this classification of the new medical department of the Ohio State University has seriously disturbed the confidence which the medical educators of Ohio had previously felt in the fairness. efficiency and impartiality of the Council on Medical Education of our national body. The least that can be said is that the action of the Council, or perhaps of the Secretary of the Council, if the membership of the Council did not itself act, was hasty, ill-advised, without proper investigation, and something now to be regretted."

HOW THE ASSOCIATION "INVESTIGATES"

But amazement grows when one reads that the Journal of the American Medical Association describes the Starling-Ohio Medical College as a "well equipped and well established Class A institution." Reviewing the whole situation, the Lancet-Clinic gives some interesting facts which show how the Association has equalled the feat of making a silk purse from a sow's ear, by taking a low class medical school, and making it a Class A institution by rating it as such. The nucleus of this new school was the Cleveland-Pulte Medical school, a Class C institution. At least twenty-seven State Boards refused to recognize its diploma. For entrance, it required, at least in theory, a bare high-school education. Its hospital facilities were summed up in an old abandoned dormitory, usually without patients. The high rating accorded under these circumstances, "will probably come as a shock to those who have been earnestly looking forward to higher education in medical America," says the editor of the Lancet-Clinic, "and will tend to discourage those who are already war-worn and toil-weary with the conflicts of the past twenty-five years." This is a plain and fearless statement. Reviewing the rating which the Association has assigned to other American medical schools, one is curious to know whether the Association was guided by real knowledge of existing conditions, or whether its judgments were based upon circumstances foreign to the question. If sincere investigation were made of the action of the American Medical Association, there can be little doubt that the results would show many other instances, in which the widely-published ratings of the Association are equally hasty, ill-advised and "without proper investigation." The harm thus done to deserving medical schools, as well as the praise meted out to schools of low standing, can not in any sense help to further medical education.

FURTHER PLANS OF THE ASSOCIATION

The secretary of the Association, Dr. N. P. Colwell, has recently forwarded the following letter to a number of American colleges:

> Within the next year or so, it will be necessary for the Council of Medical Education, or some other standardizing agency, to publish a list of liberal arts colleges which are deemed worthy of recognition as being in a position to give acceptably the preliminary training for medical students. There will be included in this list, only such colleges as require for admission the full equivalent of a standard four-year high school course.

It would be well to remind the writer of this document, and with him the Council of Medical Education and other "standardizing agencies," that the liberal arts colleges of the different denominations, have done quite as much as any other agency, to demand a high standard of preparation in those who enter medical and other professional schools. This is only in keeping with their belief, that professional courses entered upon by poorly equipped students, can not form professional men of a high type. But these colleges object, and with reason, to be rated by "agencies" such as the Council of Medical Education. What they may expect is quite clear from the rating of medical schools announced by that body, and in particular, from its recent action in the case of the medical school of the Ohio State University. In the words of the Lancet-Clinic, this "has seriously disturbed the confidence which the medical educators of Ohio had previously felt in the fairness, efficiency and impartiality of the Council of Medical Education of our national body."

Frankly, danger to liberty of education is to be apprehended from the action of the American Medical Association, the Carnegie Foundation, and other self-appointed mentors and investigators of American schools and colleges. Will those who believe in liberty see the danger in time? JUSTITIA.

ECONOMICS

Finding the Remedy

MORE than twenty years ago, in his famous encyclical on the condition of the working classes, Leo XIII declared that "the relative rights and mutual duties of capital and labor," constituted one of the most pressing and difficult questions of the age. "There can be no doubt whatever," wrote the Pontiff, "that some remedy must be found, and found quickly, for the misery and wretchedness which at this moment presses so heavily and so unjustly upon the vast majority of the working classes." Despite the many social movements which have been fostered since these brave words were first spoken, it can hardly be said that the condition of labor has been essentially improved. The injustice which for ages has been the burden of the defenceless poor still "presses heavily and unjustly," as the Pontiff says, upon thousands of half-fed, underpaid workingmen and workingwomen, who are bravely fighting to maintain an existence and a home upon the scanty wages given them in return for honest labor. History must repeat itself, for history is merely the story of how human nature, which remains essentially unchanged through changing centuries and climes, responds to certain given and recurring conditions. Men will bear with injustice for a time, either because forbearance is expedient, or under the circumstances, a virtue; or because they are unable to oppose an effective resistance. But man is not so constituted that he will suffer injustice forever. Bent on amusement and ease, the Roman mob cried for bread and public games. But throughout history, one may read of mobs, bent not on pleasure but on securing their right to live by their labor, who rose in their united might to take by force, the bread which rapacious greed withheld from them. In the United States, the crisis is fast becoming acute. In more than one section of the country, it has been found necessary to call upon armed force, not to settle the ultimate rights of capital and labor, but to repel the lawlessness of men, who though they suffered deeply, forgot for the moment that two wrongs can never make a right. Within the past year, the country has witnessed a conflict between capital and labor which in ruthlessness has fallen little short of civil war. What we have already seen, may be counted but a faint foreshadowing of the industrial revolution which will strive to establish itself by violence, if the remedy for our social ills urged by Leo XIII is not speedily found and sedulously applied.

ARE LABOR UNIONS THE REMEDY?

The position of the Church upon the union of workingmen is well known, and hardly needs repetition. "The consciousness of his own weakness," wrote Leo XIII, "urges man to call in help from without." What one man may be quite unable to obtain, may at times be secured readily and lastingly by men lawfully combining to secure a desired end. The last twenty years have been marked by the activity of the working classes in forming unions and associations. Thus, for instance, in 1890, the American Federation of Labor had about two hundred thousand members. Twenty years later, this number had risen to more than a million and a half, and at present the Federation has a membership in excess of two million. It is claimed that with the rise of the Federation, the labor unions of which it is composed have gained not only in numbers, but in practical influence. While this last assertion may be questioned, it will be gladly conceded that, despite the Socialists among its members, the Federation, as a body, has steadily refused to be allured by the specious promises held out by the socialistic program. The progress which the Federation has made, and the means upon which it relies to further its avowed purpose, are thus stated by its President, Mr. Samuel Gompers:

> There was a time when it was unfashionable for working people to be organized, when the doors of "decent homes" were often shut in the faces of the men who dared think and dream and act and hope for the organization of the working people. If that is changed, it is because we have learned to respect ourselves and to respect each other; it is because we have a better conception not only of our rights and privileges, but of our duties and our obligations. And in the same proportion that this develops in the minds and hearts of our working people, the sooner will we come into our own.

True as is this last statement, one can not but feel that Mr. Gompers' position will satisfy neither capital nor labor. It is precisely upon the existence and extent of their mutual rights and privileges, that capital and labor differ. It is at least conceivable that what Mr. Gompers terms the workingman's "right," capital may consider a privilege assumed without reasonable warrant. It seems true, as the Federation contends, that capital has always been more concerned with lessening wages than with increasing them, and that it has never seriously considered its duty in the question of a living wage. On the other hand, capital claims that the workingman's main purpose in life has always been to sell his labor as dearly as possible, without due regard to existing economic conditions, and that whenever the interests of capital and labor have come in conflict, organized labor rarely stopped to consider the fact that capital as well as labor has certain inalienable rights. But even when the workingman's right is conceded, the extent to which he may go in defending it, still remains in dispute. It can hardly be admitted that organized labor can judge without prejudice, what the laborer's right may be, what are his privileges, and what his duty. The tendency of organized labor to find the court of final instance within its own circle, has been criticised as a fundamental weakness in the labor union's position. Equally unjust, is capital's claim that the decision of disputes must rest with its representatives.

FAILURE OF THE LABOR UNION

But while we may admit the utility and practical necessity of labor unions, and even find some place in the scheme of economic reform for the American Federation of Labor, it would be vain to hope that these agencies can effect a lasting change for the better in the condition of the workingman. The union is not an impartial investigator of conditions as they really are. It has put capital in the prisoner's box, and has assumed the double rôle of prosecuting attorney and judge. The question might be easily solved could we assume that the workingman is invariably the victim of oppression, and his employer a raging tyrant, or that labor represents revolt, and capital, justice. But this is not stating the case fairly. In the last quarter century, the vast expansion of mining and manufacturing interests, of the means of communication and transportation, and of every line of trade and commerce, has complicated economic conditions to a degree which, in a simpler age, would have been thought impossible. Older standards of value have become vague and shifting, and with capital in possession of the sources of wealth, capital untouched by the sense of justice which is founded on religion, it is not to be wondered at that labor has, at times, been deeply wronged. The workingman has not been blind to his wrongs. Unfortunately, however, his sense of injustice has too often made him ready to listen to the demagogue with his promised social panacea, and has prevented him and his unions, from taking that complete and just view of prevailing economic conditions which must be duly considered if the program of reform is to be practical. That labor can not, or will not, see the other side of the shield, is quite as fatal to the course of justice, as is the failure of capital to recognize the evil conditions for which it is largely responsible. Intelligent treatment can not be expected from a physician who will not study all the symptoms presented by the patient, and the practitioner at law who refuses to investigate the strength of his opponent's case will soon come to grief.

THE CAUSE OF THE FAILURE

Unwittingly, perhaps, the labor movement in this country has drawn much inspiration from the materialistic philosophy which places man's happiness in economic independence. It has refused to recognize that the labor question must be settled ultimately by religion. The leaders of the movement may claim that provision for the religious welfare of the workingman is beyond their province. If so, they have pledged their associations to neglect the only factor which can be of real value in bettering his condition. Labor disputes arise because men forget justice. Until justice is deeply and permanently established in the hearts of workingmen and employers alike through the influence of supernatural religion, we can not hope that industrial wars will cease. At the recent convention of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Walter George Smith of Philadelphia, ventured to present the claims of supernatural religion. It is somewhat significant that he was violently opposed by a strong minority, and that his position was not considered vitally important by the convention as a whole. In concluding his remarks, Mr. Smith, with the evident disapproval of many of the delegates, asked the convention to remember that while this life has its problems of importance, which call for immediate solution, it is at best a time of trial, and in its true purpose, a preparation for the world to come.

> This is the central thought that should come to the employer and the worker alike, that this life of ours is a time of preparation. We can never expect the millennium in our time. It is through suffering, through trial, through tests, that character is perfected. The great object of life is not ease, is not going along the lines of least resistance, but is bearing a man's part of the burdens of the entire community, in order that this short life may be but a preparation for life eternal.

Labor unions, let it be repeated, may have useful purpose. The statement that they are a practical necessity may pass unchallenged. The union would be very nearly a perfect institution if, in the words of Benedict XV, it cared for "the moral perfection of the individual member as well as for his material welfare." But as long as labor organizations refuse to recognize the purpose of our finite life, and the place of supernatural religion in the heart of man, they can do nothing to help the world to find "the remedy for the misery and the wretchedness which at this moment presses so heavily and so unjustly upon the vast majority of the working classes." Life's equation will never balance, if God is not one of its terms.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Anti-Profanity League of New York City has issued a report of its work during the past year. The League has as its "sole object, the suppression of the great American vice of profanity." In pursuance of this object, the League prints and distributes calendars, of which thousands are annually secured by the Liquor Dealers' Association for bar-room display, and holds mid-day street meetings. The League is a Catholic association, and has the approbation of the Archdiocesan Union of the Holy Name Society.

How deeply the Catholic spirit has penetrated the lives of the Belgian people is illustrated, according to the Catholic Times, by the first question which the refugees in England usually put to the committees which endeavor to find them a home. "How far off will the nearest Catholic Church be?" When history has written the glorious story of Belgian patriotism, shall Catholics have heard the last of the stupid calumny, so beloved by Protestant "missionaries" in Catholic regions, that the Catholic Church makes men cowards and traitors to their country?

An interesting discussion in the London Tablet brings out the fact that in reciting the rosary for the souls in purgatory, it is permissible to substitute the "Eternal rest" for the "Glory." The reason is simple. The complete rosary consists of fifteen Our Fathers and one hundred and fifty Hail Marys, with the meditations. All the rest is an addition, pious and profitable, but not essential.

In a recent number of the Boston Transcript, "K. F." writes interestingly on "How the Classics Were 'Canned.'" The scholar will hardly admit the plea that the classics can be known satisfactorily through mere translations; and indeed, "K. F." does not press the point. The decision of this question, he admits, belongs to experts. But "K. F." is right in thinking that the majority of classical teachers "live too much in the past," and that they have too frequently resorted to "the pessimistic dodge of asking what can be expected of a sordid and materialistic age like ours."

> They have made the great mistake of looking backward at the Renaissance, when every one that counted had to know Latin and Greek, whether he wanted to or not, instead of looking forward to a time when every one that counts will want to know Latin and Greek, whether he has to or not.

"K. F." holds that a strong reaction has sprung up against the exclusive emphasis laid on science by nineteenth century thinkers. The way is open for a revival of the classics, and the revival will come, provided teachers will look upon the classics as literature, and not as museum-cases from which to draw specimens to illustrate grammar and linguistics.

"Ah, me!" writes Thackeray of his editorial experiences, "we wound where we never intended to strike; we create anger where we never meant harm; and these thoughts are the thorns in our cushion." From the opposing standpoints and of racial affiliations, contributing editors continue to assail AMERICA's alleged French, German or English proclivities on the war question. Neutrality often puts thorns in the cushion; but it is comforting to reflect that AMERICA's policy of giving a hearing to all sides, has satisfied the majority of old readers, and secured new ones to an extent hitherto unprecedented in a similar period of three months. Commendation has outweighed the criticism. The president of a distinguished Irish college writes:

> Since its inception, AMERICA has been the favorite paper of the Faculty, but for the last month or so, I have had the war-topics read to the students every week. It seems strange that we should be obliged to get our first reliable news of the European conflict from across the Atlantic, but such is the fact. With the possible exception of Mr. Belloc's contributions to Land and Water, AMERICA is the only paper in English, so far as I have seen, that gives an adequate and unbiased account of how things are really going on. The article, "Ireland and the War," by P. V., is excellent, and altogether true. One living in Ireland could hardly have written it, for just now he could not get the perspective.

May it not be that some of AMERICA's angry critics are hardly in a position to "get the perspective"?

Of late, AMERICA has criticised the anti-Catholic bias of the war news published in a number of American papers. These cablegrams, as it appears, emanated from a tainted foreign source, but it is pleasant to note that many American war-correspondents have written eloquently of the heroism of priests and nuns on the battlefield. The following paragraph is from the pen of Mr. William G. Shepherd, of the United Press:

> There's the peace of a certain Warless Land that he knows about on his face and he reads his services over a dead German with the same tender tones and the same smile of hope that he has for the dead soldier who sleeps in the red, white and blue of France. I've seen the little priest a score of times since then. He marches more than any soldier. There are scores of dead to bury; there are dozens of stories and confessions to hear from dying men in the hospitals; there are the broken-hearted women and children of the village who have lost their soldier loved ones to be comforted, and his task was so great that it seemed to me that if I were the little priest and saw so much of such terrible sorrow in a world gone so far away I would take off my white robe and fold it away and say, "God has forgotten us. What's the use?" Only I know by the little clergyman's face that he knows that God has not forgotten us, even though the cannons of men who are hungry to kill are sounding above the chant of the funeral services and even though each crash means more broken hearts and more dead to bury.

It may be that one result of this greatest of wars will be an increased respect for the Church that can produce men like this little French priest.

"When nine out of sixteen college graduates who apply for positions as teachers of mathematics," says the Philadelphia Ledger, "think that 'feasable,' 'attemps,' and 'trigonomtry' are correct spelling, it is time for educators to look both surprised and alarmed." At the examination in question, an applicant wrote a paragraph of four hundred words, of which he misspelled twenty-two. Dr. G. W. Flounders, the chief examiner, claims that this lamentable showing is not the fault of the lower schools.

> The public schools are doing just as much to teach correctness, in fact they are doing more along this line than ever before. But they are not continuing the instruction so long. Pupils usually do not have spelling lessons after they leave grammar school.

The Provost of the University of Pennsylvania is inclined to take issue with Dr. Flounders. He is sure that forty years ago, people were better spellers and, in his opinion, the faulty spelling of the present day is due to the poor methods of teaching prevalent in the schools.

> It seems to me that the schools are not teaching this subject as they should. In my own school days, the teacher used to give out words as fast as we could write them. Then we exchanged slates and corrected one another's mistakes. Closer attention to spelling books, more spelling lessons, these are the remedies for modern inaccuracy. The old-fashioned spelling bee, where the pupil who failed went to the foot of the class, was also very stimulating.

It is interesting to note that the old-fashioned methods described by the Provost are to be found in the Ratio Studiorum. or plan of studies compiled for the use of Jesuit schools, toward the end of the sixteenth century. Their introduction into modern grammar schools and academies would do much to check what the Ledger calls "our bizarre, free-for-all spelling."

There is a tendency among social workers to criticise the methods employed by Catholic institutions of correction and for the relief of distress. Sometimes this criticism is the outcome of religious prejudice. Oftener, perhaps, it is based upon ignorance of the good which these institutions are accomplishing. Since of late the Sisters of the Good Shepherd have borne the brunt of this criticism, it is interesting to note what Judge Lindsey, of Denver, thinks of their work. The following quotation is from the Denver Catholic Register:

> A committee, consisting of Dr. Hughes and Messrs. Armstrong and Cleveland, the latter two Protestants, told of an investigation made at the Good Shepherd home. Not one girl who was dissatisfied with the treatment was found. The home was declared to be more sanitary than the city's private houses.
>
> Juvenile Judge Ben B. Lindsey said that he had sent so many girls to the Good Shepherd home that at times he was ashamed of himself, but he never knew one to be refused. It would be impossible for a State institution to do the work the home does. The State isn't doing it, he reminded, whether it is possible or not. He declared that, when Protestants say to him that non-Catholics should not be sent to the home, he asks them why they don't start a similar Protestant home; but they don't do it. He is not a Catholic himself. The home, he showed, has saved thousands of dollars for the taxpayers, besides what it has done in a moral way. In his fifteen years' relations with it, the juvenile court officials have found only one girl who entered any kind of a protest against the Sisters, and he found on investigation that outside persons had influenced her to do this.

The sociology which attempts to divorce religion from the problem of correction is gaining ground throughout the country. Catholics will do well to keep a strict watch upon private and public committees of charities and correction. The proselytizer is still in our midst; often he, or she, is called a "social worker." It is well to add, however, that Catholic criticism will be acceptable, and what is more to the point, effective, only on condition that Catholics are ready to do their share of the work of social reform.

"The heart beats high," writes George Eliot, "and all brave deeds seem near to us and possible, in the presence of heroism." Here is a story of heroism, taken from the Salt Lake City Intermountain Catholic, well worth retelling.

> One week ago, last Sunday, in a little northern Colorado mission church, it was Communion day for the children of the parish. Two little girls drove twenty-seven miles to receive their Saviour in the Sacrament of the Altar. The Mass, due to the fact that the priest celebrated the august sacrifice at a place some distance off before he went to this town, did not begin until 12:30. These girls and their parents had to arise at 3 o'clock in the morning and start their long drive in order that the youngsters could receive Communion. The girls, therefore, had been fasting thirteen hours all but a few minutes before they received the Eucharist, and they had been awake ten hours of those thirteen.

May this modern instance of Catholic heroism stir our sluggish city dwellers to imitate, afar off if not in detail, the heroism of those two little girls of Colorado, a heroism which, after all, is not extraordinarily uncommon in the sparsely settled districts of the great West.

In commenting upon the downfall of the bogus Knights of Columbus oath, Mr. C. B. MacDonald gives utterance to the following sentiments through the columns of the Caldwell, Kansas, News:

> Among the best citizens I have ever known were members of the Catholic Church. I may not admire their religion; in fact I know nothing whatever about it. But when such men as Dan Macy, the Metzinger brothers, Will Duffy, and dozens of others I could mention, are condemned on account of their religion, in which they are fully as devout as the members of any other church organization, I feel that to class such man as traitors to their country is an outrage, unfair and indecent.

Mr. MacDonald has supplied Catholics with precious food for salutary thought. He knows nothing about the Catholic religion, but he does know "Dan Macy, the Metzinger brothers, Will Duffy and dozens of others." He argues that were the Church the monster which her enemies paint her, these men would repudiate her. A truly Catholic life is a better argument for the sanctity of the Church than many words. To paraphrase Cardinal Newman: "Let us live like Dan Macy, the Metzinger brothers and Will Duffy, and we have given the defamers of the Church an argument for which there is no answer."

Longmans' New Books

William Pardow of the Company of Jesus

BY JUSTINE WARD.
With 4 Portraits. Crown 8vo. Pp. xiv+274. $1.50 net.

In this life of Father Pardow, the celebrated Jesuit preacher who died in 1909, he is depicted as the embodiment of Jesuit principles, the result of Jesuit training. The aim of the author has been to give an account of a man who responded fully to that training, and whose life was a direct outgrowth of those great principles—taken literally—which Ignatius gave to his little band as their working principles; and who brought them to bear in practice, directly and without reservation of any kind, without thought of self or fear of others.

The volume contains a clear account of the rules, methods and procedure of the Jesuits, the internal government of the Order and the formation of its members in a way that is not generally considered available to the layman.

Teacher and Teaching

By the REV. RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J., Editor of AMERICA. $1.00 net.

"The reverend author of this volume is well known as a teacher and writer of first rank. . . . Probably no one is better fitted to offer counsel and suggestions on the best mode of arranging and prosecuting the important work of Christian education step by step. . . ."
—Catholic Standard and Times.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

CARNEGIE HALL—DEC. 9th

The Dream of Gerontius

Composed by Edward Elgar
Poem by Cardinal Newman

The Oratorio Society of New York, Louis Koemmenich, Conductor, will present this immortal Catholic work for the sixth time as their 232d regular concert on Wednesday, Dec. 9th, at 8.15.
This great poetic conception of the condition of the soul, made known by the theology of the Catholic Church, has for its musical setting one of the most sublime Oratorios written—a truly inspired work, dramatic, soulful, unforgettable. "One can not help being a better Christian after having heard it," as a priest recently said.

Seats, 25c. to $2.00 at Box Office

THE VATICAN
ITS HISTORY—ITS TREASURES.

The Most Magnificent Book of Artistic Literary and Historical Interest ever Published
A Book of Perpetual Value and Universal Appeal
A Masterpiece of Beautiful Book Making

APPEARS TO-DAY

The only standard work in English giving the history of this most famous of palaces, a full description of its matchless apartments and collections, and an account of the papal administration. Written by the most celebrated group of Scholars and Connoisseurs who ever collaborated in such a work.

Beautifully Illustrated with Reproductions of the Most Sublime Artistic Creations of all time

CONTENTS—History of the Vatican Palaces; Vatican Gardens; Chapel of Nicholas V.; Sistine Chapel; Pauline Chapel; Appartamento Borgia; Stanza and Loggie of Raphael; Picture Gallery; Tapestries; Egyptian Museum; Etruscan Museum; Museum of Sculpture; Gallery of Inscriptions; Christian Museum; Numismatic Collection; Hall of the Maps; Library; Archives; Mosaic Factory; Administration.

AUTHORS—Corrado Ricci, Director General, Department of Antiquities and Fine Arts, Rome. Orazio Marucchi, Archæologist of the Sacred Palaces, Professor of Christian Archæology, University of Rome. Antonio Munoz, Professor of Medieval and Modern Art. University of Rome. Luigi Cavenaghi, Director, Vatican Picture Gallery, Roman Superior Council of Fine Arts. Monsignor Paul Maria Baumgarten, Prussian Historical Institute of Rome, Domestic Prelate to the Pope. Federico Hermanin de Reichenfeld, Director of the National Gallery, Rome. Camillo Serafini, Director of the Vatican and Capitoline Numismatic Collections. Leandro Ozzola, Inspector Royal Gallery of Ancient Arts, Rome. Alessandro della Seta, Professor Royal University of Genoa. Baron Rodolfo Kanzler, Director, Vatican Christian Museum. Salvatore Nobile, Director, Vatican Mosaic Factory, and Ugo Monneret de Villard of the Polytechnic, Milan.

ILLUSTRATIONS—Among the masterpieces reproduced are the paintings of Michelangelo, Raphael, Fra Angelico, Pinturicchio, Botticelli, Peruginó, Signorelli, Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, Murillo, Melozzo da Forli, Domenichino, Il Guercino, Baroccio, Ghirlandaio, Caravaggio, Montagna, Antoniazzo Romano, Paris Bordone, Ribera, Niccolo Alunno; Sculptures by Myron, Polycletus, Cresilas, Phidias, Praxiteles, Leochars, Lysippus, Daedalus, Bryaxis, Agesander, Apollonius, Polydorus, Athenodorus, etc. Also the most interesting objects in the Egyptian, Etruscan and Christian Museums, in the Library and Archives, etc.

Contains almost 600 pages (12 inches x 9). One hundred views of the most important features of the Vatican. Over 450 reproductions of the world-famous treasures of art and science which have made the Vatican the great artistic and intellectual centre of the world. All the resources of printing have been exhausted to preserve the beauty and quality of the originals. The ornaments, initials and designs for the book have been taken from the decorations of the Vatican.

Binding—Embossing dies of exceptional beauty from Vatican subjects.

Limited number of specimen pages available.
Printed matter may be had on application.

Price, $10 Net—(Splendid buckram binding, in slip box).
Also two most beautiful editions de luxe in vellum and morocco at $15 and $25

THE LETTERS AND ARTS PUBLISHING CO., 1 West 34th St., New York

Please send me specimen pages of The Vatican—Its History—Its Treasures.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

THE LITTLE BOOKS WITH THE BIG FACTS

There is no use firing a gun in the sharp and decisive contests that turn on the great issues and current controversies, religious, educational, sociological and historical, of the times, unless you have the range. Are you ready, as a Catholic, to hold your own at the critical moment? Let us supply you with a quick-firer provided with all the essentials of accuracy, and sure to prove an efficient and reliable weapon.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers) $1.00 PER YEAR
Single numbers 5 cents each,
$3.00 per hundred

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. Each number contains several articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Best statements of Catholic doctrine. Surest results of historical research. Latest word on subjects in dispute. Important addresses at Catholic Congresses. Documents such as Papal Encyclicals, and Pastoral letters of more than local interest. Occasional sermons of special merit. Biographies, Editorials, Chronicles, etc.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

LATEST NUMBER, NOV. 22.
This Issue is a Convert-Maker. Father JOHN A. COTTER, S.J., supplies in a paper entitled

The Architect's Plan

a guide for finding the true Church. Then follow Mgr. Benson's reflections on the "Happiness of Catholicism." A short article by Father Woods on "Infallibility" comes next, and the number ends with a brief answer by Father Dwight to the query "Was St. Peter in Rome?" This number of the CATHOLIC MIND will prove of great value to those who have converts to instruct. It should be distributed at missions and circulated widely among non-Catholics.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Eethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion.

1912

1. The Name "Roman Catholic." Joseph Husslein, S.J.
4. Doctor Lingard. Herbert Thurston, S.J., in The Month
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons. John Gerard, S.J.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
12. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
15, 16. Catholics and Social Action. Charles D. Plater, S.J.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

4. Protestantism and Progress. His Eminence Francis Cardinal Bourne
7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge
24. The Scientific Outlook. Sir B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa. Peter Finlay, S.J.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
18. The Index.
19. Justice to Mexico.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

TO know you have chosen wisely adds half the pleasure to giving. Just now, if it's the choosing that puzzles—a beautiful offers the ideal solution. Styles and finishes to match all interiors. Their many sizes are susceptible to any number of pleasing combinations. Then, when occasion arises, more sections to match are always in stock. Ideal for the man at college—he can take them with him when he becomes an alumnus. Where much book space is required, as in the College Library, the Globe-Wernicke "Utility" Style possesses maximum economy. Write for "The World's Best Books" and Catalog No. RR 121.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati

Makers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Wood and Steel), Steel Safes, Stationers' Supplies.

On sale by 2000 authorized agents. Freight prepaid

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE

MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS

COST NO MORE

OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES

Get Your Money's Worth

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

Coward Extension Heel
The Original and Most Helpful Heel

For 34 years, in his Custom Department, James S. Coward has made a specialty of the Coward Extension Heel, for the relief of fallen arches, weak ankles and flat-foot conditions.

For Your Arches' Sake—
Wear Coward Extension Heel.

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

A Gift That's Different

Not like the ordinary gift, which is soon forgotten, but a constant and worthy reminder of the giver the whole year round

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have prepared an attractive Christmas card which will bear the giver's name and compliments. If you prefer to use your own card you may do so; kindly send same to us with your order.

A Gift That Lasts Till Xmas Comes Again

In sending AMERICA to your friends
you are doing three things:

First: You are presenting a pleasant surprise, something different, something worth while and something that lasts the whole year round.

Second: You become a "co-worker" in the cause, because no one can read AMERICA for a year without absorbing its spirit.

Third: You are demonstrating your pride in, and loyalty to an enterprise which has by hard work and perseverance won success, you are helping us—and do we not deserve it?

SINGLE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOUR YEARLY SUBSCRIPTIONS $10.00

Fill in below, names of parties to whom you wish to send AMERICA for one year and send order to us

CUT OFF HERE

NAME	STREET	CITY	STATE

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen; Enclosed find ---------- in payment for the above order

Name ---------- Street ----------

City ---------- State ----------

Appropriate for CHRISTMAS GIVING

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES

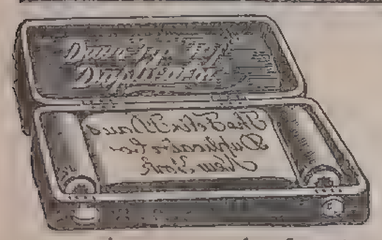
to any part of the world

For $3.50 Postpaid

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages.

The America Press

59 East 83d Street, New York



ARMY AUCTION BARGAINS

Saddles	$3.00 up	Army Revolvers	$1.65 up
Bridles	.90 "	" B-L Rifles	.98 "
Team Harness	21.85 "	" Swords	.35 "
Leggings, pair	.15 "	" 7 Shot Carbine	3.50 "
Tents	2.85 "	New Uniforms	1.50 "

Colts Cal. 45 Revolver $7.45. Ctgs. 1c each. 15 Acres Government Auction Bargains illustrated and described in 420 large page wholesale and retail cyclopedia catalogue, mailed 25 cents East and 30 cents West of the Mississippi River.

Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York

THERE ARE TWO REASONS

Why we send our Daus' Improved Tip Top Duplicator on ten days trial. FIRST---It proves OUR confidence in the machine. SECOND---By personal use you can positively tell, before buying, whether it meets your requirements. Each machine contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Linen Back duplicating Surface which can be used over and over again. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from typewritten original. Complete Duplicator, cap size, (prints 8 3-4x13 inches). Take advantage of our trial offer. Price . . $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John St., New York

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By the REV. MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that ir this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Rolling at Side

Wilson's Rolling Partitions

MADE TO ROLL OVERHEAD OR FROM SIDE

A marvelous convenience and most effective method for dividing large rooms in Churches and School Buildings into small rooms, and vice versa; made from various kinds of wood; sound proof and air tight; easily operated and lasting. Made also with Blackboard surface. Fitted to new and old buildings. Used in over 25,000 Churches and Public Buildings.

Write for Partition Catalogue A.

JAS. G. WILSON MFG. CO,
3 & 5 W. 29th St. New York

Rolling Above

ALSO VENETIAN BLINDS, WOOD BLOCK FLOORS, AND ROLLING STEEL SHUTTERS

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$1.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each
Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR

HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown UniversityHospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Now Ready

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law — 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine — Fordham.

School of Pharmacy — Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't.

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE

FOR YOUNG LADIES

Asheville, N. C.

Located in the "Land of the Sky," 8,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.

For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Christmas Gifts

A Chalice

What more appropriate article for a priest. We have them in stock from eighteen dollars to two hundred dollars.

A Pyx and Oil Stock

For the new curate, a necessary outfit, not expensive. We can furnish you a set of sterling silver, gold plated in case, from twelve to fifteen dollars.

Rosaries

Real stone—Amethyst, topaz, garnet, crystal, mounted in 14 kt. gold, twenty-five dollars, 14 kt. rolled gold plate, seven dollars.

Imitation stones — Amethyst, topaz, garnet, emerald, crystal, rose, mother of pearl and turquoise, mounted on 14 kt. rolled gold plate, one dollar to five dollars each. A cheaper grade of plate six dollars per dozen.

Catalogues on application.

A selection package of rosaries on request.

THE W. J. FEELEY CO.

347 Fifth Avenue, New York City
183-203 Eddy St., Providence, R. I.

KENEDY'S NEW BOOKS

THE HOLY EUCHARIST IN ART

BY P. D. CORBINIAN WIRZ, O.S.B.
7½ x 10. Cloth. 97 Illustrations $1.00 net.

An adequate explanatory text accompanies these good reproductions of paintings dealing with the Blessed Sacrament from the catacombs to very modern times. The volume makes a very good gift book.—AMERICA.

MUSTARD SEED

BY FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J.
16mo. Cloth. 60 cents net.

Three dozen pungent essays for spirit and life on practical subjects, all short, crisp and entertaining.

ODDSFISH!

BY MGR. ROBERT HUGH BENSON
12mo. Cloth. $1.35 net.

Admirers of the author's historical stories will welcome this new one which gives a vivid picture of the court of Charles II of England. The story is a fitting companion to "Come Rack! Come Rope!"

THE RED ASCENT

BY ESTHER W. NEILL
12mo. Cloth. Frontispiece in Color $1.00 net.

A splendid story of American life. Cheerful determination, clever character drawing and charming up-to-date dialogue make an interesting and thoroughly enjoyable novel.

P. J. KENEDY & SONS

44 Barclay Street New York

From all Catholic Booksellers

You are Particular

You demand those added little refinements that turn necessities into luxuries—that mean the difference between "Existing" and "Living."

You desire real cleanliness in your surroundings—not merely the appearance of it.

That is why

Excelsior Quilting Mattress Protectors

will appeal to you.

This excellent device protects your mattress and thus adds to its life. It makes your sleeping hours more restful, your bed more sanitary.

Excelsior pads are expertly made in a modern factory from antiseptically clean white wadding incased in heavy bleached muslin and quilted both sides by our patented machinery.

These pads are washable and will dry as clean, soft and white as new.

There is a size for every bed or crib.

Look for this trade mark. Avoid "Seconds" or "Just as Good" pads sold under other labels.

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street - - New York, N. Y.

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote.

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

The America Press

59 EAST 83D STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 9 } DECEMBER 12, 1914 { PRICE 10 CENTS
WHOLE No. 296 } { $3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Dec. 1 p. m.-Dec. 8, a. m.—The Situation in the West—Situation in Poland Cracow and East Prussia—Servia—Bulgaria—Italy. Austria: Events of the Week. France: The Return to Paris Uncertain—The New American Ambassador at Paris. Germany: Internal Affairs. Great Britain: Censorship and the Aliens. Ireland: Attitude Toward the War. Mexico: A Desolate Picture.....209-212

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Work for Women—"See Mariana!"—The Young Man and Catholic Publishing—Shall Government Buildings Be Masonized?—The Christ Child Society—Some French Bishops and the War..213-219

COMMUNICATIONS

French Army and Navy Chaplains—The Other Side—A Danger in Neutrality—Dearth of Catholic University Professors—Missionaries in Asia Minor—Germany, Luther and Kant—The Italian Question 219-221

EDITORIALS

A National Alumnæ Association—Religion and Children — Mexico and Ourselves — "Catholic" but "Non-Sectarian"—"His Name Could Not Be Learned"—Simplifying Life 222-225

LITERATURE

Aquinas Redivivus.

REVIEWS:—The Vatican: Its History—Its Treasures—France Herself Again—The Mason Bees—The Ivy Hedge—The Charm of Ireland—Philosophy, What Is It?—Women of the Classics.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:—"How It Happened"—The Latest Catholic Mind, "Mexican Liberalism"—"Practical Talks with the Christian Child"—"The Boys' Book of Battles"—"Early American Churches" — "The Hand of Mercy" — "Commentary on the Seven Penitential Psalms."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....225-228

EDUCATION

Why Send Girls to School?.....229, 230

SOCIOLOGY

Social Legislation and Juvenile Delinquency. 230, 231

NOTE AND COMMENT

Hasty and Improvident Marriages—Discarding Political Quacks—International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ—Priests on the Firing Line—The National Child Labor Commission—A Chance to Make $25,000.....231, 232

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—There is almost nothing to record of the situation in France and Belgium. Things have been very quiet along the whole line, although at the two extremities there has been intermittent activity, with some slight advance by the Allies in the vicinity of Altkirch and along the river Lys. The Germans, on the other hand, have been constantly active in the Argonne, where, however, the Allies claim to have resisted every attack; north of Arras also there was a gain of some two miles by the Germans, but the vigorous strike for the coast, in spite of predictions, has not been made. Germany, it would seem, is too absorbed in her struggle with the Russians to do more than hold her own. It has been officially stated that many German troops have been transferred from the west to the east, but there has been no perceptible weakening of the line against the Allies, except that the offensive is growing more and more a feature of the Allies. Whether or not the Allies will seize this opportunity to attempt to drive back the Germans remains to be seen. It must be a temptation. On the other hand, the positions in which the Germans are entrenched are so strong that great sacrifices must be reckoned with in every plan to dislodge them. There has been a good deal of speculation as to the meaning of the visit of the King of England to the Continent. It is so unprecedented that many minds insist on seeing in it more than a mere act of courtesy or encouragement. This joined to the fact that the British are said to have been transferred from their old positions and given complete charge of the portion of the lines from Ypres to the Nieuport, and that a large number of warships are gathering off the Belgian coast, are taken to mean that the plan of driving the Germans back to the Rhine, which was promised for the spring, is about to be anticipated. The flooding of Flanders has made it very difficult to prosecute active offensive operations, but Germany's difficulties in the east may, perhaps, be regarded as an ample compensation. Undoubtedly Germany's task will be immensely increased if England assumes the offensive with all her strength.

Bulletin, Dec. 1 p. m. -Dec. 8, a. m.

The Situation in the West

In spite of the bloody fighting that has been going on in Poland the situation has not materially changed. The Germans are still holding on to Lowicz, the point at which they are closest to Warsaw; and although they were nearly surrounded at Lodz and only succeeded in cutting their way out by great valor and with frightful loss and at the point of the bayonet, they did finally extricate themselves from what has been called the bloodiest engagement of the entire war. This part of their army, after falling back about eight miles, was reenforced and reformed, and has again seized Lodz. The gaps in the German line of battle, which were caused by the fact that the centre advanced far more rapidly than the wings and which consequently became a source of much danger, have now been closed up and the line extends almost continuously in a general southerly direction from

Situation in Poland

Plock in the north, on the river Vistula, down to Kutno and Lowicz, past Lodz, through Lutomierz and on to Czenstochowa until it reaches Cracow. Unofficial reports from Petrograd continue to claim a great Russian victory, but there is a marked reserve in the wording of the official reports on both sides. Fortune, however, seems to be favoring the Russians, for they have succeeded in blocking very effectually the German advance on Warsaw and Ivangorod. And yet it would be a mistake to think that the campaign has reached anything like a decisive stage. In fact, indications point toward another Austro-German drive toward the great stronghold on the Vistula. Some such move is necessary to relieve the pressure on Cracow and East Prussia, and is actually in preparation. The last invasion of Poland had this weakness, that although it forced the Russian centre to give way, it left the wings practically unaffected. As a consequence Russian guns have begun to shell Cracow, and there is even some talk, though irresponsible in character, of isolating it and pushing on through Silesia; besides Russian troops are once more advancing slowly but steadily into East Prussia. To counteract these movements in the north and the south the Austro-German armies are apparently resorting once more to the strategy which proved so successful in October. Large bodies of troops are being gathered from all quarters and massed below Lodz, and it is expected that before long a terrific blow will be struck at the Russian centre. If the Russians, in order to withstand the shock, find it necessary to draw reenforcements from their right and left, and so weaken both their wings, the twofold menace to German territory will again, for the time, be averted. Meanwhile, there is comparative quiet in Galicia and in East Prussia, as both sides are awaiting the outcome of the great battle in Poland. Another manifestation of Russian activity, though as yet on a small scale, has been the forcing of the Dunkla Pass in the Carpathians, and the penetration of Hungary. It is a demonstration rather than anything else, but might easily assume very serious proportions, in the event of a sweeping Russian victory.

Cracow and East Prussia

Belgrade has fallen. After four months of gallant resistance it has been occupied by the Austrians. The city is said to be in ruins as the result of the almost uninterrupted bombardment which has been carried on against it from across the Danube. The final capitulation, however, was not the result of the action of the heavy guns. How Belgrade was able to hold out so long against the heavy artillery which has been so effective in other parts of the war, and notably against Antwerp, is a matter of considerable surprise. What finally caused the Servians to abandon their capital was the fact that their previous losses had made them powerless to hold back the superior numbers with which the Austrians marched against them from the river Drina on their western border. Eventually it became clear that the forces at Belgrade had to choose one of two courses; either they must retire from the fortress at once and join the rest of the army, or be cut off from the main body of their troops and, as a consequence, even supposing that they could hold out, be practically ineffective as far as the main movements of the campaign were concerned. As such a sacrifice was out of the question, in view of the fact that casualties had already much thinned their ranks, in numbers they could never hope to cope with their enemy, they retired from Belgrade and left it in the hands of the Austrians. The capture of it, therefore, was not so much a great victory as a rather clear indication that Servia is growing weak. The spirit of the Servians is such that they never would have taken this move unless they had found their strength very much depleted. Another victory of the Austrians has still further demonstrated their weakness. Sinister predictions are now being made by the experts that Servia can not much longer maintain a vigorous resistance, and that unless she receives assistance from the Allies very soon, and on a large scale, her weeks of independent existence are numbered. Efforts are being made to induce Bulgaria to bury her resentment over the second Balkan war and go to Servia's assistance, both in support of Slavic interests in general and to safeguard her own independence. Up to the present, however, she has shown no signs of any inclination to do so. On the other hand, a good deal of pressure is being brought to bear on Bulgaria by Turkey. Turkey has just proclaimed the holy war against Servia, and is said to have concentrated a large army at Adrianople, with the purpose of cooperating with Austria. To do this it is necessary to get permission to march through Bulgarian territory, or better, to make use of the Bulgarian railroad. The bait which is being held out to Bulgaria is a slice of Servia and the utter humiliation of her foe. Considerable interest and importance attaches to her decision.

Servia

Bulgaria

Reports to the effect that Italy was about to enter the war have been circulated so frequently with no other result than to be subsequently proved false, that no one is likely to accept, without a good deal of reserve, the same rumors that are again becoming current. It has been stated, however, on what claims to be good information, though without official sanction, that Italy is now fully equipped for the war in both army and navy, and that her entrance into active participation is a thing of no distant date. The statement has been made that her fleet is completely mobilized, and that by January 1, 1915, she can put 760,000 fully armed men into the field. The reasons given for her rumored resolution have been in the air so long that they are fairly familiar to all readers. There is the certainty of the ill-will of Germany and Austria for her failure to join forces and fortunes with her old allies; the danger to her colonies on the Mediterranean and to her shipping interests in the Suez Canal, both of which are menaced by Turkey; old ambitions to control the Adriatic and to recover the provinces of Trent and Triest; a grudge to satisfy against Austria, her hereditary foe, and a conviction that she can have no hope of deriving advantage from the Allies unless she gives them active support. From the beginning of the war it has been rather widely thought that the Italian people were eager for war, but that the Government was reluctant. Belief is now gaining ground that the official reluctance was due to a realization of the unprepared condition of both army and navy, and that with the disappearance of that condition the official reluctance has also disappeared. That Austria's victories over Servia and the possibility of the Balkan States being reduced to the condition of Bosnia and Herzegovina are likely to give added force to these reasons can scarcely be doubted. Italy is certainly not prepared to welcome any new partition of the Balkans in Austria's favor, and is pledged in a sense to prevent it. The new Premier, an overwhelming vote of confidence in whose Cabinet has just been passed, has outlined as his policy a continuance of "a watchful and armed neutrality," based not on Italy's lack of preparation for war, but on the clear demands of her best interests.

Italy

Events of the Week

Austria.—On December 2 the aged Emperor celebrated the sixty-sixth anniversary of his accession to the throne of Austria-Hungary. On account of war conditions the enthusiasm was not as marked as in former years, but there was no lack of quiet, affectionate loyalty shown the old man who has guided the destiny of his people all these long years. There is at present no special feeling of alarm in the country. For a while Vienna seemed disconcerted by the sudden arrival of refugees, but now everything is normal; food is plentiful and the soldiers are fighting with superb courage and endurance. The Tyrolese are displaying not only bravery, but remarkable religious fervor. They are making the utmost sacrifices to attend the Masses said as often as possible for the men under arms, thus displaying their usual zeal. During the week an important conference was held at Breslau in Silesia. The German Emperor met the Archduke Charles, commander-in-chief of the Austrian army, and the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the Austrian throne. It is supposed that the Russian campaign was under discussion, but nothing definite is known.

The Return to Paris Uncertain

France.—Much uncertainty exists regarding the return of the Government to Paris. The meeting of Parliament to discuss financial measures has been fixed for December 22. It is thought that by December 13 all the ministers will have returned to Paris, but whether or not their stay will be permanent is unknown. As the Government has made no decisive announcement, the Parisian press must content itself with the discussion of rumors. "No danger of a German attack is now feared," says the Journal des Débats, "but the decision of the question will probably be left to the military authorities. Perhaps it is advisable to allow the Governor of Paris to exercise his functions unhampered for some time longer. At any rate, keep the politicians at the Garonne, where they are harmless, instead of bringing them back to trouble the Seine. Let us say right out that nobody is anxious to see politics and politicians resume the centre of the stage."

The New American Ambassador at Paris

In receiving Mr. W. G. Sharp, the new American ambassador, President Poincaré again voiced the French view of the cause of the war, and France's determination to exact reparation for violated rights. "If it had depended upon France," the President said, "peace would never have been troubled. To a brutal attack, we have replied with patriotism and bravery. We are determined to fulfil to the end the duty imposed upon us. In order that peace may be long and happy, that it may not be illusory and treacherous, peace must be guaranteed by complete reparation for violated rights, and must be protected against future attacks." The President's statement of the Government's policy is borne out by the recent decree, which enacts that about 300,000 youths who normally would begin army service in October, 1916, are called to present themselves for examination on December 20. Their military training will begin in March, and should the necessity arise, these young men could be sent to the fighting line in July.

Internal Affairs

Germany.—On December 2, the Reichstag, with only one dissenting voice, voted a new war credit of 5,000,000,000 marks ($1,250,000,000). Both the President of the Chamber and the Imperial Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg made speeches outlining the causes and progress of the war. Both addresses were directed to inspiring confidence in the ultimate success of the German cause. The Chancellor, speaking in the Emperor's name, laid stress on the unity which obtains throughout the empire, and then proceeded to express admiration for Austria-Hungary. Turkey's part in the war was then explained, and the speaker ended by an exposition of Germany's version of the causes that precipitated the conflict. Letters received from Germany protest that finances are in excellent condition, that food is abundant, and that all classes of people are making heroic sacrifices cheerfully in this time of trial. It is undoubted that a great revival in religious fervor has taken place. The people have turned to God in the hour of need, and churches that were once well-nigh empty are now thronged with prayerful congregations.

Censorship and the Aliens

Great Britain.—Two subjects are widely and violently discussed, the press censorship and the aliens. Unmindful of its experience with the censor some months ago, the Times argues that a censorship which suppresses good news as well as bad does not encourage recruiting, and suggests that the best interests of the country would be served by publishing sober and exact accounts of what is happening at the front. This could be done, says the Times, without disclosing our plans to the enemy, or suggesting clews for aliens in England to work upon. In response to popular demand, the Government announces that more stringent measures than have yet been used in dealing with the matter of the aliens will shortly be put in force.

Ireland.—In response to the demand of the Times and other English journals, Mr. Asquith declared he would take suitable action against such Irish papers as opposed recruiting, although Mr. Redmond had informed him they were maintained by cranks and faddists whose influence was negligible. Irish Freedom, an advocate of complete independence, has since been suppressed. Sinn Fein is nearly as extreme, but among the supporters of Home Rule that advise against recruiting are several provincial papers, the organ of the Gaelic League and the Irish Volunteer. The able and well-balanced Dublin Leader insists that as Catholic Ireland has given more than its quota to the army and badly needs for its tillage and industries the remnants that misgovernment has left it, recruiting should be mainly confined to the landlords, Orange societies and the office-holding classes, who have benefited most by English rule and fought for it least. An Irish missionary who has visited all the provinces thus writes to AMERICA concerning the country's attitude:

Attitude toward the War

Opinion about the war is varied. There is little enthusiasm for England though a pretty general acceptance of the maxim, "better the devil you know," etc. There is a strong undercurrent of discontent at the hanging up of Home Rule with an unknown amendment bill attached, at the treatment of Irish Catholic soldiers in regard to chaplains, and the decided preference shown the Protestant Ulsterites. Hence recruiting has been very slack, and besides we have not the men, for "the Celts are gone with a vengeance." As a rule there is apathy rather than sympathy, except toward Belgium; and there would be no heartbreaking here if the war ended for the five Great Powers like our battle of the Kilkenny cats, or left all so weakened that they could do no more damage in the world.

Messrs. Gwynn and W. Redmond of the Irish Party have enlisted as officers for the war, and the Party generally and the daily press take the English viewpoint in regard to it. But recruiting is still meagre, and the suppression of dissenting organs will hardly stimulate it.

Mexico.—Confirmation of the reports concerning conditions in Mexico is had in this letter from the wife of the American Consul in Matamoros, State of Tamaulipas. The writer expected the appeal to be published in our papers; for the most part they suppressed it:

A Desolate Picture

The day the Christmas ship sailed with its cargo of good cheer for the war-stricken countries of Europe a little company of Mexicans came together in a town near the international boundary and issued an appeal addressed: "To the American People and Their Exalted Authorities."

It was a plea for work for men, and bread for their women and children, and is the first cry for help that has ever come from this stoical and long-suffering people: "Trabajo! Justicia! Pan!" (Work! Justice! Bread!) At last I have decided to pass it on to the editors of great dailies in the United States who are able to send it to the uttermost parts of the land, and see what answer the American people have to make.

The conditions in Europe which shock the civilized world have existed here against our borders for four years, unconsidered. Mexico is peopled with widows and orphans and famine is in the land. At first it reached us only as a rumor from remote places, but now it is present in our midst, on both sides of the Rio Grande. One sees it daily, in emaciated forms, shrunken cheeks, tightly drawn skin and burning eyes, sees it in the faces of women, old men and little children.

Many have died on American soil during the past year, ostensibly from obscure diseases, but actually from starvation, and there are hundreds of children who have never had sufficient food in their pitiful little lives. That is the heart-breaking tragedy of it all—the quiet, unsmiling children who sit silently by the doors of huts through the long hours—starving. The sound of laughter and playing children is stilled in Mexico.

Up to date practically the only aid has come from the State of Texas. Relief societies all along the border have done noble work, but the burden has grown too great for one State, or two or three. The United States has claimed the exclusive right to intervene in Mexican affairs. Shall we demand the right and repudiate the obligation?

There is need for food and clothes and medicines. The need is pressing. There is no time to be lost. Helpless ones are suffering and dying. Arrangements have been made whereby supplies can be distributed from the American consulate at this place to any locality in Mexico, and for the judicious expenditure of any funds that may be donated.

The destitution is not confined to the lower classes. Hundreds of delicate, carefully nurtured women are undergoing untold hardship, and undergoing it with the silent courage which always characterizes women of that class. Less than a month ago I met on the streets of El Paso a Mexican woman, one who is qualified by intelligence, character and culture to grace any circle, and she was soliciting family washing with which to support herself and three children.

I have seen little, new-born babes with no clothing except worn rags which the mothers had picked up. I have seen a woman in travail lying on the bare stones in a patio, without doctor, without nurse, alone except for a small child tugging at her clothes and whining for food.

I have seen an aged mother bending over her boy, who had been brought back from battle mortally wounded, and there was not left in the house even a pillow for his head.

Christmas is coming! Christmas in Mexico! God help them and move to compassion the hearts of happier ones!

One moving picture show less in the course of a week would not be a serious privation, but the nickels and dimes would buy food for many starving children. There are many sad women in the United States who have stored away somewhere little garments, growing yellow with age. Let them remember the mothers and babes of Mexico.

To the people of the United States and their exalted authorities: What are you going to do about it? Christmas is coming! You who dwell in peace and safety—you whose loved ones are warm and fed, what is your answer to Mexico?

(MRS.) E. C. HENDRIX,
American Consulate.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Work for Women

ONE may ring the bell of alarm without being justly charged with sensationalism, for the enemy is now within our gates, hammering away at the foundations and proclaiming from the housetop his intention to overthrow Christian civilization. He has affronted right-reason, discredited religion and declared morality a mode of evolutionary thought. At its dawn the moral law was infantile, in past epochs it changed from the servile to the dogmatic, but during the present "capitalistic era" there is no dominant moral doctrine, as our civilization is just on the cusp between autocratic sanction and the freedom of democracy. A multitude of women are following the enemy. He has engaged the splendid talent and untiring energy of large groups of altruistic women, to set before the public eye the necessity of social reforms; the best of which concerns itself with the physical needs of the individual and the improvement of the material environment of the masses, while the worst of this force, clamoring in the alleged interest of the people, makes open war upon the standards of the Decalogue.

It is supposed to be to their discredit that Catholic women form the only large body which strictly adheres to the Christian dogma that God established His Church to last even to the end of days, so that mankind may know the moral law of which no jot or tittle is changeable. Because of this psychology, and the fact that religion and morality are the guardians of the nation, may it not be regarded as providential that for Catholic women is set the task of showing that any agency whose purpose it is to maintain the integrity of our country and to advance the well-being of our people, must have as its foundation principle a positive belief in God, and the conviction that the moral law must be inculcated and enforced? Proceeding upon this ground, it is clear that Catholic women should have their own organization, that they should be a body apart, that the test of membership should fall upon a practical Catholicity. Otherwise confusion, not order, will be the result, for when God has not first place, right-reason is dethroned. Neither may Catholic women advantageously join with groups of other women, however admirable their work may seem to be, or however well-intentioned the members may be. For as oil and water will not mix, neither will mere utilitarian ends adequately serve as a principle for engaging a Catholic woman's energy. At best it is wasted effort, like as a new patch upon an old garment; the patch is conspicuously out of place. But the practical result of mixing with groups of non-Catholic women generally, is more disastrous than a mere negation of effort. At first the edge of Catholic conviction is dulled by the clatter and clash of differing heretical opinions; and that subtile atmosphere which marks off the genuine Catholic as a woman apart loses something of its balm. Straightway the ardor of religious faith is chilled by worldly ambitions. It is safe to say that the published words and the platform utterances of those Catholic women who are prominently identified with movements for social, civil, political and industrial uplift, are in nowise to be distinguished from the pronouncements of their radical associates, who have long since laid to one side the "outgrown" doctrines of "medievalism," to say nothing of their superior contempt for St. Paul.

So it happens that a "should-be" Catholic woman can say apologetically that the words of Pope Pius X, relative to the entrance of women into politics, may be regarded as void: "The Holy Father is a very old man." And yet for motives which will not here be impugned these women insist upon being known as representative Catholics; though not infrequently the most calamitous of all possible losses follows in the wake of modernistic association, that of the Faith.

Of one thing we may be certain, that never yet has the influence of Catholic members ever colored the thought of those agencies whose express purpose it is to create a public opinion which shall support their efforts for bettering the life of the populace as a whole. If, then, Catholic women are unable to dominate the opinions and methods of any one of the multitude of women's associations, which, in fact, ignore and repudiate those religious convictions that are the breath of life to the faithful, how shall any of us assume to be of service to our day and generation if we are found among the camp followers of the enemy? Catholic women know very well that behind the scientific investigation and the practical application of a given remedy to whatsoever social injustice or affliction, there must be the active motive of Christian charity, if any true step in advance is made over our present mode of dealing with social problems. The mere passing of the cup of cold water is not enough; it must be given together with the love for God's little ones. Just as there are no new numbers to reckon with, so there are no new principles to deal with and no new objects to seek. There is, of course, a change in the things counted, a change in the environment to which the principles apply, while the ultimate objects are ever the same, for the intellect has Truth to seek; the will aspires after the Good; while the human heart reaches up and beyond the love of friends to the love of the Lord God. Since, then, Catholic women alone may be equipped with the whole armor of God, what shall be done?

Of course, there is the maintenance and the progress of the many works already established. But added to these duties, is not the field white to the harvest for fresh efforts in making our Faith known; that it may be loved by those of good-will, and that the enemy may be beaten back? Numberless souls are sin-sick and weary of the false gods that clamor for adoration.

Surely, the road is open. It is hard though, for the world, the flesh, and the devil, are posted at every advantageous point to oppose Christian progress. From the press and the platform, relatively good and infamously bad, streams a false creed. Words written and spoken create an atmosphere destructive alike of religion, home and country. Is it not for women of the Church militant to meet this pernicious influence and conquer it with the self-same weapon now so vigorously wielded in the cause of sin? Shall the brilliant women of this, that and another cult—altruistic, paganistic, animalistic—have the whole national field to themselves upon which to exploit their doctrines of "social uplift," doctrines which teach the classes and the masses, that as the Protestant revolution threw off ecclesiastical authority, and so freed the spiritual man, it is now their mission to establish a social, a political and an economic democracy which shall strike out the claim that marriage is an indissoluble bond, and set up the new freedom in which the individual is a law unto himself? Certainly it is unnecessary here to point out the depths of infamy to which well-accredited leaders of large groups of women freely descend in their efforts to evolve a lesser but a better progeny for a future and a higher social order. Just as light overcomes darkness, so shall the publicity of that which is Catholic meet the opposing force and vanquish it.

In every city, town and village there are opportunities to bespeak the truths of the Catholic Church. Her organization, her history, her doctrines, her saints, her martyrs, her charitable and educational institutions, furnish themes with which to set forth her glory and to confound her enemies. The pen was ever mightier than the sword, and the human voice as a medium for God's truth is the most potent of all the forces with which the race is blessed. And this is alleged to be "woman's age." At all events, women are saying more in public than ever before. So, by organization, and without organization, Catholic women may, if they will, come to the rescue of our time.

MARTHA MOORE AVERY,
Director, The Boston School of Political Economy.

"See Mariana!"

"DO Jesuits justify regicide? Please explain—Constant Reader." But, my dear Constant Reader, what is the use? Though we should go on explaining things till doomsday you and the other constant but light-hearted readers would forget each explanation as soon as read, and the flattened-out calumny would begin to squeak again. These calumnies are like the army in a country theatre. It consists of but a dozen men who, by going through a regular Virginia reel—down the stage, off through the wings, and on again through the triumphal arch at the back—give the impression of a host innumerable. So is it with the charges against the Jesuits. They are not many. But when one has been knocked flat, the stage-manager pulls him off, patches him up, gives him a reviver, and puts him in his place to come on again as fresh and hearty as if nothing had happened: so to persuade the spectators that there is hardly a limit to the baneful teaching of the Order. Meanwhile, a companion, who has gone through the same process scores of times, is down by the footlights piping out his recurrent challenge, a miniature Bombastes Furioso; and Constant Reader is seizing a pen to write anxiously: "Dear Editor: Do Jesuits teach that the end justifies the means, or that lying is lawful? Please explain."

But to come back to the calumny holding the stage for the moment—

> Take him up tenderly,
> Lift him with care,
> Fashioned so slenderly
> Young and so fair and you will find that his youth and beauty are but stage paint. He is very ancient. His head is a mass of old callosities, newer bumps and plasters newer still, that tell of many a hard knock received in the rôle he has to play. He knows very well what is coming. Nevertheless he puts on a bold face—it is his business—and squeaks defiantly: "The Jesuits justify regicide. See Mariana 'De Rege et Regis Institutione'!" It is the old familiar cry. Our little friend—you wouldn't believe it—is more than three hundred years of age. Mariana has been dead nearly as long. In the course of those centuries many a great Jesuit writer appeared, but the calumny has never changed, nor been able to change from "See Mariana, 'De Rege et Regis Institutione'!"

"The Spanish fleet you can not see because it's not in sight," said the matter-of-fact Governor of Tilbury Fort to his daughter, who had been indulging in the figure of vision; and for the same reason very few can "See Mariana." From the nonchalant tone in which he is referred to, one would imagine that his works are among those without which no library is complete; that "De Rege et Regis Institutione" stands on the shelves of every Jesuit house beside Suarez, De Lugo, Petavius, Vasquez, and the other great writers of the Society. The fact is that now, as in times past, the number of Jesuits who have seen the book, is small enough; of those who have read it, the number is still smaller. Mariana may be as "familiar in our ears as household words"—the managers of the Greatest Calumny Show on Earth take care of that—but he is not familiar in our hands or in our eyes at all. A Jesuit may go through, not only his studies, but also a long life in the Order without hearing of him or of his doctrines, otherwise than at rare intervals, as among the curiosities of history or literature, along with the Casket Letters and the Man in the Iron Mask. One reason is that he and his book do not interest us. The prophecies about the future popes would raise a lively discussion, when Mariana would not provoke a word. Another is, that, as one may see from the "Catholic Encyclopedia," Mariana's supposed doctrine is censured in the Society; and Jesuits are not in the habit of interesting themselves in doctrines so treated by authority.

But had such a formal censure not been passed, it would be illogical, not to say malicious, to impute to a whole Order the opinion of a single writer. For this it would be necessary that the writer and his opinion should be, at least implicitly, adopted by the Order; that his opinion should be taught generally in its schools and embodied in its text-books; that the tradition of the Order should, so to speak, hand his works to professors and students, saying: Nocturna versate manu, versate diurna. Thus to prove that the Jesuits in general hold a certain doctrine one might quote very justly Molina, because his exposition of that doctrine is generally accepted in the Society. Similarly one might quote Bañez to prove that another doctrine may be attributed in general to the Dominicans. But to attribute to the Dominicans certain ideas concerning the Jesuits and their origin, and to prove it by quoting Melchior Cano, would be a grave injury to that venerable Order. Yet Melchior Cano is with justice held in high esteem among his Dominican brethren, which is by no means the case with Mariana and the Jesuits. But on that particular point the Order has never countenanced his views any more than the Jesuits have embraced the supposed regicidal ideas of Mariana.

"See Mariana." As we have said, we hardly know where to look for him; and we are confident that they who bid us see him, could not direct us, since they themselves have not seen him. However, Father Lehmkuhl, one of the Society's chief moral theologians to-day, has both seen and read the famous "De Rege et Regis Institutione." From him we gather that Mariana's doctrine has been somewhat misrepresented and that neither it nor he is quite as black as painted. Still we do not wish to impose our impressions on our readers. Unlike Mariana's book, the "Catholic Encyclopedia" may be seen everywhere and anywhere. Constant Readers, therefore, may read what Father Lehmkuhl has to say in the article "Mariana, Juan," and come to their own conclusions.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The Young Man and Catholic Publishing*

THE publishing business in its several departments has always held out an alluring invitation to the young man who is fond of books and seeks a congenial occupation. The environment is educating, the associations are pleasant, and there is an opportunity to participate in the education of many people that makes a strong appeal to one of high ideals. Love of books and lofty purpose, however, are not sufficient to insure safety to the publisher or the bookseller; because to these qualifications there must be joined common sense and a correct interpretation of what his clientele demands, elements absolutely necessary for the successful building up of a publishing business.

There are very few college graduates who can not, on occasion, turn out a good essay, or versify, or write a speech. The work of a publisher is very different. That consists more particularly in the choice of manuscripts, in presenting them in a style that is both pleasing and practical, and in their exploitation. There are many ways in the broad field of publishing in which the college graduate may earn a livelihood, but the business of a Catholic publisher is a separate and distinct avocation.

The general publisher has a very wide class to cater to, for if his books do not find favor with one set of readers, they may please another. Without fear he can publish almost anything that suits his fancy, and still stand a good chance of getting a proper return for the money invested. His main guide is public opinion; and public opinion nowadays is divided into as many lines of thought as there are people who think. With the Catholic book publisher, however, things are different. Romance, history, poetry and the human passions are main considerations in the determination of the choice of any manuscript; but the presence or absence of other qualities, viz., truth, morality and spiritual teaching must also control the choice of a Catholic publisher, for his name should be a guarantee of Catholic teaching. With this distinction in mind it is not hard to realize how his field is narrowed when compared to that which is offered to the general publisher.

The Catholic publisher must have as wide a knowledge of human nature as any other, but in addition he must possess a vivid realization of the existence of the soul, and a clear perception of one's duties toward God, one's self, one's neighbor, and to the Church of God. A kind of instinct must govern the selection of such material as will cause no spiritual injury to any soul. This suggests a brotherhood with the teachers of the Church, for does he not devote his energies to the greater spread of Catholic literature? To the manufacture and sale of Catholic literature does he not devote the best that is in him?

Now let us consider the choosing of manuscripts. Experience, and experience only, develops that subtle sixth sense which recognizes instantly the good or bad in a manuscript. As a rule, whether it treat of fiction, biography, religion or some other topic, it must be judged from the standpoint of timeliness, interest and value. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the publisher himself shall be qualified to pass judgment on all manuscripts. He must rely on his advisers. Thus, while he may be interested, he does not make the choice alone. He is seeking an investment. He is in business to make a livelihood, and unless a book meets with success it will not realize enough to cover the cost of manufacture; and so his investment will show a loss instead of a profit. The book is published on its merit, and is accepted or rejected according to the honest judgment of those who read it and weigh its chances; and here let it be said to the credit of the Catholic publisher that he is usually satisfied with the slightest possibility of success, and will often put a manuscript between covers whose future is very dubious.

*The twenty-second of a series of vocational articles.

The choosing of a manuscript furnishes a splendid test of judgment, and it is usually at this first and most important point that the publisher makes his success or failure. What are the good points of the book? To whom will it particularly appeal? How many copies will be sold? This is the vital question. The satisfactory manuscript must be well written, and the subject must be one that is likely to interest enough people to insure a sale sufficient to return the cost of production, and a profit too, within a reasonable time.

When the manuscript is accepted it is the publisher who must choose the typography, the paper and suitable binding. The type must be readable and free from error, the paper satisfactory, and the cover in good taste, while the whole must be a credit both to the author and to the publisher. This is a most important point. The cost of manufacture and the prospective sale of the book determine the price at which it will be placed on the market.

But after all this is done there are other things to be looked to that are no less necessary, efficient salesmanship and intelligent advertising. The salesman must know his books, and believe in them, because it is through his agency that many people choose the books they buy. In this, as in most other callings, strict honesty and a convincing amount of enthusiasm inspired by personal knowledge of the book he is selling must be prominent characteristics of the successful salesman; for the confidence and esteem of those who are working with you or buying your goods, and the power to impress on them your own faith in the work you are doing, are as essential to the accomplishment of all big things as breathing is to life. The successful salesman is he who, having read a good book, knows how to exploit it to advantage.

One who casts his lot with book men will find his work very pleasant, but unfortunately not very lucrative. The salary given for the labor is small indeed, in view of the education it requires. This is true, however, of almost all branches of literature. In the beginning of a publisher's career his education develops rapidly, while his income increases slowly. For those who advance in the editorial, administrative and sales departments education is a most important asset, and herein lies the great advantage of the man with university training. His opportunities, when he becomes the director of a Catholic publishing house, are limited only by his own ambition, which, however, must be tempered by sound judgment, and his capital.

Taking these points into consideration, it is not hard to recognize what are the opportunities of the man who has the greater advantage of a university degree. He puts to use, often unconsciously, knowledge of others which he has acquired in his study of the arts and sciences. He has, moreover, a power for reasoning, and a confidence in himself which are usually wanting in the man who is lacking in this foundation.

ARTHUR KENEDY,
P. J. Kenedy & Sons.

Shall Government Buildings Be Masonized?

The corner-stone of the new United States courthouse and post-office for Augusta was laid with impressive ceremonies Friday afternoon, the exercises being conducted by the Grand Lodge of Georgia Masons.—The Chronicle, Augusta, Ga.

THIS statement is cited, not because what it announces is novel, but because it is not. The Freemasons have got to be, in effect, the official corner-stone layers, the ceremonial functionaries, the religious dedicators of our public buildings. The account of the Augusta function outlines their manner of procedure. The Grand Lodge assembled in the Masonic Temple "in ample form." There were the Grand Master of Georgia, and his Grand Deputies; the Grand Chaplain and his two Grand Deacons; the Bearer of the Book of Constitution, and the Bearer of the Great Lights; the Grand Stewards, the Grand Marshal, the Grand Architect, and Abram Levy, the Grand Tyler. In sashes and swords and gorgeous uniforms and aprons and sceptres and mitres and grand pontificals they marched in grand array to the ceremonial platform, where the Grand Marshal introduced them to the Mayor, who was also a Grand Master; and then the Grand Masonic Potentates, under the direction of the State Grand Master, proceeded solemnly with formal prayer and blessing, and all the other minutiæ of their ritual, to dedicate a building of the United States Government to the Grand Architect of the Universe. As a lasting memorial of their dominant part in the function they deposited beneath the stone, on which was inscribed "William McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury," a box containing the roll of officers and members of Georgia Lodges and the by-laws of the Georgia Commandery. Afterwards came the names of the Mayor and City Councillors. Masonry's primal rights were established. The Masonic stamp was first and permanently affixed. Then, and only then, might the United States officials proceed to use for the public service the building on which it had expended $350,000 of the public monies. The Grand Master and grand everything else returned "in ample form" to the Masonic Temple where, after all was over, a United States Senator was permitted to make an address.

What title has Masonry, intrinsically or extrinsically, to monopolize or assume such a function? If local bodies want Masons, or Christian Scientists, or Hardshell Baptists, or Seventh Day Adventists, to bless or otherwise inaugurate their own city buildings, that is their affair; though the bringing of religious or quasi-religious aggregations into such matters is discordant with the spirit of our Government. But we have all paid for the Augusta post-office and courthouse. The monies that erected it came from the United States Treasury. The tax-paying and revenue-producing Catholics and non-Masons contributed nearly 99 per cent. of the cost, the Masons only about 1 per cent.; and this proportion holds regarding the numerous other public buildings at which they manage to play the part of exclusive dedicatory functionaries.

That is, their contributory services entitle them to but a one hundredth share in the function, and their insistence or management or influence secures it all. Nor does technical propriety strengthen their title. The Freemasons are not masons, nor builders. Their "work" is not in stone or brick, and mortar never soiled their aprons. Their corner-stone layers had probably never handled a trowel. Tailors or shoemakers would have been just as suitable, and stone-cutters, bricklayers, carpenters, hod-carriers, tinsmiths, much more so. There is not a shadow of intrinsic reason why Freemasons should be our corner-stone layers and dedicators-in-ordinary, or why they should be permitted to plaster our public monuments with their signs and symbols.

On the contrary, there are many solid and compelling reasons why they should not. The United States Constitution forbids discrimination, whether in practice or by legal enactment, in favor of any religious denomination. A Supreme Court decision has affirmed that we are a Christian nation, but not that we are Protestant, Catholic or Masonic. When the President issues an invitation to return thanks to God and petition Him for further blessings, he addresses it not to Presbyterians, Methodists or Baptists, but to all our citizens alike. Thus no particular religion or sect is favored, and when on certain official occasions a minister of religion is invited to invoke God's blessing he is selected for reasons of personal distinction or appropriateness, not because of his denomination. For example, at the unveiling of the Columbus Monument in Washington, a Catholic priest and a Protestant minister offered the opening and closing prayers, and United States officials performed the unveiling. If it were to be done by an extraneous body, it would have been manifestly fitting to entrust it to the Knights of Columbus, who were present 20,000 strong. They were merely spectators. Supposing this Catholic society had conducted the function with Catholic ceremonies, what a storm of protest would have swept through the press and deluged the White House?

And it would have been justified. The monument, being Government property, belongs to the whole people, and should not seem to belong, even for one day, to any particular creed. For the same reason it is manifestly contrary to the spirit of our Constitution and Government that the Augusta post-office, or any other government building or monument, should be inaugurated with Masonic rites. It is not their prayers and ceremonies we complain of, for objectively at least they are harmless. But these official Masonic prayers and rites, formally and solemnly conducted by Masonic officials, according to Masonic ritual, connote the official doctrine, authority and purposes, "the morals and dogma, the religion and philosophy of Masonry"; just as similar prayers and rites, in themselves unobjectionable, would, when formally conducted by Catholic priests or Protestant ministers, connote the religion they represent.

That Freemasonry is a religion has been already shown in AMERICA (October 17, 1914). General Grand Master Mackey defines it as such in his "Masonic Encyclopedia and Lexicon"; Sovereign Grand Commander Pike expounds it in his "Morals and Dogma" of the Scottish Rite; the Masonic Ritualist furnishes in minute detail the forms, creeds and services of a most ritualistic, dogmatic and hierarchical religion; and the Supreme Court of the State of New York felt constrained to sanction, and did give legal sanction to the contention of the New York Grand Lodge, that,

> The precepts contained in the Landmarks and the Charges of a Freemason formulate a creed so thoroughly religious in character that it may well be compared with the formally expressed doctrine of many a denominational church. The Masonic fraternity may therefore be quite properly regarded as a religious society.

The fact that the religious and political activities of Masonry have been mainly directed against the Catholic Church, toward which it officially proclaims an "inherent antagonism," should alone preclude the propriety of charging that body with the inauguration of buildings, some twenty per cent. of whose cost and maintenance is borne by Catholics. But the discontinuance of Masonic usurpation on such occasions is based on higher ground: the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and the general practice of our Government of excluding impartially the official rites or formal participation of any church, sect, or religious society, as such, from specifically public functions. The wisdom of this course has been amply demonstrated. It has smoothed the path of legislation and administration and avoided clashes that might seriously endanger the public peace. To take measures that it shall not be violated by indirection, and that no door shall be opened to its violation, would be to render a patriotic service to the nation. The intrusion of Masonic rites in national functions and the inauguration of the nation's buildings must be stopped. A protest was lodged with Secretary McAdoo against the Masonic dedication of the Government's building in Augusta, apparently without effect. Protests against Masonic usurpations on all such occasions should be lodged with Senators and Congressmen, the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate and the President of the United States. The practice is so obviously at variance with propriety and wisdom and traditional American usage that to air it publicly is to end it. The wonder is that it should ever or anywhere be tolerated. Let our representatives see to it that it shall be tolerated no longer. M. KENNY, S.J.

The Christ Child Society

ONE who would outline the genesis and the scope of the Christ Child Society suffers the embarrassment of the critic who, on being asked for an opinion on the works of Shakespeare, owned that he could never think of Shakespeare's works for thinking of Shakespeare. The Christ Child Society is above all else the embodiment of the inspiration of its author and president, Miss Mary V. Merrick of Washington, D. C.

Something like a miracle, a miracle of grace empowering an enfeebled body, is the operation through which the Christ Child Society first sprang into existence, and for many years has not ceased to "grow in wisdom and in strength."

An accident crippled Miss Merrick in girlhood. As a consequence, at the time when a woman's life is filled with beautiful promise, she could look forward only to long years upon a bed of pain. Her father, the late Richard V. Merrick, was a lawyer of renown. From him she inherited unusual force of character, and a mind of such rare ability that this celebrated lawyer, who acted in the famous Star Route case and other affairs of similar importance, did not hesitate to affirm that he found it a great help in his profession to talk over his cases with his daughter Mary, then a girl in her teens; and this he would do at her bedside. That he should have found it profitable to do so, was due to the fact that he personally had devised a system of education for the invalid girl which permitted her to be solidly instructed in the arts and sciences, as few women are at present, in this day of women's colleges.

The remarkable intellectual development attained by Miss Merrick would have done little for her happiness. Indeed it might have tended quite naturally to embitter her soul, for her invalidism seemed to set very narrow limits to her opportunities. Her heart, however, was filled with an absorbing personal devotion to the Christ Child. As Christmas was approaching soon after her physical doom had been pronounced, and the invalid girl one day lay wondering what she might do with her life, suddenly out of the darkness came the thought of the Christ Child and of Christmas and of the many hungry, cold and joyless children for whom there would be no Christmas cheer. With that holy thought came also burning love for those whom Jesus loved, and thus in her heart the Christ Child Society was formed. Instantly her mind, her force of character, the resources of family, friends, money and social position, by the compelling power of natural genius and love for the Christ Child were directed to the ends which are now served by an extensive organization. The Society began its life in Washington, but has rapidly developed until now it has fourteen branches in various cities throughout the United States; a membership in Washington of 1,175, and a total membership of 3,450.

The particular object of the Christ Child Society is to serve the needs of the children of the poor. Love of the Christ Child is its animating principle, and thus it has known how to combine relief work done after the manner of St. Vincent de Paul with social work along some of the lines of so-called scientific charity. Centres similar in purpose to social settlements are established in the different districts of the city; and from these centres, by means of instruction, libraries and clubs, without the aid of resident workers, children are brought under the influence of efforts tending to better their social condition. But all this is done constantly in view of the "one thing needful," love, love of God and love of the neighbor which, while striving for the temporal uplift of those in want, keeps in sight their spiritual nature and their eternal destiny. The Society does not hesitate to relieve distress wherever found, without regard to creed or to the theories of social science. It does not, for instance, fear to feed the hungry and clothe the naked on sight, lest thus by chance some momentary encouragement of the "undeserving" poor delay the advent of the millennium the fraction of a second.

There are no paid workers in the Christ Child Society, all are volunteers, and they include all classes, all ages. Very small children collect pennies to buy shoes for the poor. Young girls dress dolls to be given away at Christmas. A blind woman knits infants' bonnets. A professional nurse donates her free hours, taking to the dispensary ailing children whose mothers are too busy or perhaps too ill to take them. For a period of three years a crippled child was treated by a professional masseuse who gave her services. At the end of that time the child so far recovered the use of its limbs as to be able to go to school, and having also been instructed by a member of the Christ Child Society, it was able to enter the class of children of its own age. It is in the homes of the poor that all relief bestowed by the Christ Child Society is applied, and in particular, where the mother must work for the support of the children, an effort is made to procure her work which she can do at home.

Members of the Christ Child Society are privileged to choose the branch of service which they deem best suited to their individual ability or circumstances. Thus some subscribe money, others teach, others sew, others aid the settlements; but every one agrees to make at least one poor child happy at Christmas. The special character of the Christ Child Society may be said to be achieved in this personal devotion to destitute little ones at Christmas time, which is, in fact, the devotion of Mary V. Merrick "writ large," for still from her bed, throughout the years, Miss Merrick not only herself plans the work of the Christ Child Society but personally controls and animates its manifold operations by means of her forceful administration of the office of president.

Long before Christmas members of the visiting committee go about their work, and wherever they find a home in which no hope of the coming of Christmas cheer abides, they tell the children of the Christ Child and promise them that He will not pass them by. The children are encouraged to write letters to the Christ Child and tell Him what they most want. These letters, endorsed by the visiting member, are then distributed among the whole membership of the Society and thus every member has the joy of being able, in the name of the Christ Child, directly to respond to the expressed want of some poor child. In this way, as in the other more ambitious undertakings of the Society, the hearts of all the members are practically united with the heart of the founder and with the Heart of Him who, loving little children, is Himself called the Babe of Bethlehem. Petit Jésu ayez pitié de nous! F. McD. T.

Some French Bishops and the War

IN a recent issue AMERICA speaks of the gallant courage of the Archbishop of Lemberg, Count Andreas Szeptyki, who, when urged to fly before the approaching Russian army, replied: "The shepherd must remain with his flock," and steadily declined to move. He is now, we hear, a prisoner in Russia. The same devotion to duty was displayed by the French bishops, whose dioceses have been invaded by the Germans; though belonging to hostile nations, the Austrian and the French churchmen are united by a common devotion to their high vocation and by a similar sense of the responsibilities that are entailed upon them as pastors of souls.

The Bishop of St. Dié, Mgr. Foucault, was, for some days, a hostage in the hands of the invaders; the Bishop of Châlons, Mgr. Tissier, acted as the go-between of the citizens of Châlons and their German masters. A private letter, tells how, owing to his activity, firmness and tact, the town suffered comparatively little from the occupation. Mgr. Marbeau at Meaux, remained alone, with two hundred poor and infirm people in a town that had been cleared by military authority When the French military chiefs ordered the inhabitants of Meaux to leave the place, the bishop elected to remain with those who were physically or materially prevented from moving. The battle of the Marne was fought at his gates and wounded soldiers by hundreds were brought to him for care and shelter. How he succeeded in coping with a situation so difficult seems almost miraculous; but the influence of his example did wonders. Meaux was saved from occupation by the Germans, by the victory of the Marne, but the town being deserted by the French, the bishop was almost single-handed. He left nothing undone: the wounded soldiers were properly cared for, provisions and medicines were sent for from Paris, order was kept, although the municipal authorities had fled, and, during a few days, Mgr. Marbeau was at once the pastor of souls and the civil governor of the city.

At Soissons, another bishop, Mgr. Péchenard, earned the lasting gratitude of his flock, by his efforts to relieve their sufferings. During the German occupation of Soissons, early in September, he and the inhabitants were absolutely cut off from the rest of France, but, thanks to their bishop, the people never felt friendless. At four every afternoon, the cathedral bell summoned them to a special meeting, instituted by the bishop, to meet the needs of the moment. In these familiar gatherings, he counseled, encouraged and pacified the anxious citizens. He even entered into local matters and told them how they should act with regard to the invaders, in order to avoid useless bloodshed; he prayed with them, led their thoughts upward and ended by giving them the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament.

Now, Mgr. Péchenard is busily engaged in providing for those of his flock whom the war has deprived of their homes; Soissons is in French hands, but the enemy is intrenched close by and German shells still fall on the cathedral. The surrounding country is laid waste and the approach of winter makes the condition of the ruined peasants more piteous and deplorable than ever.

The French bishop whom the war has touched most closely so far is Mgr. Lobbeday, bishop of Arras, whose episcopal city is a mass of ruins. Arras is still being bombarded by the enemy, hand-to-hand fights take place daily at its gates and as the cemetery is swept by German shells, the bodies of the dead soldiers and citizens must be burnt as they can not be buried. In the midst of these horrors, the bishop keeps his courage and helpfulness. Letters describe how, during the day, he goes from house to house oblivious of the shells, ready to sympathize and comfort. He has a kind word for all; his hand is always open to assist the hungry; he will never leave Arras, he says, as long as a man, woman or child belonging to him remains in the stricken city.

> At night, writes a young soldier, I have seen the bishop go from one dead soldier to another; reciting over them the prayers of the Church. The battlefield is illuminated by the flaming villages in the distance. His figure is the only living thing on the plain, where he kneels in the darkness to bless our dead.

The north of France is still in the hands of the Germans, and may remain so for some time longer, but, when communications are reestablished, we shall certainly discover that the bishops of the districts from which we are now cut off by a wall of iron, have acted like their brethren of St. Dié, Châlons, Meaux and Arras. That "God draws good out of evil," is a truth, never more keenly realized by believers than in times of trial. The action of the French bishops in these days of warfare, bloodshed and ruin, will knit still closer the ties that bind them to their flock, just as the influence of the soldier priests, whom an iniquitous law obliged to shoulder a gun, is so extending the reign of God among our fighting men.

Paris. B. DE COURSON.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

French Army and Navy Chaplains

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The status of French army chaplains is regulated by a decree issued on May 5, 1913, and supplemented by several subsequent measures (see AMERICA, Oct., 1913), which assigned to the various ambulance corps, in time of war, a certain number of chaplains with the rank and pay of captain (500 frs. a month). When the war broke out priests, who during the time of peace had applied for chaplains' posts, received commissions and are now recognized and paid by the Government. Moreover, a new decree was issued by the Ministre de la Marine, appointing a number of navy chaplains with the rank and pay of lieutenant de vaisseau, a grade equivalent to that of captain in the army. French Catholics thought the number of army chaplains insufficient, and rightly so, although the number was nearly equal to that of military chaplains in other countries. Accordingly M. de Mun in their name approached M. Messimy, then Minister of War, and asked him if the official chaplains could not be helped in their work by volunteer chaplains, who would be supported solely by Catholics. M. Messimy granted the request, and it was decided that 250 volunteer chaplains should be added to those already appointed. A decree defined their legal status. They receive a commission by which they are appointed to a certain regiment, whereas two official chaplains are attached to each army corps ambulance service and one to each division ambulance. They are entitled to no pay, and although one can not say that they are not recognized, their official status is not quite so clear as that of the official chaplains. They depend more than the latter on the good will of the officers; this, however, has never been lacking. It has even been said that shortly before his death Count de Mun was about to obtain for them the rank and pay of a captain, but for the truth of this statement I can not vouch. Such are the facts as they really stand: The Government recognizes and pays the official chaplains. It recognizes but does not pay the volunteer chaplains.

As for the public prayers which Le Gaulois would like to see the French Government address to God, according to President Wilson's example. Of course, every good Catholic wishes that such a step might be taken, and that thus far, President Wilson's actions should be imitated by our President. And yet many a French Catholic, for the honor of religion, would prefer to have things remain as they are, rather than see their rulers asking prayers for peace from the Catholic Church in one country, and at the same time giving secret encouragement to the vilest enemies of the Church in another country.

Hastings, England. E. POTRON.

The Other Side

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In last week's AMERICA you published a letter which contained some extracts from the English "White Book." As an offset to this I should be pleased if you would print the following clipping from the Chicago Herald-Record for November 27, 1913:

> The German Government has published photographic reproductions of a document found in Brussels, which proves the existence of an Anglo-Belgian military convention. This is a report of the chief of the Belgian general staff, General Lucarme, made in 1906 to the Belgian minister of war concerning negotiations with Colonel Barnardiston, British military attaché. The number of British troops, their landing places, their equipment and the collaboration of the allied armies, all were agreed on.

A second document, probably a report made in 1912, contains the assertion of the British military attaché at Brussels to the chief of the Belgian general staff that England would land troops even without the consent of Belgium.

It would seem that there are two sides to this question.

Carthagena, O. W. F. M.

A Danger in Neutrality

To the Editor of AMERICA:

While there is good sense as well as charity in the appeal of the President and of the Pope, that we remain neutral regarding the war now ravaging Europe, is there not danger that this neutrality will become in statesmanship what the dictum, "all religions are good," is in matters of Faith?

Without rashly condemning, much less hating, any of the nations concerned, ought we not to look to the principles of morality underlying the conflict, and bravely and openly condemn them when wrong and applaud them when right and, on complete information, place the blame on those nations that have violated the rights of mankind, and fix the responsibility on whatever Government or person has been the efficient cause of the awful destruction of property that belongs to the individual; of art, that belongs to the world, and of life that belongs to God?

La Crosse, Wis. J. T. DURWARD.

Dearth of Catholic University Professors

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am pastor of the Catholic church in a town where the State University is located, which has an enrolment of nearly 1,500 students, with a little over one hundred male professors, assistants and tutors, all but three of whom are non-Catholic—a professor and two assistants. It appears from inquiries that about the same proportion holds good in nearly all the so-called non-sectarian State institutions. Why is it that, among such a corps of professors and assistants, there are not more Catholics in State institutions which are supported by the pro rata taxes of Catholics? Are they purposely excluded? I think not, judging from the one referred to. It seems to me the reason for their fewness lies in the fact that Catholic young men do not study to equip themselves for professorships in universities, and of those who do make such a study, few make application for professors' chairs. For fifteen years I have been in close touch with the above university, in friendly relation with its presidents and I have followed the after career of the Catholic young men who have been graduated from its halls—and they were legion—and I do not remember more than one or two, who prosecuted a course of studies to fit themselves for the professor's chair.

They all longed for commencement week to get their sheepskin; to go into the world and to take up the work of the professions which they studied, most of which were already overrun, and none wanted to pursue the higher studies which would fit them for the nobler profession of university educators. Many had the means to do it, but the monomania of earning a dollar as soon as possible obsessed them, and thus they left the higher and more ennobling and more influential professions to be filled by non-Catholics, many of them, unfortunately, agnostics who, "with scoffs and scorns and contumelious taunts," deride the supernatural and all revealed religion, and silently but surely inoculate the student body with their pernicious ideas. From this body, in turn, is inhaled, by the Catholic boys, the bacteria with which the campus-air is surcharged and which infects them to such an extent as to render some indifferent and some downright irreligious. Suppose that there were a dozen or more practical Catholic professors, for non-practical Catholic professors are a curse to any institution, in each State University. What a tremendous influence for good they could wield over the students, and how proudly the Catholic boys would bear aloft their standard in the face of any and all opposition! For the Catholic professors would give them a standing and the boys would look upon them as their leaders and would be ashamed of nothing, in regard to their faith.

Again, it seems that Catholic post-graduates who have specialized, do not apply for professors' chairs in many of our secular institutions. Some time ago I was speaking with the president of a State University and I said to him, "Mr. President, how is it that you have so few Catholic professors in your faculty? Is there opposition to them because they are Catholic or are they considered incompetent?" He answered, "Father, when Mr. Roosevelt was President of this Republic, some one wrote him a public letter asking why there were not more Catholic chaplains in the navy, seeing that there were so many sailors fighting the battles of Uncle Sam and consecrating his soil and waters with their Christian life-blood? To which he answered as I answer you, 'Why don't they apply?'"

QUAERE.

Missionaries in Asia Minor

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the close of a review in your paper of "The Holy Land of Asia Minor," a book by Rev. Francis E. Clark, D.D., LL.D., the reviewer makes a statement of what it calls "the wrong the American Board does to Catholic activity in the Turkish realm." The writer goes on to state that he has been in towns where the only medical practitioner was a missionary doctor sent out by the American Board, and he found that this doctor refused medical aid except at the cost of at least temporary perversion from Catholic faith.

The undersigned has spent years in Turkey in close touch with the missions of the American Board, and is now secretary of that Board in charge of its foreign work, including the work in the Turkish Empire. He has never known of a case where there was any religious test for receiving medical aid for any one needing the services of the doctor, whether that aid was given in the form of medical prescription or of attention in a mission hospital. The statement above referred to comes as a great surprise. Our Mission Board has taken action whereby the religious advisers of patients in a mission hospital are to have access to patients of that faith. My own experience in Asia Minor has been that of cordial cooperative relations between the missionaries and work of the American Board and the work of our Catholic brethren. I myself have had the privilege of aiding my Catholic co-workers in Asia Minor in securing help from the Government with reference to property conditions, etc., and have deemed it a pleasure and privilege so to do. I sincerely wish that the sense of rivalry or opposition, or of mutual distrust might be wholly removed, and that the missionaries and work of the American Board in Turkey might be in close cooperation and fellowship with the missionaries and work of our Catholic brethren.

Boston, Mass. JAMES L. BARTON, Foreign Secretary.

[The Jesuit missionaries of the Province of Lyons are our authority for the statements that Dr. Barton calls in question. It is a pleasure to realize that the broad-minded secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions entirely disapproves of the conditions that the reviewer of "The Holy Land of Asia Minor" deprecated during his stay in Asia Minor, during 1906-7; and to be assured that the Congregational body of Foreign Missions is at one with us Catholics in fostering freedom of worship among the manifold elements that make up the Turkish Empire. If the Presbyterian missionaries would be equally broad-minded in a policy of non-interference, greater harmony and more lasting good would result.—The Reviewer.]

Germany, Luther and Kant

To the Editor of AMERICA:

H. C. Watts' analysis of German supremacy as due to Luther and Kant (AMERICA, November 14, 1914), seems to labor under the old fallacy: Post hoc, ergo propter hoc. All Protestant nations have claimed that their greatness was due to the Reformation. Treitschke and Bernhardi are not the spokesmen of the German people, and would never have been heard of except for the war. At any rate, their influence on the twenty-odd millions of German Catholics was nil. Windthorst, Ketteler, and even Marx and Bebel, contributed as much to mould the individuality of modern Germany as did any of the former. The influence of Luther and especially of Kant was, and is, as great in England, France and the United States as in Germany. The latter's philosophy, under the name of idealism or positivism, simply dominates non-Catholic thought all over the world. Green and Balfour and Bradley in England; Taine, Reneuvier, Fouillée, Bergson in France; Emerson, James, Royce, Ladd in this country, and a host of lesser lights, are faithful followers and expounders of the Koenigsberg sage. Modern Protestant theology, from Campbell's vagaries in London, to our own Eliot's Harvard lucubrations, unquestioningly accepts his premises. Modernism in the Catholic Church was nothing if not an infiltration of Kantian principles. Germany has no monopoly on Luther and Kant, Nietzsche and Treitschke and Bernhardi, notwithstanding.

A nation's life and achievements, its greatness and decadence are due to the constant interplay of so many factors, that they can not be condensed into a short formula for popular consumption, and remain true to facts. Nor do I write thus because of national ties and sympathies. But being an American with a European training I have but too frequently had occasion to witness sweeping, and untrue, generalizations, both concerning this country and sundry old-world nations.

Moline, Ill. C.

The Italian Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Observer's" short story about that Italian parish priest is well told, but even if the story is true, is it among the Italians only that we find unsuccessful priests? Some of my friends, who were born in Naples and who lived there for many years, have qualified what "Observer" says about that city as untrue. It is strange that his three months' experience in Naples should be in such open contradiction to my own experience of about twenty years! May I be allowed, then, to think that my opponent is a very superficial observer?

JOSEPH M. SORRENTINO, S.J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Italian, like every other immigrant, comes here to make a living. To use Mr. Hadley's own words, "None in proportion send more money back to their native land than the Italian." Does Mr. Hadley know what becomes of that money? Had he the charity to inquire, he would find that it goes to support an old father or mother; to marry one or more sisters, to keep a family together, to help maintain the village church, and neither last nor least, for prayers and Masses for departed parents, relatives and friends. I know, because my father still continues to do nearly all of these things. Will Mr. Hadley say that any one of these things are not "essentials of Catholicity" or "practical teachings of the Church"? And in this country, in spite of our many black sheep, will he claim that our men are less sober, industrious, thrifty, law-abiding citizens than are those of any other race; or that our women are less noble, pure, home-loving, faithful and devoted than any others? And, are not these also "essentials of Catholicity" and "practical teachings of the Church"? Or is his experience that these virtues are acquired by those who lack the "essentials of Catholicity" and the "practical teachings of the Church"?

Let me remind Mr. Hadley that there is far more work for Catholic hands to do than the necessity of "uplifting" the Italian by means of the surgeon's scalpel. The pages of AMERICA will discover to him some of that work.

Alexandria, Va. JAMES C. F. GENGO.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article "Religious Conditions in Italy" came as a surprise to me. I have lived in America, and at present am residing in Italy. I agree with Herbert Hadley, at least substantially. There are special reasons for the falling away of immigrants, and in parts of Italy religion is very strong. "Enotriæ amator" therefore is exaggerating when he says, "I believe that we shall have left but a small number of practical Catholics in the whole of the third Italy." Of some places this is true, but it is not universally the case. As soon as Father Sorrentino's article appeared, I foresaw that exception would be taken to it, and for that reason I did not like it. It is a pleasure to me to find in AMERICA such fairness and impartiality.

Belluno, Italy. (REV.) ALFRED BOLESTRAZZI.
Rector of the Gregorian Seminary.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

From the letters published in AMERICA on the Italian question, three facts stand out prominently: (1) The battlefield has shifted from Italy to America. Father Sorrentino wrote concerning Italians in Italy. Mr. Hadley flatly denied all his statements because of conditions existing in the United States, a totally illogical procedure. (2) All the proof has been on one side. On behalf of the Italians statistics have been given, those who have attacked them have contented themselves with unproved general statements. (3) Those who have attacked the Italians have nearly all suppressed their names. Had they given proofs, the names would not have been so much missed; but in default of proofs we have a right to know who is the person speaking, that we may judge how much authority his unsupported statement carries with it. The objectors have been innominati; among the defenders are a bishop, a provincial of a religious order and many priests. These three facts are rather cogent. It seems to me, therefore, that, apart from the facts and arguments which have been brought forward in support of the several sides of the question, they should be given due consideration in determining the merits of the controversy.

Baltimore, Md. AN OBSERVER.

[This controversy will be closed in the next issue.—Editor, AMERICA.]

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

A National Alumnæ Association

A GREAT and good work was inaugurated last week in the formation of a national alumnæ association, whose membership will embrace graduates of all Catholic academies and colleges. All concerned in forwarding this movement deserve congratulations and encouragement. It is high time that our educated Catholic women began to exercise a more vigorous collective influence on public life. There are a thousand and one spheres wherein they can make themselves felt for good without detriment to their dignity and womanly virtues. But in order to do so effectively they must form a compact organization, protected and supported by a definite, democratic constitution which lays down in clear language the aim and scope of the society. There should be no exclusiveness; no beating of the air; every one should know the work to be done and the way to do it, and interest should be kept at white heat by frequent communication between the federated chapters.

The ladies interested have chosen their fields of labor. They aim to promote Catholic education, Catholic social work and Catholic literature. They could not have chosen better. No one can find fault with their selection. It now remains for them to formulate the details of their scheme, and to excogitate ways and means to carry it out. This is no easy task; but the zeal, patience and wisdom which have so far characterized the movement give hope of ultimate success. The task is difficult, but not impossible. Obstacles will arise, criticisms will be heard, discouragements will be numerous, but in this there is no reason for despair. Such is the history of all good work and all good workers, not excluding the saints of the Old and New Testament.

The National Alumnæ Association has been formed; its permanence and usefulness depend on its members. They are on trial. AMERICA wishes them the great success that their initial efforts deserve.

Religion and Children

SINCE the declaration of war the inhuman sociologists and statisticians who found in a nation's declining birthrate an evidence of superior civilization, have remained discreetly silent. Probably no man of fairly decent morality ever claimed that there was anything really superior in sterility and decadence. Only by a Futurist twist of words can a civilization which passes through a period of unnatural crime to end in self-destruction be termed "superior." Mr. Sidney Webb, an English sociologist, has of late been studying the connection between religious belief and fecundity. He finds that members of the Catholic Church can be relied upon to bring more children into the world than Protestants. This is true in Ireland, in Canada, in backwoods English villages, in the United States, and, in fact, says Mr. Webb, quoted by the Portland Oregonian, there is no place in the world where it is not true. It is a curious fact, comments the Oregonian, that Protestantism and race-suicide should seem to be intimately connected. It would, of course, be absolutely untrue to say that Protestantism, as such, teaches the liceity of race-suicide. It does seem true, however, that no non-Catholic Christian denomination has persistently denounced this fearful plague. Mr. Webb's findings are borne out by the New York Sun's examination of the report of the City Registrar.

"His figures," writes the editor, "show conclusively that parents of Catholic nationalities furnish the larger increment of population in this city. The difference is so large, the average being 49.50 among the Catholic to 14.05 among the Protestant nationalities, that it must prove of the utmost significance to the social and political economist, especially if the comparative infrequency of divorce among the former class be considered."

It is an appeal to a poor motive, but the prediction of the Portland Oregonian, based upon Mr. Webb's findings, may have some force in recalling non-Catholics from the pernicious habit which has taken deep root among them. "If Protestants do not produce children enough to hold their own, the Catholics must possess the land in time. This is as sure as mathematics."

Mexico and Ourselves

It really looks as if the best thing we have to hope for is rescue from our predicament by Villa, once regarded as impossible but apparently far more ready than our quondam ally to help us save our face.

THIS was the conclusion of a New York Sun editorial of November 9, and events have verified its forecast. Our predicament lay in the hostility of Carranza, who "would not be where he is to-day but for the favor of the United States." How this favor was shown is explained at some length in the Catholic Mind pamphlet, "Justice to Mexico," reprinted from the Columbiad. Let those whom that astounding narrative shocked into doubt read the Sun's editorial, and the following from ex-President Taft's substantially identical statement of November 28:

It is difficult to deny the fairness of the conclusion that in announcing to the world that we never would recognize Huerta either as Provisional President or as permanent President, in lifting the embargo on the importation of arms to enable the forces of Carranza and Villa to arm themselves, and in the seizure and occupation of his chief revenue-producing port of Vera Cruz, we deliberately drove Huerta out of Mexico, and with equal deliberation brought in Carranza and Villa, in the expectation that they would compose the troubles of unfortunate Mexico. Our policy, therefore, has been that, while defining our status as merely that of watchful waiting, we have neither watched nor waited, but have in fact most hastily intervened and thus find the present anarchy charged as the logical consequence of our policy.

While "throughout," says the Sun, "Huerta's attitude was deprecatory, if not conciliatory, and Carranza's was contumacious and provocative, if not actually menacing," we seized Vera Cruz for a technical offence committed in Tampico, and thus secured the triumph of Carranza, Villa, and their generals, who were perpetrating hideous abominations against life, property, liberty, religion and decency, and enabled them to continue these abominations with impunity under the very eyes of Messrs. Lind, Silliman and Carothers, our representatives. And at the very moment when the horrors which all decent people had suffered from Carranzistas, Villistas and Zapatistas were intensified and multiplied by the murderous rivalries of those warring heroes, we left the unhappy victims to their fate. We entered Mexico when its law-abiding citizens had some semblance of protection; we left it when they had none. No wonder the Sun finds the whole procedure a mystery, and Mr. Taft believes that "the powerful means we used during the last year to aid one of the contending parties and disable the other" has brought nearer than ever "the danger of the necessity for our intervention."

The fact remains that the men who now rule or run riot in Mexico claimed the support of our country while they were committing unspeakable atrocities on our coreligionists and proclaiming their purpose to extinguish the Catholic religion, and while long authenticated lists of such atrocities were in our Government's hands. The San Antonio Knights of Columbus is one of many bodies that have submitted such lists to Washington. They insist that as our Government supported the perpetrators it is its duty, (1) to repair the evils its support had made possible; (2) to exercise the pressure for the protection of our coreligionists that it had permitted to be used for their destruction, and (3) to secure that civil and religious liberty shall obtain in Mexico.

In these demands the San Antonio Knights will be endorsed not only by all Catholics, but by right-minded citizens everywhere. Ambiguous or private assurances given in this matter by members of the Government should be made unequivocal and public. It is a question of national justice on which every citizen has a right to determine his action; and if there be also a question of expediency, it is worth considering whether the respect retained or secured by the definite announcement that our Government will exact from Mexico's rulers the cessation of outrages and the maintenance of civil and religious liberty, will eventually be of more profit to the nation than the friendship of Villa or any other seeming advantage, for instance, a lease of Magdalena Bay.

"Catholic" but "Non-Sectarian"

IN a recent number of the Living Church appeared the following notice:

A religious order, founded and incorporated to be in touch with the working world, will aid all women, more particularly gentlewomen, to find their vocations, train them to be self-supporting and secure permanent employment for them. Before facing the now distressing conditions and aiding the vast number of worthy unemployed, more cultured, Catholic women are desired to consecrate their lives to the order. The order is non-sectarian, but under management of churchwomen. Address, CATHOLIC, care LIVING CHURCH, Milwaukee, Wis.

Without question this announcement is one of the highest importance. It doubtless heralds an experiment that may be justly termed "epoch-making." Though the earthy-minded probably scanned the passage with languid interest, to many a cultured reader of the Living Church the words must have come like a trumpet-call, summoning them to forsake, in a prudent measure, however, the world's full stream and embrace, after proper deliberation, of course, a life of "service." Aspirants noted, probably with tear-dimmed eyes, that it is no mere humdrum "congregation" they are invited to join, but a strikingly original, full-fledged "Order," one which gives every promise, moreover, of excelling, if not in antiquity, at least in industry, even the renowned monastic institute of St. Benedict.

The character of this new religious order is thoroughly unique, for the chief quality, we are told, a postulant should have is "culture." The possession of this evangelical virtue will effectively safeguard her, of course, from being mistaken at any time for a papistical nun, as the latter, with sorrow be it owned, is always conspicuously deficient in true culture, though she has the gift, strange to say, of imparting culture to others.

Given, then, this prime requisite, it would be convenient if the aspirant to the order could contrive to be moderately "Catholic." Not violently so, however, by any means, for it should be noted that the institute is "non-sectarian," and nothing is a greater menace to conventual peace, as has been attested by holy founders not a few, than a marked disagreement among the members of the community, regarding the essential tenets of Christianity. From this source, indeed, practical difficulties could easily arise which would grieve sorely the lovers of strict observance. For instance, if Sister Mildred's Lutheran convictions have taught her the worth-lessness of good works, she may fail some Monday morning to get the nuns' breakfast ready. In such a domestic crisis it is doubtful whether even the community's strong faith in the propitiatory value of rood-screens and incense could keep the nuns from murmuring a little as they went forth from breakfast to get "in touch with the working world."

But the government of the "cultured," "Catholic" and "non-sectarian" community described in our ritualistic contemporary, would at best be a very difficult task. However, could the "Churchwoman" elected superior, be a mitred as well as a croziered Lady Abbess, perhaps some of the nuns could be persuaded to obey her part of the time. We shall watch with keen interest the progress of the new "Order."

"His Name Could Not be Learned"

ONE day last week, a young man seized with vertigo, fell from the platform of a New York subway station to the track. Two cars of the approaching express passed over his body.

"In the crowd that saw the accident," writes the reporter of a New York newspaper, "there was much hysterical excitement. Women fainted and had to be carried to the street, children were led away crying, and people swarmed from the street, blocking the subway. In the midst of the excitement, a priest shouldered his way through the crowd on the platform. With some difficulty, he got in between the cars, and administered the last rites of the Church to the dying man who was perfectly conscious, as he lay upon the tracks. Then the priest clambered back to the platform, and went his way. His name could not be learned."

From the New York subway station, let your thoughts take you back to the Rome of nearly nineteen centuries ago. The little group of men and women standing on the sands of the Colosseum, anxiously scan the faces of the clamoring mob about them. Somewhere in that vast crowd is an old Jewish fisherman. As death rushes upon Christ's witnesses, the old man will raise his hand, and pronounce the words that were spoken by the unknown priest in the darkness and turmoil of the New York subway last week. The old fisherman and the priest, whose "name could not be learned," are thinking of that merciful commission which their Lord gave them when He walked among men in the fields of Galilee, "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them."

"Ah, thank God, the priest is here!" In the palaces of kings and the huts of beggars, in the roar of the battle-field and the fetid atmosphere of the pest-house, at the lonely bedside where there was only one to comfort, how often has the priest of God brought light and peace and consolation to the trembling souls of Christian men and women, about to go forth on the last long journey from which there is no returning. "Then he went his way. His name could not be learned." What does that matter? He is God's priest, and healing is in his hands. That is enough. That is everything.

Simplifying Life

EVERY once in a while some newspaper or other interviews a nonagenarian or centenarian to find out how to live a hundred years. Various responses have been given to the interviewers. Living in the country, living in the city; early rising in the morning or the same in the afternoon; eating meat and avoiding meat, are some of the answers received. Recently the dodging of automobiles has become one of the favorite ways of prolonging life. All such questioning and replying are particular exemplifications of a general tendency. Mankind is looking for one simple answer to all its needs. The problem of work would be solved forever by perpetual motion. The problem of worry is solved by countless advertisements. The problem of health has ceased to exist in the columns of the press, if you omit the daily news, the obituary column and the Monday-morning-automobile-supplement and peruse only the patent-medicine section. The problem of shopping is simplified by "buying everything at our store." The orchestra, opera and play will soon be conveniently located in your own home within easy reach of an electric button near your couch, and that will simplify the many problems connected with opera-cloaks and ticket-scalpers.

A famous health-specialist recently announced that he had successfully passed his seventieth year and had avoided digging his grave by his teeth. The announcement recalled a significant incident. At the time of the Spanish-American war a breathless youngster rushed up to an older friend and cried out: "Two Spanish vessels have been sunk," and then added cautiously, "I do not know whether this is a fact or only news." It took a Boston lad to establish the subtle distinction between news and facts. The same caution is necessary with regard to the many simplifications of life's problem's found in the press. They may be facts, they may be "only news," or they may be an echo of the advertising department. The story of the teeth may, for example, represent a slackening of trade among dentists and a reciprocity treaty between the news column and the advertising column.

There is this much truth in these simple formulas of health, that most of them will work out if the patient is persistent. The man who is true to early rising will owe his long life, not so much to his alarm-clock as to the thousand other things he must do if he will persevere in his habit. Late entertainments and late suppers will cease. Cold mornings—and there are few warm mornings—will necessitate an immense deal of stamping of feet and swinging of arms and other brisk movements. This splendid exercise will develop a magnificent appetite. Breakfast will fit one for a day's work. A day's work will tire a man out early. Then comes the merciless alarm again. It is not the one practice which makes nonagenarians, but the one thousand other practices which perseverance makes inevitable.

There have been many widely heralded short cuts to sanctity as there have been to everything else. Some are mere supersitition, and some are solid sense. "Get one virtue and you get all" is a simple and safe formula to make a saint. No one can practise one virtue without ultimately practising all if he persists. He will become an imperialist of the soul. His will shall grow like Rome from a small town to the ends of the inhabited globe. "One thing is wanting." "One thing is necessary." "All the law is fulfilled in one word," these and other phrases are some simplified rules of holiness, practical and effective rules if properly understood and properly applied. Not all formulas are fads; some are facts, and really do simplify matters.

LITERATURE

Aquinas "Redivivus"

A MAN'S philosophy is not something he thinks, but everything he thinks. Consequently a final world philosophy is not a truth, but the truth. It must be a synthesis of all truths on earth and in heaven (if there be a heaven), in man and in God (if there be a God). In saying this it must not for a moment be imagined that we have limed our wings with eclecticism; nor that we look upon philosophy as an international gallery housing every school of achievement and effort toward thinking. Philosophy is not a collection of thoughts; for this reason: that between thoughts of things and the truth of things lies the wide world of reality.

Philosophy has been brilliantly defined as "organized thought." The definition is illuminating if valid. But it is valid only when the thought organized is true. Untruths are not organizable because they are not. It is easier to harness the light or the air than to build untruth, as such, into any city of thought. Untruths, however much they bulk, are of no substance. They are not even a quality, but the inevitable cast shadow of reality and truth. Mathematically they are $n—n=o$. Their formula is always more imposing than reality. But they are no-thing, and beget no reality of thought which can be of avail to a master-builder of philosophy.

The scholastics knew as no men before or since ever knew, that a world philosophy is not something the world trows and is true, but everything the world trows and is true. The Prince of Scholastics was especially scholastic in thus thinking imperially of philosophy. No truth wherever found could be denied citizenship in the great commonwealth of thought. Every truth, though it was the murderous rapier thrust of an enemy or the reluctant essence of a lie, demanded freedom of the City of God.

The age that borrowed architecture from the Moors; Aristotle from Attica; damask and steel from Damascus; law from the Romans; philosophy from the Greeks and wisdom from Judea, had no fine scruples about free trade in the traffic of truth. No great man of those heroic days was ever content to write a book. He attempted an encyclopedia. The "Summa," which is now being translated by the English Dominican Fathers (Benziger), is not a book as the Bible is not a book. It is the catalogue raisonné of all the truths the thirteenth century knew about everything from aqueducts to the Blessed Trinity.

No writer has ever quoted more freely than Aquinas from thinkers of every school. He owes much to his friends and no little to his enemies. The "Dumb Ox" grazed over a wide plain, and gives us sustenance of all herbs alike. In dealing with those who did not see as he saw he has sometimes been taken to have failed in attack; but never in understanding. Indeed:

Sine Aquinate
Silet Aristoteles

is a couplet applicable to many another philosopher who in these wearied days of thinking would be unintelligible without the authentic comment of Aquinas. If we make bold to offer Aquinas to a century sicklied over with an agnosticism of wistful half-beliefs and a tragic sense of loss, it is primarily for the manner and not for the matter of his teaching. The age is expectant of a synthesis. But no thinker will achieve or even begin a synthesis until the meanest truth wherever found is as sacrosanct to him as the merest fragment of the Host was sacrosanct to the men of the thirteenth century.

The task before Aquinas was to synthesize everything true about art and science, philosophy and theology, ethics and dogma, theology and religion, reason and faith, asceticism and mysticism, earth and heaven, man and God. His thought became like the politics of the period, a crusade. In those days of nascent European nationality a crusade was the highest achievement of constructive statesmanship. But it would be unfair to look on these hecatombs of humanity as sheer lust for national expansion. Their final cause was to plant the Cross over Jerusalem, and the world. The Crescent with its mere quartering of borrowed light was symbolical of a sterility which is now historical fact. The contemporaries of Aquinas set their minds on finding the fallen Cross and rearing it once more as a prophecy not of a waning world but of a world uprising from the tomb.

Over the empire of thought Aquinas sought to set the Crucified. For the moment he was more minded to summon levies from the four corners of truth than to organize them in any immanent manner. He housed his levies hurriedly in the synthesis of the credo; for, be it borne in mind, that the credo is nothing less than a synthesis. It is not a full synthesis since it does not include ethics, except fugitively as "the forgiveness of sins." But all other principles of reason and faith are there housed in one family of truth. Indeed no other synthesis is so redolent of the God of all consolation. It not only housed open-heartedly Redeemer and redeemed, the prodigal son and the still more prodigal Father, but couples the name of names with all the humility of a Roman governor, Pontius Pilate. It is as if we of to-day chaunted in our credos the names of Mr. Taft or Mr. Wilson! To me it has always seemed that Pontius Pilate, the one man in authority who made an effort to save the Saviour, has place in the credo not as one gibbeted for our scorn but one remembered for our consolation. However that may be, the credo remains on the whole the most daring synthesis of the Infinite and the finite—of God and Pontius Pilate.

The Decalogue is a brief Hebrew synthesis of dogma and ethics. It begins with belief in God and ends with a command not to covert our neighbors' goods! Between these two Hebrew history hangs crucified. Were St. Thomas born again he would set to work on making his synthesis organic. For the moment it is but a chaplet of beliefs strung loosely on a golden thread of faith. This is not the final synthesis. But the modern mind will not have begun the serious work of a new philosophy until it follows on where Aquinas ended; even as the future will have no wider horizon than the present if to-morrow does not stand on the shoulders of to-day.

For this reason it has become a necessity of life to undertake a translation of the "Summa" into a language understood by millions of sober toilers in thought, word and deed. For the lowing of the "Dumb Ox" is but the Vox Populi, the deep voice of humanity beseeching men to gather the scattered truths of experience and vision into an orb of truth.

VINCENT M'NABB, O.P.

REVIEWS

The Vatican. Its History—Its Treasures. New York: Letters and Arts Publishing Co. $10.00.

There is a saying in Europe that all roads lead to Rome, which was, and is, true in fact. So that the pious pilgrim who wishes to visit the Eternal City and perform his devotions at the tombs of the Apostles has but to gird up his loins, and with a brave heart and a pair of stout legs, set out for mighty Rome, Mother and Mistress of the world. As a matter of fact the present-day pilgrim does nothing of the kind, save on such rare instances as the journey to Rome which Mr. Hilaire Belloc performed on foot. He goes by a Cook's tour or joins some Catholic association, and having paid his passage, the company sees to the rest. But multitudes there are who can not conveniently journey to Rome, and must be content to make fireside pilgrimages with the help of books like this sumptuous volume.

"The Vatican," its treasures, the working and administration of the papal household are described in this volume with clearness, accuracy and literary skill. The contributing authors are experts in the various departments they have undertaken. This is especially the case in the section on the "Vatican Administration," by Mgr. Paul Maria Baumgarten. It is a difficult thing for Catholics who have not visited Rome to grasp the extent and wonderful historical associations of the Vatican, but in this fine book the past lives again, the ancient glories of papal Rome pass before our eyes, and the printed word is embellished with a series of remarkable reproductions of well-nigh all the wonderful things in the Holy Father's palace. "The Vatican" may be considered indeed a standard work on the home of the Popes. A study of the volume should always precede a visit to the Eternal City, and the book itself will be a valuable addition to every library. H. C. W.

France Herself Again. By ERNEST DIMNET. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

About four decades ago, France was smitten by some malignant wizard's rod, bewitched out of her nobler self, and transformed into a coarse and vulgar thing. In 1905 a clap of thunder roused her from her lethargy and degradation. In the March of that year the German Emperor landed at Tangier and at the very moment when the French were strenuously endeavoring to widen the sphere of their influence in Morocco, proclaimed that its Sultan was "in his eyes an independent sovereign and Morocco a country open to all nations without any monopoly or annexation." The Kaiser's declaration was a gage of battle flung down to the French Republic. M. Delcassé, France's strongest man, was at the head of affairs. He wanted war. But the army was demoralized by the Dreyfusist agitation and the spy system of André and Combes. The military magazines and stores were empty. The whole country was seething with the poisonous ferment of political disunion and schism. War, under such conditions, would have been an absurdity and a crime. But Germany stood firm. Delcassé had to be sacrificed. He resigned, and France backed down. The country soon realized the stinging blow. In that "clap of thunder" as the author calls it, France heard a call to a new life. She is heeding it now and becoming herself again.

Such a theme affords the Abbé Dimnet scope for the keen analytical powers he has already manifested in his: "La Pensée Catholique dans l'Angleterre contemporaine." Everywhere the work gives evidence of coherent conception in its structure, of effective grouping of proof and detail. It carries with it a thoroughly French atmosphere of clearness and simplicity. He describes in broad outlines the moral and intellectual improvement of the country since the Tangier incident. The awakening of the instinct of self-preservation, the revival of the military spirit, the Chamber's waning prestige, brought on by its venality and greed, the diffusion of a new mentality through every rank of society, and the reaction against scientism and materialism. The chapters dealing with the sordid influence of Freemasonry, International Socialism and Dreyfusism, with Combism, that "abject system" as Millerand termed it, are among the best in the book.

It is to be regretted that in a book written by the learned abbé for English readers there is little to indicate the priestly character of the writer. A more pronounced and Catholic tone would have improved the work. Gambetta, for instance, is dealt with too leniently. To call the "Syllabus" a document in "which all the consequences derived from the dogma of liberty were anathematized" is unwarranted and unsound. In the review of the causes of national deterioration, greater stress should have been laid upon the godless education foisted upon the schools, and that other great national crime of the hearth and home, which has robbed France of millions of her children.

Without question France is awaking from her lethargy, but to be entirely herself again she must return not only to "a plain and virile Christianity" but to those truly Catholic traditions and principles with which her real greatness is identified. J. C. R.

The Mason-Bees. By J. HENRI FABRE. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

This is another of those charming books by the insects' Homer. The volume consists of eleven essays: in one of these the author writes of cats; in another, of red ants; while the rest are almost entirely taken up with the mason-bees. M. Fabre is a poet as well as a painstaking scientist, and though he destroys many a myth, yet he gives the romantic no reason for lamentation, for he brings out truths that are stranger than fiction. The mason-bee is made to appear a builder of strange capacity, skilful within a limited sphere of action, entirely stupid and indeed helpless outside that circle. There is at least one safe conclusion to be drawn from the book. The mason-bee does not reason, it follows instinct blindly, not only failing to adapt itself to slight changes in conditions but even showing itself entirely helpless when confronted by obstacles which deprive it for the instant of the guidance of instinct. Scholastic philosophers owe another debt of gratitude to Fabre for vindicating so well, if unconsciously, their doctrine on the essential difference between instinct and reason. The author deals some sound blows to a certain species of crude evolution. He considers mimesis "a piece of childishness," recounts facts that run counter to the hypothesis and remarks:

> We have quite enough of these zoological brutalities: man, the son of the ape; duty, a foolish prejudice; conscience, a lure for the simple; genius, neurosis; patriotism, jingo heroics; the soul, a product of protoplasmic energies; God a puerile myth. Let us raise the war whoop and go out for scalps: we are here only to devour one another, the summum bonum is the Chicago packer's dollar chest. Enough, quite enough of that, without having transformation next, to break down the social law of work.

This may be amusing but there is a truth in it, which is none the less convincing because of its dramatic setting. R. H. T.

The Ivy Hedge. By MAURICE FRANCIS EGAN. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.35.

The hedge is of poison ivy, planted around his palatial residence in one of the Jersey suburbs of New York by Morton, the "Can King"; and without and within its circle grow poverty and luxury, the grasping and socially ambitious rich and the despoiled and socialistic poor, schemes of reform and aggrandizement and sundry other problems, persons, classes and modern developments, until the hedge is burned down, the evils it typifies are diminished or extinguished, and everything and everybody are parceled off so rapidly and happily that one is forcibly reminded that "this world is all a fleeting show," though hardly "for man's illusion given." The 331 lively pages constitute a large canvas of American life. The Coyne family, prevented by poverty from enjoying the distinction of descent from the most celebrated witch that was hanged at Salem, occupy the centre; and around them are cleverly grouped Mrs. Trevanion of Wales whose "second sight" enables her to see the right thing first; a Gallo-Irish couturière who is queenly in French, and Irish in English and noble in both; Madame Bianca, an actress and also a character of delightful distinctiveness, and several sets of Jews, promoters, seamstresses, monopolists, agitators, reformers and clergymen. The incidents and the four or five conversions are rather hurried, but motives and expositions are sound and the interest is sustained by humor, aphorisms, and the cunning of a practised hand. A notable feature is the treatment of the professional "Catholic" politician. The book will enhance Dr. Egan's reputation as a Catholic novelist. M. K.

The Charm of Ireland. By BURTON E. STEPHENSON. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

In a large, well-printed octavo volume of 564 pages, Mr. Stephenson gives an account of his trip through Ireland in the early summer of last year. His route is the usual one, a passage through the mountain fringe of the island, with an added excursion to the great inland plain at Athlone and to the site of the "Deserted Village." The places have been described and photographed times unnumbered, yet it is safe to say that the author's narrative will be read with interest, not only by strangers, but also by those familiar with the scenes from actual residence or from visits from without. The reason is that the writer brings to his task sympathy and knowledge. He is familiar with the authentic history of the race as well as of their traditions, legends and poetry, and his sympathy is genuine, yet not such as to blind him to the faults of the people, and make him hostile to the English, despite the stupid anomalies and criminal selfishness of British admininstration. He is not Irish, he is not English, he is not a braggart Yankee, who sees nothing praiseworthy beyond his own day, or the precincts of his own voting district or county. He is a trained, broad-minded observer and a master of expression, who tells plainly and readably what he observes. That does not imply that he can not make mistakes, as in Gaelic words, for example, though his mistakes are few and unimportant. He notes the fact that the stage Irishman is not to be found in Ireland, and he has no record of a mud hovel, familiar only to those who have never lived in Ireland. He finds but little enthusiasm for Home Rule, as the people suspect they are getting a charter for a national debating society and very little else. So also he surmizes that Ulster Unionism is much of a "bluff." Those not familiar with Ireland have a treat in store for them in Mr. Stephenson's book. P. J. D.

Philosophy, What is it? By F. B. JEVONS, Litt.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.

These lectures were written for workingmen and, as might be expected, contain nothing of interest to the student of philosophy. Materialism, idealism and scepticism are rejected on broad grounds. There is not a little repetition in these chapters and in consequence they make tiresome reading. Professor Jevons is much clearer and safer in his explanation of what philosophy isn't than in his explanation of what philosophy is. True, he is a realist, admits the freedom of the will and concludes that our experience of the world and life can only be explained by postulating the existence of a perfect Personality, God: "We can if we will, do His will, and draw near to Him both in our hearts and in our actions. But to draw near to Him we must love Him with all our heart and with all our soul, and must love our neighbor as ourself." All this sounds quite orthodox, but in what sense does Professor Jevons understand it? Is he, like many other philosophers who speak with reverence of God, a pantheist? In the chapter on "Personality and the Whole" there are not a few passages which seem to point directly that way. This suggests a word of warning. It might be well for the average Catholic to take expert advice before reading books or articles written by non-Catholic philosophers or pseudo-philosophers. A bit of ridicule lightly aimed at some principle of Catholic philosophy; false theories hidden under obscure terms and treatment; conclusions which at their face value may be sound, but which, in the author's sense, are absolutely unsound, are of not infrequent occurrence in such writings. It is hard at times, even for the trained mind, to discover their badness. What wonder then if the unwary reading them, absorb all unconsciously much that may be harmful to reason, faith and morals. One can not be too careful when interests so vital are at stake. W. J. B.

Women of the Classics. By MARY STURGEON. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. $2.50.

This is a very readable account, generously interspersed with excerpts from some of the best recent metrical translations, of the heroines in Homer and the Greek tragedians, Dido being added from the pages of Virgil. The feminist author says that "mere men," having had a monopoly of works on the classics, have not treated adequately the gallery of gentle or dreadful dames and demoiselles of that elder day, but now that petticoated A.M.'s, Ph.D's and Litt.D's are, if not yet so numerous as the trousered species, fully as clever, that old iniquity has had its day and ceased to be. The book is welcome, and the performance is worthy of her contention. The wholesome reticence she mentions as practised by Homer, she carries into her pages, too. Those who have not had acquaintance with charming Nausicaa, will find in their introduction to her here that she is charming still, and if they do not find Clytemnestra amiable, well, neither did lordly Agamemnon, king of men. Many of the artistic photogravures that illustrate the volume throw light on the heroines' characters, but some of the pictures are not at all becoming or appropriate, that of the chaste Cassandra, for instance, and of the modest Phaedra. But these objectionable illustrations can be removed. A. P. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The "Christian" novel is, more often than not, a very flabby affair at best, and perhaps Mrs. Kate Langley Bosher might not entirely care for the epithet "Christian" applied to "How It Happened" (Harper, $1.00). For all that there is something very Christian in the old Christmas spirit of love, the softening of hearts, and good cheer, which is charmingly set out by this gifted lady. It is the story of a young man and woman separated, who are at length brought together by a very unconventional little girl. The theme is not a new one, but the reader is not dragged through the puddle of the underworld to a happy conclusion; which seems, unhappily, to be the general novitiate for being "happy ever after." The book will make a delightful gift for Christmas, and is a welcome addition to the store of clean fiction.

It is so imperative that American Catholics should thoroughly understand the ruthless nature of the persecution "Liberalism" has been inflicting on the Church in Mexico that the current issue of Catholic Mind devotes its pages to giving an account of the outrages endured by our coreligionists beyond the Rio Grande. The number opens with a paper on "Mexican Liberalism" written by a prominent member of the Catholic party in our neighboring republic. Then follows a selection of affidavits made by those who have witnessed the horrors they describe. Next come some of the decrees the Liberals have issued for the "reformation" of the Church, and the issue ends with a translation of the letter recently sent by the Holy Father to the Archbishop of Mexico. The "atrocities" here detailed should be of more concern to Americans than are the horrors of the great war now raging in Europe, because our Government can hardly be acquitted of a share of responsibility for the present condition of the Church in Mexico.

Mr. Louis E. Cadieux's "Practical Talks with the Christian Child" (American Book Co., $0.20), is a little volume that deserves a cordial welcome from every Catholic teacher in the land. This "brief manual of manners and morals," is meant to be a text-book for the upper grammar grades. In short chapters, followed by thought-provoking questions, the author admirably explains the importance of forming good habits in childhood, and then tells how boys and girls who are well-bred, conduct themselves at home, at church, at play, at school and in public, and adds excellent little chapters on conversation, reading and letter-writing. As elementary education that is thorough, means teaching children not only religion, reading, writing and arithmetic, but good manners too, our teachers should find Mr. Cadieux's "Practical Talks" of great value in the classroom.

The capable editor of "The Boys' Book of Battles" (Houghton, $2.00) has packed into more than 400 pages forty-one good selections in prose and verse, describing some of the great combats of history. The matter is arranged in chronological order with a view to showing the development of warfare from the earliest times to the present day. So the volume begins with "The Victory Over the Khita," as described by Pen-ta-ur, the Egyptian poet, in 1326 B. C., and ends with an account of a battle in mid-air which Sergeant Werner, of the German Aviation Corps had last summer with an English biplane. Between are such famous pieces as Hugo's "Waterloo," Macaulay's "Naseby," Froissart's "Crécy" and Thucydides' "Platæa." The illustrations help to make the volume an attractive holiday book.

Some account of "Early American Churches" (Doubleday, $2.80) illustrated with more than one hundred full-page photographs of exteriors and interiors, has been prepared by Aymar Embury II, a name that looks quite royal and dynastic. He describes Protestant churches built in the villages and towns of the Atlantic seaboard from 1632 to 1843, St. Luke's at Smithfield. Va., and the "Ship Meeting House," at Hingham, Mass., being the oldest. For the most part, the edifices in the illustrations are plain buildings obviously meant just to sit in, for in colonial times and after, the chief act of worship, so called, was listening to a long sermon. The author has found in the East no Catholic church that he deems of sufficient antiquity and architectural beauty to merit a place in his book. For both reasons, however, it would seem that the Baltimore Cathedral built by Latrobe in 1821; St. Joseph's, Philadelphia, dating from 1732, and St. Mary's in the same city, erected in 1763, to name but a few of our old churches, are as worthy of mention, surely, as are half the meeting houses Mr. Embury describes.

"The Hand of Mercy" (Kenedy, $1.00) is a collection of thirty-three stories originally contributed, with a few exceptions, to the Missionary magazine by the Rev. Richard W. Alexander. The tales are simple accounts of actual experiences had by a mission priest.—Hannah Southwick has prepared a seasonable booklet called "Little Contemplations on the 'O Anthems'" (T. R. Marvin & Son, Boston). Taking the nine anthems that precede and follow the "Magnificat" in the Church's office from December 17 to December 25 inclusive, the author develops after the Ignatian method, nine practical meditations well suited for a novena in preparation for Christmas.—"The Dramatic Version of 'The Birds' Christmas Carol'" (Houghton, $0.60) is an adaptation by Kate Douglas Wiggin of her delightful story. The kindness of the lame child, Carol Bird, in planning for the poor alley family a happy Christmas in her father's mansion will win an audience, while all must laugh at the Ruggleses' preparations for the great Christmas dinner. Throughout the play there is an artistic blending of the comic and the pathetic. The fact that the book gives directions for a production with rather modest as well as with elaborate stage effects, places the play within the capacity of most children.

The fourteenth number of the "Catholic Library" is the first volume of Blessed John Fisher's "Commentary on the Seven Penitential Psalms" (Herder, $0.30) edited with preface and glossary by J. S. Phillimore, M.A. The book was first published in 1509, reprinted as a literary curiosity in 1876 and as a devotional work in 1888. Professor Phillimore by adapting the spelling but not the diction of the author has made the book of no less value to the student of sixteenth-century English than to the lover of ascetical works, for the "Commentary" is as remarkable for its vigorous language as for its solid piety. The editor has contributed an excellent preface in which he lays bare the popular fallacy that there was no English literature worthy of the name until the Elizabethan Protestants began to write. In the "spacious times" of "Good Queen Bess" there was no room for a Campion, a Southwell, an Allen or a Stapleton, while the earlier works of Fisher and More were studiously forgotten. Professor Phillimore writes: "We have names enough to keep a footing even during the hundred years when Anglican and English looked most like becoming synonyms, before the thin overlay of the new religion had shrunk much: Crashaw, Dryden and Pope." Along with this book of sermons should be read Father Bridgett's admirable biography of their martyred author.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Amministrazione Civilta Cattolica, Rome:
I Gesuiti dalle Origini ai Nostri Giorni. P. Rosa, S.J.

Benziger Bros., New York:
Elsass, Lothringen & Einsiedeln. Von Dr. P. Odilo Ringholz, O.S.B. $0.35; Jugenbrot. Von P. Ambros Zurcher, O.S.B. $0.80.

Burns & Oates, Ltd., London:
How to Help the Dead. A Translation of St. Augustine, by Mary H. Allies. 1s.; The Valiant Woman. By Archbishop Landriot. 2s.

Devin-Adair Co., New York:
A Far Away Princess. By Christian Reid. $1.35.

Dolphin Press, Philadelphia:
With My Parish. Edited by James Loomis, M.D. $0.60; Life of St. Columban. By George Metlake. $2.00.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:
The Kaiser. Edited by Asa Don Dickinson. $2.00.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Legends of King Arthur and His Knights By Janet MacDonald Clark. Illustrated by W. H. Margetson. $2.50; Pinocchio. By Collodi. $0.50; A Basket of Plums. By Lawson Wood. $0.50; The War Week by Week. By Edward S. Martin. $1.00.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Vexilla Regis. A Book of Devotions on Behalf of All Affected by the War. Translated and Arranged by Very Rev. Mgr. Benson. $0.50.

Merrymount Press, Boston:
Pico della Mirandola: A Platonik Discourse Upon Love. Translated by Thomas Stanley, and Edited by Edmund G. Gardner. $3.00; Giovanni. della Casa: The Galateo—Of Manners and Behaviour. Edited by J. E. Springarn. $3.00.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.:
Essays on Milton. By Elbert N. S. Thompson. $1.35.

EDUCATION

Why Send Girls to School?

"MY grandmamma has said, poor old lady, she is dead, long ago," that schools are not what they were when she was a girl. One may well hesitate to quote his grandmother in these days of destructive criticism; but for all that, many will feel that the years which rested so lightly upon that venerable lady, quenched the vigor of her intellect, as little as they dimmed the lambent light of her eyes. "Ah, Mr. Pickwick," says Mrs. Wardle of a century ago, as her fine old hand smoothes down the lavender-colored silk, "young people were very different when I was a girl." "No doubt of that, Ma'am," replies the gallant philosopher, "and that's the reason why I would make much of the few that have any trace of the old stock."

I never knew my respective grandmothers, Susanna and Elizabeth: that is my loss, shortening by two links the chain which binds me a willing captive to the past. But aided by the memory of some old daguerreotypes and paintings, I can see little Elizabeth and Susanna in my mind's eye. They differ, indeed, from their great-granddaughters. I need not detail for you these quaint little maidens, with their queer, old-fashioned flounces and furbelows, as I remember them in pictures that were painted by "one whose best was not over well." You have them in your own home, doubtless; or if, alas, as often happens, the dust of the lumber room is on them, you can find them again in Doctor Holmes' "Dorothy Q."

SUSANNA AT SCHOOL

Susanna went to Miss Bristow's School for Young Ladies long before she held that title, save by brevet. I grieve to say that at this period, she was a little heretic, and was taught her letters in connection with "In Adam's Fall, We sinned all," and "Heaven to Find, The Bible Mind." I don't know whether little girls learned to read more quickly in those golden days, but before long, Susanna's finger was tracing such sounding lines as these:

> Since the Sunshine of the Gospel of Jesus Christ has risen amongst us; since we are loosed from the Bands of Ignorance and Superstition; since every Protestant believes it it his Duty to promote Christian Knowledge; certainly it will be confess'd, that all Improvements in Learning ought to be encouraged: And consequently that they deserve our particular Regard, who study to make the first Steps firm and easy. For, the Man seldom clears himself of those ill Faculties, which are contracted in his tender Age: So, says Solomon, Train up a Child in the Way he should go, and in old Age he will not depart from it.

This is indeed an overt plea ad misericordiam on the part of the teacher. But I doubt if Susanna needed aught to heighten her appreciation of the virtue and abilities of Miss Bristow, who besides Arithmetick and Grammar, taught the senior girls the Use of Globes. The small fingers that laboriously traced in round childish hand, Susanna Brown Her Book, are dust these many years; yellowed and faded the samplers, her stint of a Saturday afternoon. I even believe that at Georgetown, whither she repaired on becoming a little papist, she was taught to make wax flowers, objects of art which time has mercifully deleted. Other works of her hands still remain, cherished lovingly in a certain old cedar-chest. I am ill at these numbers, for I do not know the terms whereby these tokens of her childhood days may be briefly described. But you took a piece of cardboard, red or white, and sometimes gold or silver, pierced full of small holes; and through the holes you drew strands of parti-colored silk or worsted; and when the work was finished, you read against the gay background, "God is Love," "Love One Another." I don't know what you call these articles. One rarely sees them nowadays, for they are as fashionable as a photograph album on a marble-topped table in the centre of the "parlor."

Of course, she learned other things: Sewing and Literature and Politeness, and the Harp, Christian Doctrine, Sacred and Profane History, Writing and Dancing and Drawing, with a quantity of other matters, tending to refine the Female Mind. It is true that when Susanna came home from her convent school, bearing her diploma, tied with a wide blue ribbon, she had never heard of Laplace, or the Encyclopedists; and as for biology, she could not have told you whether that was a disease or a heresy. But she knew quite well why the Lord had made her, and she was intelligent enough to acknowledge that she was woefully ignorant of by far the largest section of the field of human knowledge. Also she knew how to take care of a home. I am inclined to think that a school which effects all this, may be said to educate its pupils.

EARLY VICTORIAN AIMS

My venerable grandmother was right when she said that schools are not what they were when she was a girl. Grandmother was not a philosopher. She did not know the place of evolution in pedagogy. So gently had time dealt with her, that she knew only that the world was more noisy and bustling than it used to be; not that men and women had changed their ways of thinking almost as much as they had changed their means of transportation. But even in grandmother's time, there was much talk of the higher education of women. In 1798, Mary Wollstonecraft published her "Vindication of Women's Rights," and discussed the matter in terms which excluded her from the ranks of right-minded Females. Fifty years later, Tennyson wrote his "Princess," which besides much prose, really has something in it besides the line about the sweet girl-graduate. Queen's College at London opened its doors about this time, and a few years later, the world first read "Aurora Leigh."

It is, of course, a mistake to judge the numerous "female academies" of the second quarter of the nineteenth century, by prevailing academic standards. Yet, when due allowance has been made, it must be admitted that, rated by any proper educational standard, many of them hardly merited the name of institutions of learning. It is only fair to add, that the majority of them made no pretension to be considered such. They were satisfied if they could impart a fair knowledge of the elementary subjects. Their real value lay in their endeavor to make their pupils, not well-informed, but good and wholesome children. "Be good, sweet maid, and let who will, be clever," might have been the legend written over their doorways.

THE NEW BROOM

A change was called for, and it came. The new broom swept away much that was good in Susanna's early Victorian school. It is a trite saying, though by no means a trite practice, that school programs and discipline must hold in view the position which the majority of the pupils will occupy in life. Seventy years ago, the training of girls implied that practically all of them would remain within a domestic circle. True the world has changed since those simple days. Yet even to-day, what is the place in life to which most of our Catholic girls will be called? There are no figures at hand, but it is probably correct to say that ninety per cent. of them will ultimately preside over homes of their own. In view of these approximately correct figures, we may ask ourselves, seriously, whether or not our schools are fitting their pupils to become home-makers.

Mr. Leigh Hodges wrote some years ago in the North American Review, that the development of the convent girl's domestic traits was singularly complete:

> The convent-bred girl has long been accepted as a model of sweet, useful womanhood, possessed of refinements and accomplishments which add a distinct charm to her natural attractions, and it is a consideration of first importance that the development of her domestic traits is singularly complete.

Self-respect, modesty, a bright and easy charity, obedience, sacrifice, love of God above all things and love of one's neighbor for His sake, the virtues which make home-life possible and holy, are the very virtues upon which the convent school will lay most stress. But home-making has its practical side, and calls for arts not within the scope of the Catechism. Arabella may be a perfect angel, but she must expect Edward to be a bit "sniffy" after a while, if absorbed in the "Life of St. Rose of Lima," she lets the biscuits burn, or forgets to have dinner ready against Edward's home-coming. Mother Stuart, who wrote most wisely of the education of girls, held that a convent girl should "reach independence in the practical arts of life." By this she meant that the girl should know how to sew, cook, nurse, choose and direct her servants, and in emergency, take their place. How many schools train their girls to this practical independence? A wise old nun, who after more than sixty years in the same convent as pupil and religious went to take a high place in heaven, used to recall how when she was a school girl, the pupils not only kept all their garments in repair, but actually made most of them! "But, now, many of our little ladies can't even sew on a button, and they don't care to learn."

TRAINING FOR HOME MAKING

In these days, when the factors of pleasure and idleness are growing so strong, it would seem that home-making courses could find no more fitting refuge than our convent schools. In training the children to habits based upon supernatural virtue, our religious teachers can not be equalled. The value of the work which they have done in this country for the Church and for society, is simply incalculable. There is little fear that in the making of school programs, our convent schools will suffer from the lack of a sanely conservative policy. With the simplicity of the dove, our teaching sisters combine, as a rule, much of the wisdom of the serpent. They know quite well that since the vast majority of their pupils are not called to the religious life, they must be prepared for "life in the world." I think they would agree with Mr. Herbert Spencer that no man ever fell in love with a woman because she understood Italian; that no Edwin was ever brought to Angelina's feet because she could talk German. Their pupils must live in the world, and they want to make them, as Longfellow's poet wrote, "as pure as water and as good as bread," and in this, their success is marvelous. Perhaps I speak as one mad, but it seems to me that the humble home-making courses would, under their religious care, help them to form even better home-makers than they have given us in the past. It really does not make a great deal of difference whether or not Priscilla can play the Moonlight Sonata, or read M. Bazin in the original. It does matter a great deal whether or not Priscilla has learned the art of making her home the brightest, cheerfullest spot on earth.

P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

Social Legislation and Juvenile Delinquency

IT would not be a difficult task to run over a file of newspapers gathered at random from half a dozen American cities, and from their dismal police columns, compile a fairly complete anthology of juvenile crime. "What is drawing our youth into criminal paths in such appalling numbers?" asks the Chicago Tribune. "Police records have repeatedly shown that it is not the hardened criminal, but the young crook who is terrorizing both police officers and the public. Once out on a criminal errand, he will not stop short of murder to carry out his criminal designs." "Just now," writes the editor of the New York Sun, "the 'Gophers' are said to be in active eruption. Two things are particularly noticeable about these occurrences. One is that the youths who belong to gangs are said to be crazed with cocaine. The other is, that they are armed to the teeth. After one shooting, four revolvers were picked up in the street, where the gangsters had dropped them." "There is imperative need for very serious, sober, searching thought," are the opening words of an editorial in the Detroit Free Press, "about the declaration of Warden Simpson of the Jackson prison, that the average age of prisoners in the State penal institutions in 1914, is eight years younger than the average ten years ago in Michigan, and that in the same period, juvenile delinquency has increased five-fold." "Boys, fifteen and sixteen years old," reported the first police deputy in Chicago, a few weeks ago, "are going wrong, seriously wrong, in increasing numbers. They are taken into court, where instead of being punished, they are given a few words of advice, and then dismissed to go out and grow up committing some more crime. Talky-talky advice doesn't stop a majority of them, by a good margin."

MORE LAW AND MORE LAWLESSNESS

Glance at your local paper, and note the proportion of boys and girls still in their teens, who figure in the police records. The journals quoted in the preceding paragraph, observe that this "crime-wave" is reaching its height in a period in which social legislation is approaching a maximum. This is equivalent to saying that this vast amount of new law has not prevented a marked increase in the violation of laws that are older than the Ten Commandments. "What is the use of it all," asks the New York Sun, "if drugs and guns are still within easy reach of a semi-criminal element who . . . break loose from time to time and shoot up the streets?" A striking editorial paragraph in the Detroit Free Press, sums up the failure of our boasted social legislation to lessen the juvenile crime:

> One point that impresses itself strongly in connection with Warden Simpson's report, is the incongruous circumstance that the period of deterioration cited by the warden of the State prison, is the very period in which devices, legal, philanthropic and educational, for the protection and proper moulding of the youth, have blossomed forth as roses in springtime. The juvenile court, the probation plan, the farm colony, the propaganda for the inculcation of morals and sex hygiene in the public schools, have all opened into their fullness in the last decade. Never has the juvenile delinquent been handled as elaborately and as exhaustively as he is to-day. Never have the courts inquired as solicitously into the budding peccadillos which bear germs of future misconduct. Never before was so much prominence given the "germ theory" in morals. Never before were youngsters as tenderly and as thoroughly regulated by the State. Then why this appalling deterioration of the youth of the commonwealth? . . . The reason lies in the notorious and lamentable decrease in parental oversight of the young. Fathers and mothers are being relieved more and more of their natural responsibilities by the State. . . . Parents are showing themselves content, even anxious, to turn their duties over to the courts and the public school teachers. Mothers seem to think that having borne children, they have done their full duty and the State should do the rest. In consequence, children are left largely free to drown themselves in floods of frivolity, vice and crime.

Not one word of this indignant indictment is new to Catholic social workers. For years they have noted the tendency of social legislation to break down the parental sense of responsibility. Catholics are willing to admit and encourage what is good in social legislation. They recognize that it is the State which must protect the citizen in those things in which he can not protect himself. They believe that the State not only may, but must, abolish public sources of immorality and injustice by removing their authors and abettors from the pale of society.

But they do not admit that law can take the place of religion. Their plea that legislation alone can do but little for our boys and girls, has been lost in the wild outcry of sociological cranks whose mania is, that the social evils which now stalk abroad at noonday, can be forever laid to rest by legislation. Catholics have met this argument by showing, that for the increase in legislation, we have an increase in juvenile lawlessness. Only an unreasoning devotion to an ideal conceived in defiance of facts, can blind certain modern sociologists to the truth that this legislation has utterly failed to get at the root of the evil.

THE BROKEN HOME

Back of the major portion of the army of ruined children, we find the broken home. Back of the broken home, we find the violation of God's law. Jimmy Smith's father is a drunkard; his mother is that, and worse. There is nothing in his surroundings to help him to lead a decent life; there is everything to drag him down to the low level of his parents. As for Jimmy's sister, from the very time she was able to notice anything at all, this broken home began the process, not only of breaking down all that naturally safeguards a girl, but of supplying her with those ideals which lead by swift and certain steps to a ruined life. Such homes are nurseries of vice, and their number can be learned from the records of the Children's Court in any large community. Of 1,307 delinquent children before the St. Louis court, for instance, in the years 1908-09, 52 per cent. came from broken homes. Federal reports show that more than sixty per cent. of the number of delinquent girls, are the product of homes which are not "normal."

Saloons, dance halls, tenements, bad as they often are, can not be made to bear the whole blame for the increase of juvenile waywardness. It is quite untrue that external environment necessarily leads to juvenile delinquency. It is equally untrue to hold, as modern sociologists seem to affirm, that the removal of untoward external environment will do away with juvenile delinquency. Even though they live in the heart of a slum district, children can be protected from the occasion of wrongdoing by efficient parental authority, and in the absence of this parental authority, or its equivalent, children born in palaces may, and do, go down into the pit. "Slum poison," as the Chicago Tribune wisely notes, "is daily counteracted in thousands of tenement homes where parents fulfil their duties to their children," and "affiliate them with elevating school and church connections." There are Catholic girls, as every priest knows, who in the midst of the most sordid environments, are telling again in their daily lives, the beautiful story of Agnes and Cecilia; Catholic boys whose ceaseless struggle against the vileness which they meet on every side, shows them to be of that valiant band whose violence bears away the kingdom of heaven. The Catholic sociologist will agree that environments which are morally unhealthful have no right to exist; that they should be removed by force of law, if no other force can do away with them. But he will not admit that man is the toy of environment. He knows that by the help of supernatural religion men and women can rise above it.

GODLESS SOCIOLOGY

We are losing our time and our effectiveness, if we persist in acting on the theory that reformation of life and manners, public or private, is exclusively, or even largely, a question of sociology or economics. Ignore the influence of supernatural religion, and you make real reformation impossible. The curse of this modern sociology is that God has no part in it. It is not a remedy, but a poison. It drugs, it stupefies; it numbs the consciousness of present pain and all seems well until the soporific power of the poison has spent itself, and the social body awakens to the fact that no lasting cure has been effected. First show us that you can cure a cancerous growth by dusting it carefully with talcum powder, and we shall be ready to admit that social legislation which ignores God, can reform evils which have been brought about by violation of God's law. There is no hope of social reform except in a return to Christian manners, said Leo XIII. This is the creed of the Catholic sociologist.

THE ONE EFFICIENT REMEDY

All this is said with the certain knowledge, that the modern sociologist, who at present seems to hold the field, will consider it reactionary, bigoted, narrow and impractical. But hard words break no bones; nor do they move the Catholic sociologist from his position. If the home of the future is to be a real home, we must put supernatural religion deep into the hearts of the children, the home makers or home breakers, of the years to come. Religion, taught by word and example, must permeate our homes. We can not afford to send our children into the chilling atmosphere of the school that knows not God. If we are wise, we will not allow ourselves to forget, that the fathers and mothers of the broken homes about us, were not born degraded, nor will we be unmindful of the possibility, that in the hearts of our own children, there may be tendencies which, if permitted to strike root, will insure more broken homes in future generations. The ideal Catholic home is easily described. In sanctity, it yields only to the altar on which we offer the unblemished sacrifice. It is the foundation of civilized society. It is the nursery of saints and heroes. It is a society to whose head God Himself has committed rights that are inalienable, rights with which the State can interfere only at its peril. For the rights of the family, the Church has stood unmoved through storms of persecution, nor will she to-day allow that they may be invaded on the plea of "social betterment." Around the family she has thrown the protection of her Sacraments; for the sake of one trembling woman, who begged that the honor of her dishonored womanhood might be righted, she withstood the wrath of the conqueror of Europe, threatening her with extinction in the realms of France.

Again, to the typical modern sociologist, this is the raving of madness. But it is the unchanging and unchangeable position of the Catholic Church. Grace, through prayer and the Sacraments, not statute law, is the direct and Christ-appointed means of reformation and sanctification. And as she holds that on the preservation of the thoroughly Christian home, depends the continuance of our civilization, so does she alone, seriously and consistently endeavor to close the mart of ruined children, by making the home all that God intended it to be.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A statistical study of Cook County, Illinois, marriages and divorces, recently issued by the county clerk, shows that of 2,660 marriages contracted during a given period, 482, or something over 18 per cent. ended in divorce before the expiration of a year. "Hasty and improvident marriages," comments the clerk, "are fairly certain to issue in divorce." To give the intending couple some time for reflection, it has been suggested in a number of localities, that they be required to file with the proper authorities, two or three declarations of their intention, before the license can be issued. This would in a manner, be a return to the Catholic custom of "calling the banns," and would doubtless be the means of preventing many a hasty and unhallowed "marriage."

"The twilight has fallen upon the political quacks," writes the Boston Transcript, commenting upon the recent elections. The long-suffering people of a certain Western State, who had been led to believe that almost everything except the motion of the planets might be regulated by the State Legislature, have at last risen in revolt. The New York Sun thus recounts their action:

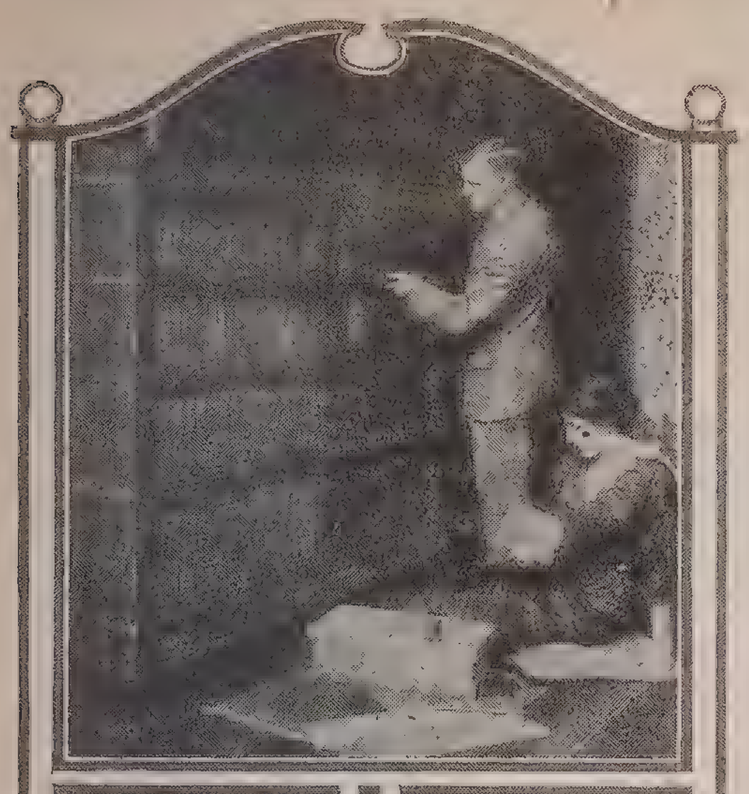
> They voted against the easier amendment of the State Constitution, against the initiative and referendum, against the recall of elective officers (not including judges), against insurance by the State, against the submission of constitutional amendments by the Legislature to the people upon petition to the former. In short, the State so long the forcing bed and experiment station of "direct" government and newfangled nostrums is distinctly "reactionary." So is Oregon, its only rival in the political patent medicine habit.

"Now it is Denver," says the New York Evening Post, "which discovers that commission government does not automatically bring on the millennium. How much depends on the men who work the machinery!" If we gave more time to the proper education of the children, the public officials of the future, and spent less time in devising new ways of making men virtuous by law, perhaps the State and municipal government of the next generation might be more satisfactory.

The first convention of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ met in New York on November 27, and continued in session for three days. This convention marks the beginning of a movement, the importance of which can hardly be overestimated. Up to within recent years, the convent schools basked in the sunshine of popular favor. The factors whose interest it was to attack the parochial school and the Catholic college, usually passed them by without remark. There is reason to believe that this attitude of aloofness is changing, and that the convent school will soon be subjected to sharp and unfriendly criticism. Criticism, our convent schools need not fear; but to defend themselves against the almost inevitable hostility which seems to govern the non-Catholic mind when it undertakes to review Catholic interests, organization is needed. The Federation represents nearly one thousand schools, academies and colleges in this country and Canada. The following ladies were chosen as officers for the coming year: President, Miss Clare I. Cogan, Brooklyn (St. Joseph's College, Emmitsburg, Md.); first vice-president, Mrs. R. F. Small, Toronto (St. Joseph's College, Toronto); second vice-president, Mrs. Frank Hahn, Dayton, O. (Notre Dame Academy, Dayton); corresponding secretary, Miss Hester Sullivan, Brooklyn (St. Elizabeth's College, Convent Station, N. J.); financial secretary, Miss Irene Cullen, Brooklyn (St. Joseph's Academy, Brentwood, L. I.); recording secretary, Mrs. John McEniry, Moline, Ill. (National Federation, Alumnæ, Sisters of Charity, B. V. M.); chairman, Press Committee, Miss Regina Fisher, Philadelphia (Mt. St. Joseph's Collegiate Institute, Chestnut Hill, Pa.); chairman, Executive Committee, Mrs. James J. Sheeran, Brooklyn (St. Joseph's College, Emmitsburg, Md.). A constitution will be drawn up during the year and submitted at the next annual convention in Chicago in Thanksgiving week, 1915.

The following letter, found on the body of a young seminarian killed in the battle of the Marne, is published in the November issue of the Irish Rosary:

> 9th September, 1914, 5 o'clock in the evening.
>
> MY GOOD AND DEAR ONES: When you receive this letter, either your Daudau will have left for heaven, or some charitable Germans will have carried him from the battlefield. Towards half-past six o'clock yesterday morning, the 8th of September, while you were at Mass, according to the design of the Most Holy Providence, in the thick of the fight I was hit by a ball, which passed through my hip, and I fell. I am in the same place still, for, by a resemblance with my sweet Saviour Jesus, of which I am truly unworthy, I am veritably nailed to my cross, being unable to move my leg a single fraction. While I do not stir, my wound scarcely hurts me, but I suffer much from thirst. My mind is tranquil, and I feel at peace. With my crucifix before me, I await the will of the good God in prayer. You know that, before leaving, I offered up my life as a sacrifice, and I renewed this offering many times since yesterday morning. I renew it again now with whatever it may please God to add or take away. I do not fear death; I have seen it too near, as I see it at this moment: it has nothing of horror, for it brings happiness. As for yourselves, I implore of you that your grief be silent, resigned, and almost joyful. My great sorrow is to leave you; but I know that I shall meet you again soon. . . .



It is estimated that there are more than 20,000 priests and seminarians fighting in the French army. To many a soldier it will doubtless prove an eternal blessing to have beside him on the firing line a priest who can give him the last absolution. But that the consecrated hands of those whose vocation it is to minister at God's altar should be forced to shed blood does violence to every Catholic instinct.

The National Child Labor Commission, a private body, has published a record of important progress during the last ten years. In 1904, thirteen States had a fourteen-year limit, while in 1914 there are thirty-six such States. Factory inspection was provided in but thirteen States in 1904, and in thirty-four in 1914. In 1913, thirty-one States out of forty-two holding legislative sessions, enacted laws on the subject. The question of enforcing these laws is quite another matter, but as the New York Evening Post remarks, since public favor is strongly in favor of them, infractions must steadily become of less and less frequency, and the present generation may see the complete abolition of child labor. While an impartial enforcement may occasionally bear with especial severity upon poor families, it can hardly be denied that child labor, especially as practised in mines and mills, is a serious detriment, not only to the physical and moral welfare of the individual, but also to the State. "It must be remembered that the children of to-day are the future citizens of this Republic," said Mr. Gompers at the Philadelphia convention of the American Federation of Labor. "It is not a question of dollars and cents, nor of industrial supremacy, but of the future development of the race. If these children are going to take an active part in the civic and cultural life of the American people, they must find some other school than the factory." The practical solution of this question is not without serious difficulties. But no one interested in Catholic working boys and girls is disposed to deny that they are subjected to serious moral dangers in the mixed crowd of workers found in the modern shop or factory.

The Iowa State Council of the Knights of Columbus has issued a pamphlet, offering $25,000 reward for proof of the charges which have been made by certain "clergymen," frocked and unfrocked, against the Catholic Church and the Knights. This pamphlet, "A Protest and a Plea," is being circulated throughout the State, and marks the beginning of a general publicity campaign on behalf of the Order. As judges, the Knights are willing to accept "five ministers of non-Catholic churches, to be agreed upon and appointed by both parties." The pamphlet ends:

> Let us have the truth, and if those who make the charges can not earn this money, will they not in justice withdraw the charges which they have so often made? It is time to call a halt. We plead for, we demand, justice; no more, no less.

According to the newspapers, the era of hard times is approaching. Even those who live on the wages of shame, obtained very largely by defaming women, can not escape the financial stringency which is said to be imminent. The reward offered by the Knights comes as a windfall, for these "clergymen" can, of course, readily prove their charges against the "Romish" Church.

Globe-Wernicke
Sectional Bookcase

For Christmas, give a few Globe-Wernicke sections or many—the cost is small in comparison to the nobility of the tribute to the recipient's culture and intelligence. As time goes, and the book-collection grows, a Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcase goes on growing in accordance. This is the ideal arrangement for the Man at College as well as for the Alumnus. Styles and finishes to match all interiors.

Write for Globe-Wernicke Catalog R R 121, and a copy of "The World's Best Books."

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati

Mfrs. of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Wood and Steel), Steel Safes, Stationers' Supplies

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

THE VATICAN

ITS HISTORY—ITS TREASURES.

The Most Magnificent Book of Artistic Literary and Historical Interest ever Published
A Book of Perpetual Value and Universal Appeal
A Masterpiece of Beautiful Book Making

NOW READY

The only standard work in English giving the history of this most famous of palaces, a full description of its matchless apartments and collections, and an account of the papal administration. Written by the most celebrated group of Scholars and Connoisseurs who ever collaborated in such a work.

Beautifully Illustrated with Reproductions of the Most Sublime Artistic Creations of all time

The New York Times: "Rare wine deserves a goblet of crystal and the world's greatest treasure-house deserves to be described by scholars in a book beautiful to see. The book is indeed an exhaustive study of the Vatican in all its important historical, artistic and administrative details, written by an illustrious company of scholars, and the mechanical perfection of the book, with its large pages, its hundreds of rare photographs, its beautiful type, its sumptuous binding, is in accordance with the importance of its subject.

This book can no more be estimated at a glance, or characterized in a sentence, than can the Vatican itself. Its numerous splendid photographic illustrations, many of them subjects never before exposed to the camera, give it a unique place among the season's "picture books." And the clarity and scholarship of the text give it an educational value not easy to overestimate. It is indeed a veritable interpretation of the great soul of the Eternal City."

The Boston Transcript: "Nothing comparable to the generous quarto bearing the simple title 'The Vatican' has ever appeared. It is notable because of the constellation of authoritative writers who have contributed to its pages, because of its extraordinary array of illustrations, and because of the faultless style in which it is printed. The work is admirable, full of fascinating information, of fair and broad-minded criticisms, and of eloquent and elegant descriptions."

The New York Sun: "The book itself is a work of art. It will be wanted by all who have had the good fortune to see any part of the Vatican, and will serve to give those who have not some idea of the wonders it holds."

Contains almost 600 pages (12 inches x 9). One hundred views of the most important features of the Vatican. Over 450 reproductions of the world-famous treasures of art and science which have made the Vatican the great artistic and intellectual centre of the world. All the resources of printing have been exhausted to preserve the beauty and quality of the originals. The ornaments, initials and designs for the book have been taken from the decorations of the Vatican.

Binding—Embossing dies of exceptional beauty from Vatican subjects.

Limited number of specimen pages available.
Printed matter may be had on application.

Price, $10 Net—(Splendid buckram binding, in slip box).
Also two most beautiful editions de luxe in vellum and morocco at $15 and $25

THE LETTERS AND ARTS PUBLISHING CO., 1 West 34th St., New York

Please send me specimen pages of The Vatican—Its History—Its Treasures.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases

Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

A Gift That's Different

Not like the ordinary gift, which is soon forgotten,
but a constant and worthy reminder of the giver the whole year round

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have prepared an attractive Christmas card which will bear the giver's name and compliments. If you prefer to use your own card you may do so; kindly send same to us with your order.

A Gift That Lasts Till Xmas Comes Again

In sending AMERICA to your friends
you are doing three things:

First: You are presenting a pleasant surprise, something different, something worth while and something that lasts the whole year round.

Second: You become a "co-worker" in the cause, because no one can read AMERICA for a year without absorbing its spirit.

Third: You are demonstrating your pride in, and loyalty to an enterprise which has by hard work and perseverance won success, you are helping us—and do we not deserve it?

SINGLE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOUR YEARLY SUBSCRIPTIONS $10.00

Fill in below, names of parties to whom you wish to send AMERICA for one year and send order to us

CUT OFF HERE

NAME	STREET	CITY	STATE

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen; Enclosed find.....in payment for the above order

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

The Greatest Book Offer Ever Made

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE

offer for a limited time to those interested in this practical and progressive movement for the spread of CATHOLIC TRUTH, the opportunity of securing a set of the Knights of Columbus Edition of

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

at extraordinary low prices—which the Committee have secured by the manufacture of a large edition.

It is ever ready to answer your questions immediately, clearly and practically, so that you may turn your information into most effective use.

JAMES A. FLAHERTY,
Supreme Knight.

"The Typical Catholic Layman of America"

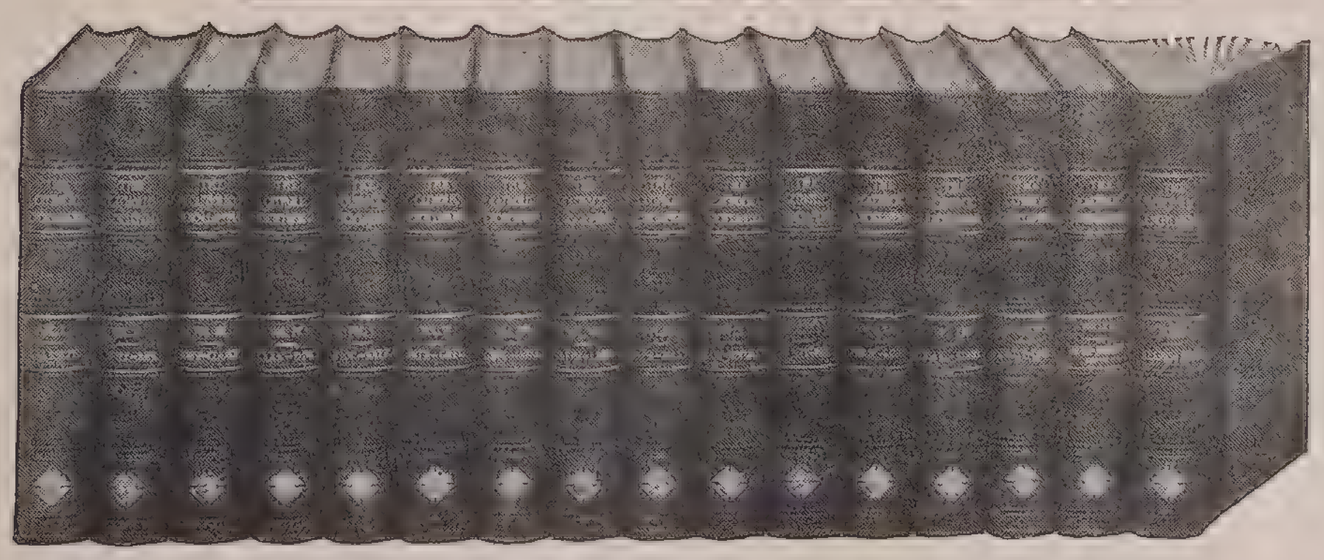
"An intelligent laity is the prime need of the Church to-day in America. The battle is opened. It is a flood of contradiction, of misrepresentations, of calumnies. History is perverted; Catholic doctrine is put into lying formulas, Catholic discipline is travestied. When the Church, as seen daily, cannot with safety be assailed, the appeal is to centuries of long ago, more unfamiliar to the reader—to remote lands whence no contradiction may come. The remedy is intelligence of all important matters concerning the Church at home and abroad, intelligence that Catholics be guarded from poisonous inoculation, and be, at the same time, in a position to influence public opinion in favor of truth and justice. The most ready arm is the press: hence the duty of the hour is to give generous support to the Catholic newspaper, to read it, to distribute it, supplementing it, as occasion permits, with magazine and book. One book, the summary of thousands, I especially recommend—The Catholic Encyclopedia."

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND

CARDINAL'S RESIDENCE

"I am in complete sympathy with every plan to multiply the number of sets of the Encyclopedia. It is the best Catholic literature we have, giving as it does the most correct authoritative statement of the Church's faith, history and practice, and we must have it in as many Catholic homes as we can.

"The Knights of Columbus have made it possible for many of our Catholic boys to attend the University at Washington. By publishing this special edition they will bring a "university in print" to the great Catholic body of their members and friends. Certainly in these days of systematic misrepresentation, we need a well-instructed and educated laity. The Encyclopedia will supply this want.



"It must be a great comfort to the Editors to see the influence of their great work gradually being widened, and to realize the blessing which the Church enjoys as a result of their untiring labors for the successful completion of the work."

✠ JOHN CARDINAL FARLEY, Apb. N. Y.

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS EDITION

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

14,000 Pages
25,000,000 Words
15,000 Leading Articles
350,000 Subjects
1,543 Writers
153 Revisers, Indexers, and Editorial Assistants

15 Color Plates
356 Full Page Halftones and Engravings
66 Original Maps
2,277 Illustrations in the Text

Fifteen Volumes, Royal Octavo, and Analytical Index Volume, One Half Leather.
Gold tops and Stamping in Gold on back of each volume.

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA—Knights of Columbus Edition

EASY PAYMENT PLAN

For Cloth binding, the subscriber sends $3.00 with the order, and the sum of $2 each 30 days thereafter until the full sum of $35 is paid.

For the ½ leather binding, the subscriber sends $5 with the order, and the sum of $3 each 30 days thereafter until the full sum of $55 is paid for the complete set.

CASH DISCOUNT PLAN

For the Cloth binding, the subscriber will remit $29 with the order, or on receipt of books.

For the ½ leather binding, the subscriber will remit $49 with the order, or on receipt of books.

FOR CANADA AND PROVINCES—To the above prices add $3.00 per set to cover Customs, Brokerage.

THE GIFT OF ALL GIFTS.

For your Home — For your Parish School
For your Pastor — For your local Library

The Knights of Columbus edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia is printed from the same plates as the original edition—contains the same text matter, all the maps, all the text, and full-page illustrations—the only difference being this edition has fewer colored plates.

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE AM 12-12-14
216 East Fortieth Street, New York City

Please send me the new Knights of Columbus Edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 volumes, bound in ..... for which I enclose payment of .....

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

THESE PRICES OFFERED ONLY FOR A LIMITED TIME

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NOW READY, NUMBER 23

Americans should realize how cruelly Mexican Catholics are being persecuted. The current number of CATHOLIC MIND tells you. A paper on is contributed by a leading member of the Catholic party. Affidavits follow from those who have witnessed outrages committed against religion. A selection of "reformers'" decrees is given, and then comes a letter from Pope Benedict XV to the Archbishop of Mexico. Here is an opportunity to learn the truth about Mexico.

MEXICAN LIBERALISM

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Eethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan John A. Cotter, S.J.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

CHRISTMAS GIFT

Why not present your Pastor or favorite convent and academy with the best picture published of our Holy Father Benedict XV?

For $5.00, we will send you, express prepaid, a 16 x 20 picture in colors, taken on the day of the coronation, framed either in all gilt or circassian and gilt. Prelates who know, say it is perfect. References the best.

RITA PUBLISHING CO.,
120 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

Short Letter One to Rosary Sellers

Our Goods are stamped with name and thickness and fineness of gold; thus: Vatti 1/20 12k (1/20 12k means 10 ozs. base metal to 1 oz. 12 karat gold).

And money back if not satisfactory.

Besides it is $3 to $5 a dozen under the market.

The above $2 to $3 retail; solid 10k gold, $14 to $16; and others, $10 to $14; thinner plate, $1 to $2.

Write to Vatti Rosary Co., 106 Fulton street, New York, for full particulars.

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL from house to house THE BEST PICTURE OF POPE BENEDICT XV PUBLISHED—four-colored process half-tone from authorized photographs; sells on sight; big commission; every Catholic family wants one. Send fifty cents for sample and canvass.

RITA PUBLISHING CO.,
120 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass.

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

NOTE THE SIMPLICITY

Of making perfect duplicates with the Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator. No intricate mechanism. No printer's ink. Always ready. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Useful in any business. Sent on Ten Days' Trial Without Deposit. Complete Duplicator, cap size, (prints 8 3-4x13 inches). Contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back duplicating surface which can be used over and over again. $5.00
Circular of larger sizes free on request.
Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John St., New York.

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

COWARD EXTENSION HEEL

Originated 34 years ago, by James S. Coward, for the relief of weak ankles and fallen arches.

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

AT LAST!

Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst
"A Child Can Fold Them"

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

Appropriate for CHRISTMAS GIVING

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES

to any part of the world

For $3.50 Postpaid

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages.

The America Press

59 East 83d Street, New York

Schools and Colleges

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Ky.

NEWMAN SCHOOL

HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory BOARDING SCHOOL FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

Georgetown University

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary

HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the MOTHER SUPERIOR

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.

Select School for Girls

Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

AN OPPORTUNITY

FOR

SCHOOLS and COLLEGES

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine Fordham.

School of Pharmacy Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest.

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

SETON HILL SCHOOL

SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE

FOR YOUNG LADIES

Asheville, N. C.

Located in the "Land of the Sky," 2,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.

For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

Now Ready

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

BENZIGER BROTHERS

ESTABLISHED 1792

Christmas Shopping

RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
PRAYER BOOKS
CATHOLIC BOOKS CHURCH GOODS
VESTMENTS
STATUARY
ETC., ETC.

BENZIGER BROTHERS

NEW YORK 36-38 Barclay St. | CINCINNATI 343 Main St. | CHICAGO 214-216 W. Monroe St.

STUDIO AND WORKS, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

You are Particular

You demand those added little refinements that turn necessities into luxuries—that mean the difference between "Existing" and "Living."

You desire real cleanliness in your surroundings—not merely the appearance of it.

This is why

Excelsior Quilting Mattress Protectors

will appeal to you.

This excellent device protects your mattress and thus adds to its life. It makes your sleeping hours more restful, your bed more sanitary.

Excelsior pads are expertly made in a modern factory from antiseptically clean white wadding incased in heavy bleached muslin and quilted both sides by our patented machinery.

These pads are washable and will dry as clean, soft and white as new.

There is a size for every bed or crib.

Look for this trade mark. Avoid "Seconds" or "Just as Good" pads sold under other labels.

MATTRESS PROTECTOR REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. EXCELSIOR TRADE MARK WASHABLE

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street - - New York, N. Y.

Send for our circular showing all the different styles and sizes of Crib Sets.

Our figures are finely sculptured and artistically finished.

Nativity Group, with Panoramic Scene of Bethlehem. Made entirely of stone composition, beautifully decorated in oil tints. Size, 8′ x 5′8″ x 3′2″. Price, Rich Decoration, $165.00; Extra Rich, $185.00.

THE BERNARDINI STATUARY CO.

28 Barclay Street New York City

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 10
WHOLE No. 297

DECEMBER 19, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Dec. 8, p. m.-Dec. 15, a. m.—General Situation in the East—The Attack on Warsaw—Servia—Destruction of German Fleet. France: Mobilization of the Allied Forces. Germany: Items of Interest. Great Britain: Preparing for Invasion. Ireland: Repressive Measures — Chaplaincies. Italy: Internal Affairs. Mexico: A Priest's Fate—Extortion—An Interesting Letter.....233-236

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Christmas—A Modern Storm Centre—Sex and the War—Men of God and Men of Men—The Midnight Office of Christmas.....237-242

COMMUNICATIONS

Midnight Mass for Peace—The Italian Question—A Practical Suggestion—Do We Lack Leadership? 243-245

EDITORIALS

A Christmas Greeting—The Italian Question—"The Least of These"—A Plea for Reparation—Christmas Home-Coming — Peacemakers — To Rage or Not to Rage.....246-249

LITERATURE

A Greek Schoolmaster Still Teaching.

REVIEWS:—Frémont and '49—Through the Brazilian Wilderness—Belshazzar Court—Rambles in Catholic Lands—Henri Bergson—Seven Years on the Pacific Slope.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:—"Children of the Kingdom"—"Legends of King Arthur and His Knights"—"Vexilla Regis"—A New Book on the Kaiser—"The Copy Cat"—"Within My Parish"—"And So They Were Married"—"What Think You of Christ?"—The Catholic Young Man in Literature.

BOOKS RECEIVED 249-253

EDUCATION

Immoral Morals 253, 254

SOCIOLOGY

Not Divine Enough.....254-256

NOTE AND COMMENT

Social Work of the New York Ozanam Association—"Impartial" War News—Bravery of the Catholic Sisters on the Battlefields—Minnesota Minimum Wage Law Unconstitutional.....256

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—All along the line from Flanders to Alsace there has been on both sides renewed activity, but with the exception of some slight gains by the Allies between Ypres and Dixmude and north of St. Mihiel the general situation is what it was a week ago. The difficulty of making it out is increased by the conflicting reports from Paris and Berlin. The advantage on the whole, however, seems to rest with the Allies. It is rather widely thought that their recent offensive movements have been directed mainly toward testing the strength of the German positions. These are apparently very strong in the centre. More impression has been made at the wings. There is, therefore, a growing belief that at the wings the Allies will soon begin a strong offensive. This would fall principally to the share of the British in Belgium, and would aim at the recovery of the coast. At the other end of the line it would fall to the French, who have already pushed forward both to the north and south of St. Mihiel far enough seriously to endanger the line of communications between that place and Metz. At Deuxnouds, in particular, they have forced the Germans back two miles, and a little further advance would necessitate the abandonment of St. Mihiel, which they have fought desperately for many weeks to retain. Both sides, however, are so strongly entrenched that gains must be very slow and costly. Immense sacrifices of life must be made before any general advance can be made.

Bulletin, Dec. 8, p. m.-Dec. 15, a. m.

In the east the situation is rather complicated. In East Prussia the Russians are still on the offensive from Gumbinnen to Johannisburg, but their progress is very slow. The fighting has settled down to trench warfare and has shifted its position very little during the week. In Galicia also the Russians are making efforts to press forward, and according to reports have successfully withstood a vigorous attack by the Austrians south of Cracow. They have not, however, advanced during the past eight days, and although hopeful of soon being able to begin their assault on Cracow, have not yet been able to do so. But the advantage lies with them at least in this sense that the efforts of the Austro-German armies to force them to retire from Cracow in order to save Warsaw have so far failed. After three weeks of bloody fighting the Russians are still holding their ground in Poland, and the great sacrifices of life that have been made by the Germans with the purpose of crushing the Russian centre have produced but little effect. The campaign, however, is by no means settled, and the movements that are now on foot may lead to considerable changes in the near future.

General Situation in the East

The main interest of the whole war centres about Warsaw. The Germans are striving to reach it from three directions. One German army starting from Soldau has fought its way down from the north as far as Przasnysz, and is officially reported to be in possession of the city. The capture of this city brings it to a point considerably east of Warsaw, but, of course, still much to the north. It would seem that its purpose is to pass by Novo Georgievsk and to get to the rear of the Polish capital. Its advance, however, appears to have been somewhat checked, because it is said to have been pierced in several places between Pryzasnysz and Ciechanow. The presence of this army on the right flank of the Russians is expected to prevent a recurrence of the turning movement by the Russians of the German left wing, which began at Novo Georgievsk the recent retreat from central Poland. This army is operating on the northern side of the Vistula.

The Attack on Warsaw

Another army is trying to advance on Warsaw from the west and southwest. This army, it will be remembered, marched down from Thorn on the southern side of the river Vistula as far as Plock and then turned south and later east, breaking through the Russian centre below Lodz, and so getting to the rear of the Russians. This sensational move failed and proved very costly, for it left the Germans almost surrounded. Eventually they cut their way out by the bayonet. Having been reenforced from Wielun, and especially from Kalisz, this German army was drawn out into a jagged line, and for the past week has been making great efforts to seize Petrikau with its railroad communications, and also to advance on Warsaw from Lowicz on the west and from Lodz on the southwest. In the first attempt it has failed, but in the second it has had some success. The Russians are reported to have fallen back before it from Lodz and from Lowicz, to a position nearer the Vistula. In fact, some reports have placed the Germans within fifteen miles of Warsaw. Further south in Poland the Austrians are striving to advance on Kielce, but apparently without success; and still further south in west Galicia they have been endeavoring to outflank the extreme Russian left below Cracow. Neither has this move had any success beyond relieving the situation in Hungary; for it seems that the Russians, in order to strengthen their resistance in Galicia, have found it necessary to recall their troops from across the Carpathians.

If the reports from Servia are not exaggerated the Austrians have been driven from Belgrade. It is claimed at Nish that they have been completely routed and are in retreat, and that 28,000 of them were captured, besides many guns and stores. There has been nothing in the way of official confirmation by Vienna of the report except a very guarded statement to the effect that a partial reverse had been met with. It is certain, however, that there has been a remarkable reversal of the situation, and that the third Austrian invasion of Servia has fared no better than the other two.

Servia

The German squadron, which defeated and partially destroyed the British fleet under Admiral Cradock off the coast of Chile, has in turn met with disaster. For some time it has been foreseen that its ultimate destruction was inevitable. As many as seventy cruisers have been on its trail, and if the five German cruisers had succeeded in escaping the British, in all probability they would have fallen into the hands of the combined Japanese and Australian fleets. They were overtaken by Vice-Admiral Sturdee off the Falkland Islands early on the morning of December 8, and after a long engagement the Scharnhorst, Gneisenau and Leipsic were sunk. The Nürnberg made off during the fight, but was overhauled and also sunk. The fate of the Dresden is still in doubt; it seems certain, however, that unless she is interned, she will soon be destroyed. The German losses were large, whereas the British had practically no casualties. The victory almost clears the seas of German cruisers. The Karlsruhe and several converted cruisers are still at large. In the Dardanelles the Turkish battleship Messudieh was sunk by a British submarine on December 13.

Destruction of German Fleet

France.—According to a correspondent, the impression is gaining ground among the French people that Germany has shot her bolt. By reason of a superior military system, Germany was able to put large armies in the field at the outbreak of the war, thereby securing a numerical superiority. This initial advantage, in the opinion of the French leaders, is being gradually overcome. Territorial troops to the number of a million and a half have been in training for the last four months, and are now ready to take their place with the older troops. With the new contingent of 1915 brought into condition, France will soon have nearly two million fresh troops on the firing line. England is pouring hundreds of thousands of men into France, and has more than a million and a half under training. The Allies are thus increasing in strength daily, say the French. They also point out that, by calling for recruits from seventeen to twenty and from forty-five to sixty years of age, Germany shows clearly that she has reached the limits of mobilization. In spite of this reassuring view of the case, French military critics frankly admit that, since nearly two million German soldiers still occupy a number of French Departments, an early peace can not be looked for. In their opinion, the war will last much longer than optimistic Parisian editors are disposed to allow, especially since the peace that France looks for, the only peace which France with her allies will accept, is the peace that means the destruction of what in France and England is termed "Prussian militarism."

Mobilization of the Allied Forces

Germany.—In the beginning of the week Germans were disconcerted over the reports of the serious illness of the Kaiser. As usual the first news was alarming. The dispatches named pneumonia as the disease; after a few days, however, the sickness was pronounced bronchial catarrh, and now the Emperor is declared convalescent but under obligation to remain indoors for rest. The people are as determined as ever in regard to the war; no doubt their determination is strengthened by the boasting of their enemies, who have, in their speeches, partitioned Germany into many sections and distributed them more liberally than prudently to various nations.

Items of Interest

During the week there was some discussion about peace through arbitration. Though the discussion was purely speculative, yet it was evident from its tenor that the United States would not be entirely acceptable to Germany as arbitrator. This attitude is due to the fact that the Germans are doubtful of our impartiality, declaring that America has been friendly to Great Britain and is therefore open to suspicion. Private letters received from Germany continue to express admiration for the manner in which the Germans are making sacrifices and for their courtesy to prisoners, especially to the wounded.

Great Britain.—The rumors of an invasion by the German forces seem to have been occasioned by the "practice mobilization" at strategic lines on the south and east coasts, conducted by the Government some weeks ago. In these localities, thousands of laborers have been digging trenches and constructing other defensive works, and the railways have been prepared to move large bodies of men and heavy guns, promptly and rapidly. It is also said that both the Government and the inhabitants of the seacoast counties are actively making ready to meet an invasion of hostile troops. General Sir Ian Hamilton is in command of the Home Army of some four hundred thousand men. Should necessity demand it, these forces could be augmented by part of the "Kitchener Army" and such colonial troops as might be in the country. In a published interview, General Baden-Powell said that he fully believed that it was Germany's intention to invade England at the first favorable occasion, attacking the northern cities rather than London. "Once let the Germans get hold of the manufacturing towns and industrial centres, factories would be ruined and the enemy could throw fourteen million people out of employment, rendering them destitute and starving. But even by a short, sharp raid, they could do a tremendous amount of damage." General Baden-Powell is not disposed to take an over-optimistic view of the war. "We receive encouraging reports that we are doing well," he remarks, "but we must remember that one side or the other must go under, and go under forever. The wind seems to be blowing in our favor at present, but there is always the unexpected to consider. The right thing to do is to smash the enemy now, and this means that every Englishman must do his part here and now."

Preparing for Invasion

Ireland.—In reply to some Irish peers, who complained that the Government was too lenient with the Irish papers that were discouraging recruiting, Lord Wimborne said Ireland was unfairly criticized in the matter, as it had always contributed to army and navy much more than its proportion. The delay in putting Home Rule on the statute book had cooled Nationalist ardor, but Mr. Redmond and the Irish Party were doing their best to kindle it. Sein Fein and Irish Freedom have been since suppressed, the circulation of Ireland and the Leader, whose cautions against disproportionate enlistment are quite legal, has been greatly hampered, adherents of the Irish Volunteers have been dropped from official positions, and warrants have been issued for the arrest of several local leaders who are suspected of pro-German proclivities. Apparently there is considerable divergence of view from that of the Nationalist dailies, which are replicas of the English press. Nationalist Volunteers have enlisted numerously in Belfast, but not many have done so elsewhere.

Repressive Measures

Having secured some satisfaction regarding Catholic chaplaincies in the Army, the Irish Catholic is carrying on an agitation for similar redress in the Navy, which has only one official Catholic chaplain to some two hundred Protestant chaplains. The Admiralty's reply that the sailors are free to get spiritual service when they make port is not satisfactory. It is insisted that the Catholic sailors must have service on board like the non-Catholics. While this dispute was going on the Kaiser applied to Rome for Catholic chaplains for the Irish prisoners of war in Germany. Two Irish priests, a Dominican and an Augustinian, were sent by the Holy Father.

Chaplaincies

Italy.—The officials of the country still continue in a state of agitation over the Hobeida affair, which reduced to its simplest form amounts to this, that the Turks invaded the Italian consulate of Hobeida, seized the English Consul, who had taken refuge there, and put him aboard a ship, which sailed away for a destination not yet revealed to Italy or England. Italy insists (1) that the captive must be released; (2) that reparation must be made for the outrage; (3) that Turkey must offer a formal apology; (4) that indemnity be paid for the wounding of an Italian during the scrimmage. The incident, though small in itself, can easily lead to serious consequences. Passions are running high, and many of the Italians are shouting for war. Private letters from Italy, written by persons supposedly well qualified to judge of the Government's real attitude toward the war, are contradictory. One correspondent writes that Italy is determined to remain neutral, limiting her activities to an offer for mediation, should a favorable opportunity arise. A second correspondent is equally sure that Italy will go to war in spring, and not on the side of the Allies. In view of this confusion of opinion it is obviously impossible to tell where the truth lies. On one point there seems to be agreement, to wit: the people on the whole appear to be anti-German in sentiment. Whether this is spontaneous or factitious is not clear. However, the radical papers are losing no chance to inspire hatred for the Kaiser. L'Asino has printed vile cartoons linking the Kaiser with the Pope. It is to be hoped that these tactics will not embroil the already afflicted nation in new difficulties. The war has had a most serious effect on the universities and the colleges. The number of students in attendance at the Gregorian is sadly diminished and the Biblical Institute has suffered both in students and professors.

Internal Affairs

Mexico.—This affidavit is typical of others narrating the murder of priests or brothers:

A Priest's Fate

On the afternoon of June 23, at six o'clock, the Federal forces ceased to resist the Constitutionalists and by seven o'clock the Federalists had evacuated the city, and at this time too, the Constitutionalists under Villa took possession of the place. A little later a group of Constitutionalist soldiers went to the house of Inocenco Lopez Velarde, a priest of the diocese, and took him away. On the following day the Father's body was found . . . i. e. on June 24, in the alley of Barro, which is crossed by a stream, about one kilometer from the Father's house. The body when found was naked with the Father's cassock thrown over it. After the body had been taken to the Father's house two bullets were found on the body and also a knife wound; the corpse was put into a coffin and no priest was allowed to see it. I sent two priests to the house, but they were stopped by Constitutionalist soldiers and not allowed to enter.

Thus the priests were slaughtered by the triumphant Constitutionalists.

The following is a description of the way in which the Constitutionalists extorted money from their victims:

Extortion

At 12 o'clock, twenty-three priests being gathered at the headquarters, Colonel Beytra came and said: "General Villa asks of you 1,000,000 pesos; if this sum is not turned in by to-morrow, all of you will be shot." We answered that this was an impossible request and that we were prepared to die. At 12 o'clock that night, i. e. June 25, Major Villareal came and asked me: "Who is your assistant?" I answered that I had none. "Then appoint one," said the Major. I appointed one. Then the Major said: "Both of you follow me." He took us to the guard house and told us: "You are going to be shot because you will not give the money." . . . Major Villareal turned us over to five mounted soldiers who took us to a hill called Cerro del Capulino. . . . I was then asked "What kind of death do you prefer, to be hanged or shot?" . . . Then an officer said to one of the soldiers "Give me your rifle. How many bullets are there in it?" The soldier answered, "Two." "Well, I think two are enough," replied the officer.

The affidavit then enters into details unfit to print and proceeds to relate how, after pretending to shoot one of the Canons, the Constitutionalists sent the priests through the city to beg, several days in succession. After they had collected nearly 100,000 pesos they were submitted to indignities and then exiled. They describe their exile, in part, as follows:

From the moment we entered the coach until we reached Torreon, we were regaled with vile and filthy language and a phonograph playing La Paloma, etc. This coach was a very large one, having been built for military purposes: in this car, they carried the booty pillaged from houses, viz.: pianos, fine pictures, etc. . . . On the night of July 4 all the officers on the train got drunk and then insulted us with vile language, with horrible blasphemies more terrible than I had ever heard before. They ceased only when one of the officers shouted: "Shut up, lest the picture hanging here on the wall fall on me." On Sunday, July 5, we reached Torreon and were turned over to the guard of the barracks of Villa's second brigade. We were kept in the guard-house of the barracks and made to sleep on the earthen floor which was covered with vermin. There were twenty of us, Mexicans, all except one, who was a Spaniard, lying on the foul floor of this small room, about 16 by 16 feet. We were awakened during the night by some women walking over us—who had to pass through this room to get to the officers who were in an adjoining room. During the time we were in this place the soldiers never thought of giving us food, but we received both food and clothes from some people of Torreon who brought these things to us of their own accord. . . . On the following day, i. e. July 10, at two o'clock in the afternoon, we left for the central station, where we were shown to a second-class coach in which were fourteen Christian Brothers. I will add that two Christian Brothers had been killed in Zacatecas. I know this to be certain because while I was in prison in Zacatecas a gentleman, Ricardo Vega, told me that he, himself, had gone to remove the bodies of the Brothers and also the body of his uncle, Father Pascual Vega, who was chaplain of the college. Before leaving Zacatecas, I did not know under whose direction these men were murdered, but now, since I have come to El Paso, I have been advised by letter that the deed was done by command of General Urbina of the Constitutionalist party, who is intimately associated with General Villa.

Asked: Did these officers who exiled you from your country accuse you of anything against the laws, or of helping in any way the cause of the Federalists? Answer: We were accused of nothing. Since we are here, however, we have heard we were accused of helping the Federalists.

A few days ago the editor received this illuminating letter from Buffalo:

An Interesting Letter

Tierney:

Everybody knows that has read the Mexico news that you are talking for the Catholic Church. To-night, Riverside Court G. O. Liberty is sending check for $76.00 to Gen. Villa to help drive the Catholic Church out of Mexico. Get the Menace and wake up. From A MASON, ODD FELLOW and ORANGEMAN.

Owing to the constructive mind of their leader, General Miles, now living on a pension from the United States Government, the Guardians of Liberty have begun to show some new signs of intelligence. They write their letters in red ink instead of lead pencil, as formerly, and have given over the defence of their "sacred liberties" for the extirpation of the Church in Mexico. General Miles is to be congratulated on his exalted influence and beneficent work for civilization and himself.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Christmas

OVER the whole world, with its sins and its sorrows, its treasons and its infidelities, its self-seeking and its self-indulgence, there descends each succeeding Christmas a brooding sense of well-being that is not of the world's seeking nor of the world's making, but is the pure gift of God, His reminder of the ineffable condescension and the unutterable goodness of the Incarnate Son of God. Each December, as the old year lies dying, down from heaven to earth with the Christ Child there comes unseen and unappreciated, but all pervading, the peace, the blessed, priceless peace of Christ's nativity.

The world, it is true, is no longer in any true sense a Christian world, it is out of sympathy with the doctrines and aspirations of Christ. Christmas does not mean for the majority of men what it meant for their fathers and grandfathers. To their shame, be it said, the Babe of Bethlehem awakens but a feeble response in their sense-bound, self-centred lives. The world has paganized the whole celebration of Christmas, it has thrown a veil over its supernatural character, it has not made ready for the coming of the Lord; and as far as it is concerned, the holy night will come and the holy day will go unheeded.

And yet even the cold heart of the world loses some of its chill on Christmas morning. The sunshine of the presence of Jesus thaws the world's icy rigor, and its soul comes forth from the prison of selfishness, and for a day, at least, is more like the heart of the Saviour. It has not, indeed, the fulness of the glories of God-given Christmas peace, only to men of good-will has this been promised, but it has, nevertheless, a taste of its sweetness. For the gift of peace is so bountiful that it overflows from the Church out into the four quarters of the earth. On Christmas morning Christ does not insist too literally on the meaning of good will; even in those who are not right with God. He finds something at least of what He demands. He seems to look less to men's sins than to their good deeds, less to their malice than to their frailty. And so in His great goodness He gives even to them some of the great joy that He gives to His friends. Even Christ's enemies are happier at Christmas than at any other time of the year. They are happy because all men are happy at Christmas, and all men are happy at Christmas, because Christmas is Christ's birthday and Christ is the brother of all men.

Everywhere there is joy on Christmas day. It is a time when the heart forgets its envy and kindles with kindness, when bitterness turns to ashes and the embers of charity flame forth afresh, when sympathy and gentleness and compassion soothe and chasten the spirit. The influence of Christianity is still too strong for those who would drive the Infant Jesus from the world. Even those who hate Him are better for His coming. In spite of sin and wickedness Bethlehem's cave still stirs the souls of men. And yet it is not only tidings of great joy that it tells, it has another message of great importance that it speaks to all mankind.

"God so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son." Was He to allow the recollection of His gift to fade from the hearts of men? Christ's birth was one of the Father's greatest mercies. Was it to be permitted to slip from the memory except of a faithful few? Was the incarnation and nativity of the Word made Flesh so slight a thing that it might be lightly forgotten? Was Mary to be regarded merely as a Jewish woman and her Son only as a Jewish child, both beautiful, but only a woman and a child and nothing more? No, Mary was the Mother of God, and her Son was God Himself; Mary's maternity and Christ's nativity were most stupendous acts of God's bounty, acts of untold consequence to all mankind. And God has taken good care that they shall be remembered.

Christmas joy is the means God has employed to remind men that for us men and for our salvation His only Son came down from heaven, was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary, in all things like unto ourselves save sin. Christmas joy is man's tribute to the new-born King, his homage to the Infant Saviour, his heart's silent protest against the forgetfulness of the mind and the blasphemy of the tongue, it is nature's thanksgiving for the Messias. Deeds speak louder than words; and so it is, that although some lips deny Him and some ears are closed to His message, all hearts proclaim Him. Christmas smiles are the reflection of the smiles of Christ, Christmas greetings are echoes of the good tidings spoken by the angels, Christmas happiness is the undying memorial written in the souls of men of Christ's birth according to the flesh. The nativity of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity in human form has been inscribed on tablets more lasting than stone; and it has been done in a way that only the infinite kindness of the all-wise God could have devised. For just as the tidings of peace to men of good-will rang through the world on the first Christmas night, so their echo rings through the world on each succeeding anniversary; and men's hearts, be they sinless or sinful, vibrate in answer to its message. Christmas joy is God's Christmas gift to the world, His reminder of the birthday of His Son.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

A Modern Storm Centre

THE question of the union between Church and State has long been a storm centre of far more than ordinary disturbance. Few comprehend the right meaning of this term. Fewer still understand its practical application. Even intelligent and educated men, who are amused, if not positively angered, at the misconceptions and ludicrous panics to which it has given rise, are often themselves misled by false interpretations which are palpably false. It is necessary, therefore, to begin by setting aside the wrong notions which have gathered about this idea in the popular mind and which have led to the conclusion, probably often heard by the reader, "I am opposed to Catholicism because it favors the union of Church and State."

To offset at the very outset all possible misapprehension, it may be well to premise at once that this union, as understood by the Holy See, is not an issue at all agitated or promoted on the part of Catholics, whether clerical or lay, in the United States. The confusion which exists regarding this subject is entirely due to error or else to that ceaseless propaganda of calumny carried on with wilful malice against the Catholic Church. Putting aside, therefore, this first misconception we can consider in a fairer spirit of impartiality the false ideas connected in the minds of many sincere and well-meaning men with the present subject.

The most complete and ideal union of Church and State, such as is possible in a thoroughly Catholic country, would not imply, as is commonly supposed, any elements prejudicial to democracy. There is no preference expressed by the Church for one form of government over another. Empire, monarchy, or republic, all meet with her approval, in as far as they keep in view that common good for which social authority is constituted. In his letter, Au Milieu des Sollicitudes, Pope Leo XIII thus defined the attitude of the Church:

> In this order of speculative ideas, Catholics, like all other citizens, are free to prefer one form of government to another, precisely because no one of these social forms is, in itself, opposed to the principles of sound reason or to the maxims of Christian doctrine. What amply justifies the wisdom of the Church is that in her relations with political powers she abstracts from the forms of government, which differentiate nations and treats with them concerning religious interests. To undertake their instruction is her supreme duty in their regard.

From this it may already be evident that union between Church and State is not rooted, as is commonly believed, in the desire of the Church to dominate the State. It is this constant suspicion which causes men to give an evil construction to every defence of the Church's inherent rights, on the part of Catholics. The doctrine of the union between the Catholic Church and civil society as the ideal condition of Christian civilization is interpreted by them as a universal ambition for political power in which the Catholics of every country are presumed to share. In the letter already quoted Pope Leo writes:

> It is maintained that the vigor of action which Catholics are taught to display in their defence of the faith has for a secret motive much less the safeguarding of their religious interests than the ambition of securing to the Church political domination over the State. Truly this is the revival of a very ancient calumny, as its invention must be ascribed to the first enemies of Christianity. Was it not first formulated against the adorable person of the Redeemer?

Nothing could be further from the mind of the Church and more abhorrent to her than stirring up insurrection and revolution, or even lessening by a grain in the balance the loyalty due to the State. Yet this is precisely the crime of which she is accused, in spite of her constant insistence upon obedience to all lawfully constituted authority and her unvarying lesson of rendering to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. From a thousand forums of public thought over the face of the earth, our own country not excepted, there still rises that cry which nineteen centuries ago was first heard in the court of Pilate: "We have found this man perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar." And for those who would see that justice is done us, without favor or partiality, there comes the bitter warning: "If thou release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend!" So again and again, on through centuries, the sentence of Pilate is passed. Christ is crucified anew in His members. What happened of old in the court of the Roman Governor has taken place to-day in Portugal and Mexico, and will be repeated to-morrow elsewhere. If Christ was condemned to death on this specious charge, it was inevitable that his followers would fare no better. "Dangerous citizens, factionists, enemies of the Empire and the Emperors" were the names given, we are told, to the early Christians by their pagan contemporaries, the Roman Guardians of Liberty.

All this is true; but it is likewise our greatest consolation and our glory. Let the enemies of Christ inscribe it at the head of their chapter of accusations against us: "The Catholics of the twentieth century are one with their brethren of the first." We are one with them in persecution as in faith.

The fact that the Church condemns the untenable proposition, "The Church must be separated from the State, and the State from the Church," does not imply even the slightest desire on her part, as is popularly supposed, of interfering in secular matters from political motives. Her right at any time or in any place is due to the moral and religious interests that may be involved in the issue. It is only because of the welfare of souls, as the ultimate reason, that she can and must speak out, counsel and command. Where souls are in danger there is question no longer of purely political or economic issues. Spiritual principles are at stake. In these she is the ultimate authority. For this purpose Christ has instituted her. "It was not to Cæsar," as Pope Leo XIII so conclusively says, "but to Peter that Jesus Christ entrusted the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Union between the Church and State, where such is possible, merely simplifies and ensures the more perfect fulfilment of the task Christ conferred upon her. Her attitude of non-interference in purely civic matters, on the other hand, is clearly expressed in the encyclical of the same Pontiff, on the "Chief Duties of Christians as Citizens":

> It is plainly evident that the governing powers are wholly free to carry out the business of the State; and this not only not against the wish of the Church, but manifestly with her co-operation, inasmuch as she strongly urges to the practice of piety, which implies right feeling toward God, and by that very fact inspires a right-mindedness toward the rulers of the State.

It is not the purpose of the present article to describe in detail the true nature of the union between Church and State. This calls for separate consideration. One thing alone has been made clear, that the accusations directed against Catholics because of the principles supposed to be involved in this union are entirely unfounded, in fact and in theory. They are all summed up in the charges on which Christ was condemned to death: for "saying that He is Christ, the King." That kingship He fully but vainly explained, is spiritual and not earthly. "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and to God the things that are God's." Such was the doctrine of Christ, and such is the doctrine of His Church for individuals and for society alike. That the things of God may be more completely given to God is the only reason why she has ever called upon the State for assistance. She in turn urged that the things of Cæsar should be given unto Cæsar. This is the only principle involved in the union of Church and State, the principle laid down by Christ.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Sex and the War

IN some respects the European engagement resembles a medicine: unpleasant to mankind's taste, but curative of serious ailment. The world outside the Church has, of late years, been moving in a most extravagant orbit. What happened to queenly old Rome was, up till less than a half-dozen months ago, being reenacted in Europe's modern domains, to say nothing of America. With money plentiful, physical weakness had been eagerly and generally purchased. Common peril lacking, common interest broke down into private. The science of selfishness, the logical corollary of which has always been the decadence of the State, glittered as the most popular of studies. To be sure, bubbles of Socialism not infrequently floated aloft; but, as bubbles will, they invariably burst.

Sexes, especially during the last decade, have been largely interchanging qualities. For woman wanted something more than the honor which, since the era of Christianity, has been hers; that is, power. Man desired something more than the power which, since the dawn of creation, has been his; that is, ease. In gaining power, woman greatly forfeited her dignity; by wallowing in ease, man deplorably wasted his power. Catholic women have not been parties to this movement. To them, thank God, the following paragraphs have little application. Nor is this article an indictment of the general body of non-Catholic women. Yet the strictures here passed are sufficiently warranted, no doubt, to deserve consideration.

The first hideous offspring of the interchanged qualities was a vast increase of race-suicide. Blinded by her aspirations, woman regarded maternity as servitude, and consequently snapped its tender chains. Statistics startled us a few years ago, presaging, as they solemnly did, dire national calamities in Europe. Man's virility could have stemmed the appalling condition; it was absent.

The second result was a no less alarming augment in divorce. Woman had become too self-assertive to submit to hymeneal bonds that chafed; man, too enervated to fasten his affections in a single place. If the growth of race-suicide endangered the home, that of divorce destroyed it. And without the home a people's prosperity can not be reared.

Next came a daring exposé of the truths of sex. The world was deluged with abominable literature. Woman's so-called emancipation had filled her with a poise and swagger which made her forget the delicate art of blushing. She could stomach much, and was not averse to testing her capacity with a little more. She craved power; knowledge is such. So she strained at no bit of information, however unsavory. Her uncouth zeal served to keep plays, which would make the pagan compositions of Terence and Plautus sound almost virtuous, pouring their iniquity into urban life for whole seasons. A press denunciation of a drama's immorality was sufficient guarantee for a record-attendance, largely female. And, while thus pandering to the sordid elements of nature, woman justified herself by hotly declaring that sores must be uncovered if they are ever to be cured. Sotto voce, it is noticeable that very little healing has been effected. Reliable physicians, forsooth, are old-fashioned enough to advise that sores be bandaged.

The logic of making the world more wholesome by filling it with stories of vice was decidedly poor. Better by far the "blindness of virtue," depicted by Cosmo Hamilton, than the glare of sin!

Woman's voice could have easily stopped the sexological expositions; feminine modesty, however, had become so weak that the feminine tongue strongly encouraged them. As for man, he had lost his chivalry to such an extent that he frankly licensed these obscenities to swarm in the female ear.

Emboldened by such a public airing of their lack of the virtue of their grandmothers, women went farther. Having once defied convention, they proceeded to demolish and rebuild it on a new, and incredibly low, moral basis.

As a weapon of destruction they exploited style. Conservative folk stood aghast at the utter shamelessness of the costumes quite generally adopted. Comfort and modesty, the real and only reasons for clothing, were abandoned for their opposites. The world was presented with the sorry spectacle of a legion of rational women in garments too meager to admit of free motion, sufficiently meager to incite all the vice which the display was supposed to dispel, and, withal, less meager than the infatuated ladies desired. For the second output of your Parisian ateliers was skimpier than the first. Hobble-skirts evolved into slashed hobble-skirts.

The while men abetted this extremity with smiles and bandies. Had their manliness not been at such an ebb, they would have surged forth in earnest protest. They would have attempted to rescue woman from folly. Is there aught on earth more precious to real men than female decency?

For once man, in unmanliness ceased to be woman's protector, it was only natural that she should become her own destroyer. Her worst enemy has always been herself. The Bard of Avon might have been an exaggerator, but he certainly was not a fool when he identified her with frailty. Unused to freedom, how could she be expected to use it properly? Like a child with a sharp knife, she had to cut herself. And man let her!

Her race for suffrage needs little comment. Heaven only knows that any virtue which she could bring to the polls was needed and would have been appreciated! But candor proclaims that, in her mad haste, she lost much of her power on the way. Eloquent episodes of her unique campaign abound, especially in England.

Moreover, her silly enslavement by such an inferior item as dress, hardly made men sanguine for her wisdom in the so important concerns of state. Clothes have nothing to do with civics, but the spirit behind them has.

Anent suffrage, the manliness of men proved more lacking than ever. Instead of the courtesy which a truly noble masculine spirit must needs prompt toward woman, even when she vexes it most, they lavished on her vile abuses, verbal and even physical. Plenteous instances of such insult are still fresh in the public mind.

Likely woman was wrong in her measures; men were worse in theirs. For it was the very freedom which they had years ago stripped off themselves and carelessly flung at her, which now stimulated her to the further freedom of the ballot. They, therefore, were more to blame than she; with the patience of real men, who are gentle as well as firm, they should have dealt with the extravagance to which their own rashness and supineness had given birth.

Unsatisfied with style and suffrage as manifestations of independence, women sought yet another evidence: the dance. The stage has always been esteemed a model of sex-equality. Actresses receive wages that equal, and often surpass, actors' salaries. The glamor of feminine liberty haunts the playhouse. So, however unconsciously, women became "stagetically" impressed. Accordingly they blossomed into soubrettes, with the world for their stage. Satan is even yet paying the salaries.

Terpsichorean exhibitions were dragged whole from the theatre and established as à la mode in respectable halls and parlors. In the grasp of Tango, the little modesty left over from the aforesaid extravagances, was crushed to much less. Accessory as man had been to woman's previous errors, he was doubly so in this, her latest and greatest. He was frankly her partner. His manliness could practically be summed up with a zero.

Such is the pass to which an interchange of masculine and feminine qualities has brought the irreligious and pseudo-religious world. It can not be doubted, however, that the war in Europe will prove a salient remedy for that continent, and indirectly for ours. It has already called man from ease and woman from excess; is inflaming in the former the virility which has been so contentedly smoldering to death; and is arousing in the latter the golden instincts of tenderness, solicitude, and patience. Woman will emerge from the ordeal chastened, sweeter, and more womanly than ever. Man, too, should come forth more manly; unless the conflict degenerates into primitive barbarity. It is the prayer and trust of Christendom that it will not.

Already the follies of the day have fled from Europe at the sound of cannon and the smell of powder. Already the sexes have slipped back into the rôles assigned them by nature: man as the protector, and woman as the protected. Doubtless in this the future is truthfully mirrored.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

Men of God and Men of Men*

MINISTERS are not always sensible. In fact, they are frequently the reverse, and for two very cogent reasons. One reason they are not always accountable for; that is their anomalous position. They are at once members of a church organization professing a certain general creed, and in common with all Protestants, absolutely freethinkers. This odd position they can scarcely help if they are born Protestants. But their sensibleness is handicapped very often by an equally serious trouble. To fill their churches they are obliged to be interesting personally. This in turn obliges them in modern times to be more or less sensational. Now, to be sensational and sensible at the same time is nearly as hard as to be both radical and conservative.

For a long time after the Reformation it was interesting and, on the whole, sensational to be opposed to Rome. Those who were sincere among the Reformers felt a self-conscious purity and exaltation of ideal. The others felt the sensational joy of all freethinkers in opposing the colossus of Rome. But to-day, when Rome looks less black than she once did, as the result of telegraphs and photographs and other normalizing agencies, this fear or horror or enmity of Rome is not so very powerful. The old evangelical fervor has, in consequence, died out in many places, and the various schemes for "Go-to-Church Sundays" and social and sociable activity have taken the place of many more worthy, if mistaken, ideals.

With the general advance of indifferentism, Protestant pastors seem to have forgotten how truly interesting goodness would be at the present day. It would be very nearly, if not quite, sensational. In the same way a sermon on reward and punishment, on heaven and hell, if delivered with the old-fashioned conviction, would be enough to fill many a church. But where indifferentism (called "tolerance") has caught hold of the pastors, how can we expect the flock to be enthusiastic? The pastor finds it difficult to regain the old conviction himself, and finding also that an insincere sermon does not carry weight, he resorts to the alluring fields of politics and "uplift."

*The sixth of a series of special articles.

In doing this he is far from sensible. He would do better to follow the example of certain well-known socialist ministers who, finding their religious convictions non-existent, gave up their ministry. That at least is frankness. It is at least discarding an impossible indifferentism for an open belief. A Protestant pastor who finds it necessary to continue a pastor after his religion has gone and only his sociability or socialism remains is not a sensible man; and he alone is to blame for his lack of sense.

But not all ministers espouse the socio-philanthropic craze for the sake of filling their churches. To maintain this would be bigotry pure and simple. Plenty of pastors are still sincere, have firm convictions (among them the hatred for Rome), and teach certain doctrines of Marx and others because they believe in them and think they can be woven in the same sermon with Christianity. This may show their lack of sense; but it does not prove them entirely to blame for what they think and teach.

The blame is chiefly with the strange contradiction of Protestantism itself. As a professed member of this or that Church, a minister naturally believes, or should believe, in certain doctrines. But as a staunch upholder of the right of private judgment, he must appeal for mental assistance to no authority higher than himself. He must, if he is logical, accept no man's word but his own. And if his thinking is loose (like that of all humans), as well as free, it is easy to understand why he can reconcile Marx and Christ, and not even shiver when he does so. Without authority to rest on, he is a bit like a small child trying to learn the mysteries of chemistry without a textbook or teacher.

Yet he remains, on the whole, a man of God, in the sense that he works and lives for God. His life is usually a good moral example, and his enthusiasms have the admirable simplicity of the child, as well as the "blunderingness." It is not very hard to carry the great social message of the Church to such a man. He is as eager as you or I to do real good, and if we can, little by little, persuade him that men make the laws and economic conditions, and not laws and conditions the men, we will find him a fervent apostle of faith, hope and love.

But the minister who has lost his convictions and has plunged into the pit of sensationalism is hard to reach. He is no longer a man of God, but a man of men. He is ruled by what men think, and not by what God commands. The sincere man of God, however mistaken, can be reached by both layman and priest. But the out and out "intellectualist," the minister who places his own reason above the demands of revelation, can be reached only by long and persistent argument, the well-trained argument of a priest.

The "intellectualist" no longer fears Roman dogma; he is indifferent to all dogma. For that reason, if for no other, he will listen with a fairly open mind to what a priest might say. His interest is in morals and ethics, as was the interest of the pagans. He will listen as readily to the moral views of a priest as of a labor leader. But he will not care much for the moral or ethical views of a Catholic layman. To him the Catholic layman is an amateur quoting the opinions of the professionals to whom he is devoted. The "intellectualist" would rather get his information from one in authority. He would listen even better to a cardinal than to a parish priest, because he thinks the cardinals and the Pope the only ones permitted to think in the Catholic Church. The layman, he believes, allows all his thinking to be done for him by those higher up.

It seems to me, then, that the urgent mission of the clergy and hierarchy to-day is to this class of luke-warm Protestant ministers, the men of men. Speaking with full authority, the clergy will be listened to where the laymen would be despised. How often the layman has experienced the mortification of having his explanations of Catholic morals greeted by: "That is an interesting view; but, of course, it can't be quite orthodox! Your clergy would never subscribe to that!" Let the clergy speak, then. And let them speak with full authority and vigor, so that misunderstandings can be cleared, and sensationalism robbed of its flimsy glamor, and those who are now men of men be made once more men of God.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

The Midnight Office of Christmas

AMONG the many disadvantages suffered by non-Catholics as a result of their separation from the Church, the absence of liturgical worship is perhaps one of the most striking. The personal relation between God and the individual is, of course, vital and essential; but the collective worship of the body of the faithful, the liturgical, is also an important feature. The loss of this tends to individualism in religious worship. This act of adoration by the entire congregation finds its expression in action, and, as the great feasts of the Church show, partakes of the nature of a solemn pageant. Of these sacred pageants the most important remaining to us are the solemnities of Holy Week and Easter, Pentecost and Corpus Christi. Christmas, too, has its solemn pageant in which the Church celebrates the Birthday of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; a pageant which reaches its climax in the midnight Mass, at which hour our Divine Saviour is said to have been born.

In monastic houses there takes place at Prime on Christmas Eve a solemn ceremony when, before the reading of the martyrology, a deacon sings from the lectern in the Chapter the announcement of the Incarnation of Christ. But for most of the faithful the first note of this mystery is sounded at the First Vespers. It is as though we sat in a gray mist, and heard in some far off land a distant voice calling. Scitote quia prope est regnum Dei: "Know ye that the Kingdom of God is at hand; Amen I say unto you, it will not tarry." The whole idea of the First Vespers of Christmas is that of watching and waiting, as of those that sit in darkness; and ere Mother Church sings Magnificat with Mary, she bids all her children watch and wait with that expectant Mother throughout the holy night: "Or ever the sun be risen from the heavens ye shall see the King of kings coming forth from the Father, even as a bridegroom from his chamber." Then the incense clouds melt away and the altar lights cease to twinkle, and with the shepherds of Bethlehem we watch and wait in the silence.

The night gathers, and a busy world gives itself up to every kind of festive preparation. Within the temple all is dark, save that here and there glimmers a light, and kneeling groups cleanse their hearts, that swept and garnished within they may offer a worthy dwelling to the Prince of Peace.

Then the altar lights flash out again, and the bells chime, and the solemn pomp begins that welcomes in the Birthday of the King, Whose herald announces His approach, Christus natus est nobis, venite adoremus. "Christ is born to us. Come, let us adore." And so Matins begins. There is a clash in the psalmody, and the sound of strife. The heathen rage furiously, and the people meditate a vain thing. The kings of the earth stand up, and the princes take counsel together against the Lord, and against His Anointed. But above the confusion of earth the heavens declare the glory of God; day calls unto day, and night cries unto night. The daughter of Tyre is there with a gift; for He has placed His tabernacle in the sun, and His coming forth from heaven is as a giant rejoicing to run his course. Dim and far off, back through countless centuries rises a voice. It is the Prophet Isaias who cries aloud to Jerusalem that her warfare is accomplished and her iniquity is put away. "Awake, awake; put on thy strength, O Sion. Shake thyself from the dust. Behold, it is I."

When the Prophet and his message have ceased we again, in company with holy David, await the loving kindness of God in the midst of His holy temple. The Ethiopians shall kneel before Him, and His enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tharsis and the isles shall give presents; the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts. For mercy and truth are now met together: righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

But the Old Law has passed, and St. Leo the Pope speaks from the Chair of Peter: "Our Saviour, Beloved, is born to-day: let us rejoice. For there shall be no place of sorrow on the Birthday of Life. . . . Recognize, O Christian, thy dignity. . . . Remember of what Head and of what Body thou art a member; call to mind that thou art delivered from the power of darkness, and transplanted into the light and Kingdom of God." Again the joy song breaks out, and the whole earth sings unto the Lord a new song. God has made known His salvation, and openly showed His justice in the sight of the nations.

Matins draws to a close, and there is a swift movement in the sacred pageant as the great Princes and Doctors of the Church hasten to take up their part. We hear St. Gregory the Great saying that it is meet that He, Who is the Living Bread from Heaven, should be born in Bethlehem, the House of Bread. St. Ambrose calls the faithful to behold the shepherds watching their flocks by night: for the flock is the people; the night, this age of the world; the shepherds, the priests. Nor may we forget the Mystery which is thus prefigured, for the great Augustine of Hippo expounds the doctrine of the Incarnation, and when the glad news has been declared the mighty Te Deum laudamus echoes through the temple, and the first part of the solemn mystery is done.

The movement now changes from the choir to the altar; from the place of the servants to the throne of the King, where, at the foot of the steps, the ministers gather. There is a cry from unworthy lips, Kyrie eleison, and suddenly the air is rent with the singing from a multitude of the heavenly host who chant: Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonae voluntatis; then the people keep silent and the priest prays. It is the newer Gospel rite, therefore it is fit that the Apostle of the Gentiles should make mention that the "grace of God our Saviour hath appeared to all men"; then from the lips of St. Luke we hear the old, old story of how Mary brought forth her First-born Son, and swathed Him and laid Him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the Inn.

Credo has sealed our faith in this Incarnation and all that followed thereby, the napkin has been spread on the manger of the altar; the white Host, symbol of eternity, is now covered by the corporal veil which signifies the veiling of Eternity in human guise, and the sweet incense has been offered. The sanctus bell clashes and we wait; for the King is at the threshold now. There is a soft sound of crushed silk as the priest makes the saving Sign and kisses the place where the Babe is to lie; a sudden crash of the bell again rings out, and there is the sound of whispering. It is the priest, the servant of the manger, calling upon the whole court of Heaven to hasten to the Christmas feast; and with swift movement the heavenly citizens pass that the King may be fitly attended. First, the glorious Ever-Virgin Mary, Mother of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ. The blessed Apostles and Martyrs, Peter and Paul, Andrew, James, John and all the illustrious twelve; and following on them swiftly the martyred Pontiffs springing from Peter's Chair, Linus, Cletus, Clement, Xystus, Cornelius and all the white-robed martyr throng, and when they too have taken their place about the throne, the angels bow their heads in reverence and the powers of heaven prostrate themselves in adoration. Swiftly and silently the action takes place. Not amid the roar of cannon, nor with the clash of steel upon steel sounding all around. A dim cloud of incense arises, the lights are lifted up to greet the Light of light; there is a mutter of whispered words, the faint tinkle of a bell, and the Word is made Flesh and dwells among us, and we behold the glory of the Only-Begotten of the Father.

Again the silence falls, and the firstfruits of the redemption through the Incarnation, the crowd of martyr witnesses, joins in the pageant. John, Stephen, Matthias, Barnabas, Ignatius; the virgins who have washed their robes white in His Blood, Perpetua, Agatha, Lucy, Agnes, Cecilia and all the saints; and with them, and with all the angels and the company of heaven we go up the hill to Bethlehem, to adore and to receive the new-born Christ. The first Mass is over, the Mass which celebrates the temporal birth of Christ in Bethlehem. At dawn will be said the Mass symbolizing the birth of Our Lord in the hearts of Christians, and when the sun is high in the heavens Christ's eternal birth in the bosom of the Father will be commemorated at the altar.

Ite missa est: the Mass is over, the Mystery is consummated, and it remains for glad hearts to celebrate this Birthday with a final song of praise, and Mother Church closes this pageant with Lauds. Quem vidistis, pastores? "Whom saw ye, O shepherds? Tell us Who hath appeared on earth. We beheld the New-born Child, and the choirs of angels glorifying God together. . . . A little Child is born for us to-day: and He shall be called God, the Mighty One. Alleluia. Alleluia. A solis ortus cardine. From pole to pole, from East to West there is breaking forth in succession the salutation of Christmas Lauds, and the whole earth is echoing with song as the dawn follows on the darkness of night at the passing of the shadow of death.

One by one the lights of the temple are extinguished, and the watchers leave the lowly crib to go out through the darkness to their own homes, as the shepherds departed from Bethlehem. The gray light of a Christmas morning breaks on the world, and for one day at least forgiveness has a place, and Christian love is not a mockery, because of that Ever-blessed Birthday,

When the Virgin full of grace,
By the Holy Ghost conceiving,
Bore the Saviour of our race.

HENRY C. WATTS.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

Midnight Mass for Peace

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It has been suggested, and I hope that very many of the clergy will be able to adopt the suggestion, that the last three days of the year be devoted to public and private exercises of reparation to Our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament for the terrible outrages, many of which have been directed against the Holy Eucharist, in unhappy Mexico. Will you permit me to make another suggestion? Would it not make a wonderful impression both in peaceful America and warring Europe, if throughout the country we could have a midnight Mass at Christmas, to ask the Prince of Peace to bring us peace in all our days, and especially peace to all our European brethren? Whether or not this suggestion could be put in practice, would of course, depend upon the judgment of the Right Reverend Bishops of the respective dioceses. I merely wish to bring the matter to the attention of the reverend clergy, and I have little doubt, that on proper petition, the Ordinaries will willingly grant their request.

St. Louis. SACERDOS.

The Italian Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The testimony of Bishop Dunne, Mgr. Lyons, and others, portraying the fruits produced among the Italians, does not affect the matter at issue. No one denies that here and there there have been local successes in the work, but the fact that these successes are the outcome of hard, long and persistent labor proves the need of the labor among the Italian immigrants and shows the condition of religious indifference and neglect with which they left their native land.

The question at issue is what is the collective result produced in this country among the millions of Italian immigrants after well nigh thirty years of labor and the expenditure of a large sum of American money. I don't deny that there may have been prejudices. I don't maintain that there may not have been at times neglect, or that economic conditions may not have been unfavorable, but all these combined can not account for the admitted religious indifference; otherwise this same neglect would be found to the same extent among other immigrants. Is then the collective spiritual result among the Italians commensurate with the vast expense and the toil bestowed upon them? My contention is, and I think I shall be borne out in this by most priests familiar with the subject, that it is not. This failure of results, this religious indifference on the part of the Italian I hold to be an indication that the conditions in Italy are not such as Father Sorrentino has described.

What then are the causes of this phenomenon? Let us paint them briefly without reserve, which can serve no good purpose and only impede the beneficial results we look for. The main causes are in Italy, and Italy is not the country of practical Catholicity that Father Sorrentino would have us believe. The Italians were not instructed solidly in their Faith; this is affirmed by Pius X, as "Forestiere" pointed out in a recent issue of AMERICA. If they needed special instruction to prepare them for the peculiar conditions in this country then for the last thirty years that instruction should have been given, and the fault lies in the neglect of the Italian clergy. Why did not the Italian priests accompany their countrymen in the early days of their immigration as did the priests of other nationalities? How is it that so many to-day in this country do not wish to labor among their own countrymen? Why is it that Pius X undertook the reform of the seminaries of southern Italy? Why the stringent regulations with regard to the immigration into this country of the Italian clergy? Here we have the explanation to a large extent of the religious indifference of the Italian immigrant, and here, too, we have the key to the lack of true practical Catholicity among the Italian people.

New York. HERBERT HADLEY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the spring of 1910, with the German-American pilgrimage from New York, I crossed over to Naples on the German liner Berlin. To my surprise I found an Italian chaplain on board who was given by the steamship company free second-class passage from Naples to New York and back. This priest—I forget his name—told me that all the ships carrying immigrants from Italian ports had to have chaplains. The very fact that public opinion in Italy is strong enough to force the greedy steamship companies to the extra expense of a chaplain, certainly speaks volumes in favor of the Italian Catholics. I assisted the chaplain on Sunday during his Mass in the steerage for the passengers returning to their native land. I must say that I was very much impressed by the piety displayed by these poor passengers under rather trying circumstances. On the other hand I have seen, during twelve summers of missionary life in the Northwest, groups numbering from fifty to one hundred and twenty and more of Italian laborers on the railroads, who never had a chance all summer to assist at Mass. They have to work from six or seven o'clock in the morning till at least seven in the evening. And their pay? How meager! They cook their own meals before and after their work, for their Sundays and weekdays are quite the same, except perhaps some lighted candles on an improvised altar on Sunday evenings, when they say the rosary and sing some hymns. I have tried several times to say Mass for them. Once only could I get some Neapolitans to come to Mass and listen to a little sermon. Most of the time the answer was: "Ecco parde, we have to work and make all we can; we can go to Mass again when we go to Chicago for the long winter or in the old country." To make matters worse, Socialist agitators are busying themselves all summer long with these poor laborers. If many, as it has been maintained, fall away from the Church, here is a great source of leakage. How can this leakage be stopped? Is there sufficient public opinion in this country to protest against Sunday work, or rather against the small wages that almost force them to work on Sunday? Can no pressure be brought upon the railroad companies to give these people a day of rest and also free transportation for chaplains who would look after their spiritual interests?

Crary, N. D. JUSTUS SCHWEIZER, O.S.B.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Pius X, writing of Italian emigrants states that they are "Fere non satis doctrina religionis instructi."

G. Realmuto: "This statement means that while their religious instruction sufficed for their mode of life in Italy, it does not suffice in America, where dangers are greater."

Forestiere: "They are, therefore, aware of the obligation of the First Commandment of the Church; but why do so few, in proportion to the population, attend Mass? Greater New York has as large an Italian population as the city of Naples; proportionately there are more practical Catholics in Naples than in New York. Why? Did that religious instruction include the obligation of hearing Mass on Sunday, whether in Italy or in America?"

As for the millions of men and women of other nationalities in this country who should be Catholics and are not, suffice it to state that these millions are not of the immigrant generation; it may be true of the second and third generation, but in the Italian problem, it is the immigrant who sacrifices his religion. Even from the letters of many clergymen, which have appeared in AMERICA, it is evident that they are striving to accomplish their work through the immigrants' American-born children. Why is this method the only satisfactory one? No one has denied that splendid religious conditions hold in Italy: at home the Italian is practical and probably becomes so again, upon his return, but on foreign shores he presents a problem that cries for some solution, and none is so satisfactory as that which holds that he should be instructed in the essentials of his religion.

The comments on the Italian immigrants' question have been of two classes: the one defended the immigrants, the other excused them. The former provided statistics which confirm the assertion that the immigrant is not a practical Catholic: e. g. 19,570 persons attended 42 missions in New York. This is a terrible indictment when viewed in comparison with the Italian population of New York. Moreover, these and all other statistics indicate local conditions and can not be a criterion of conditions in America any more logically than American indicate Italian conditions.

New York. FORESTIERE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Like all other questions there are two sides to this one. If the Italians are ignorant of religious truths, the most important thing to decide is how they can be best taught under the circumstances. It will not improve matters to abuse them. They have feelings like other people, and are very sensitive. They have discernment enough to know when a person is interested in their welfare. They resent an affront and reciprocate a courtesy offered to the humblest individual among them, and sympathy stimulates their generosity.

New York. JOHN T. NICHOLSON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been more than interested in the Italian question discussed in your excellent weekly for the past two months. I had often thought of writing you and of giving my impressions of the Italians in my State, and particularly in my parish, but that coward-making cui bono kept me silent. At least, before this controversy closes, as it must come to an end soon, and perhaps the sooner the better, I have decided to tell you my experience of fifteen years with the Italians of my parish and that in an absolutely unprejudiced manner. That it will throw any light on the raison d'etre of Italian indifferentism to religion in this country I doubt, but it will at least give the experience of one who tried to arouse them from their religious lethargy, and whose efforts have been all in vain. I am pastor of a parish within whose confines are pulp mills which employ sometimes one hundred and fifty Italians, sometimes a less number. For fifteen years I have tried and tried and tried in vain to get them to attend church. I have told them that the church services were as free to them as the American air, and still they did not come. On one occasion I got Italian priests to preach to them, to hear their confessions and to encourage them in every way. What was the result? Half the number perhaps, came to hear the sermon and only two went to confession even after I had arranged with the mill agents to exempt them from work. On other occasions Italian priests came among them also, talked with them, arranged with their Italian "Boss" for nightly church services, and when the hour arrived only two or three put in an appearance—even the Boss telephoned his "I pray thee hold me excused." I requested the head of an Italian religious order, who has gone to his reward, to send one of his priests to give them a mission and his reply was, after my going 200 miles to see him, "We can do nothing with them. They are no good; it would be hopeless!" Nothing daunted, from time to time I procured, with the aid of my bishop who is doing everything possible for them, Italian priests, and sometimes over thirty went to confession and received the following morning, but not one of those thirty was at Mass the next Sunday and they would not "lose their jobs" either, had they come. To the last Italian priest who came here, about one month ago, I said, "Father, the majority of Italian workmen in my parish can and will be allowed to come to Mass if they wish, and that without suffering any pecuniary loss. There is no excuse for them except on certain Sundays when they must work unloading cars. Now, when you are certain that they will not attend Mass the next Sunday after you leave, how can you absolve them?" He left that same evening without hearing their confessions. One of the Italian children was confirmed a few months since in my parish, and in order to please the Italians and his father, who is the Boss, I had him head the procession, bearing aloft the banner of the Sacred Heart. He has not been at Mass since. I met him last week and asked him why he did not come to church? His answer was "I have no time."

In all these fifteen years I have never seen more than three Italians at Mass and I do not expect to see any more. This is the feast of the Immaculate Conception. I am writing you this letter after having said two Masses, one at 5.30 and the other at 7, at which some two hundred persons communicated. Was there any Italian among the number? Not one, not even one at Mass! And still we were told by some of your writers within the past month that they have a special devotion for the Blessed Virgin and her feast days. If they have they do not show it in this parish. Their religion, what there is of it, is exterior. Mr. Herbert Hadley is right. Once I entered a big Italian church in a big city, and while there many devotees came in to visit, as I first imagined, the Most Blessed Sacrament, but to my surprise and, will I say my disgust, their devotion consisted in lighting candles, prostrating themselves before statues, going from shrine to shrine, from side altar to side altar, side-tracking altogether the main altar wherein reposed the Saviour of men. . . . My Italians never pass my church without saluting the statue of the Virgin in a niche, some even go so far as to cross themselves as they pass by, and this is the extent of their devotion here.

Of the hundred or more who are in my parish, I never see them—three being excepted, and these three never receive the Sacraments, at least here—at Mass or receiving the Sacraments. The only times they cast a shadow on the church doors are for baptisms and funerals, and they are highly indignant because I will not permit a high Mass of requiem over the remains of those who never entered the church while living or received the Sacraments when dying. How to account for all this I am at a loss to understand. Had they been instructed at home in the essentials of their religion it seems hard to think that they would throw everything to the wind in another land, no matter what the circumstances may be under which they exist. What I have said of my parish is the same all over the State, with perhaps one exception, and that in a large city, where out of a thousand or more, only about one hundred and fifty attend church.

The only salvation to my mind for the future Italian is the parochial school. Instruct the children now in their faith and we shall have Catholic Italians hereafter.

AN OLD PASTOR.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Herbert Hadley in his two rejoinders, has been pitifully paring down his original violent article against the Italians, laboring hard to make it square with truth. He confesses that he has no personal knowledge of the subject in hand; but with blindness born of prejudice, he keeps serenely on his course, contradicting witnesses who speak from long personal experience.

I have personal experience of the religious conditions of the Italian colonies in Albany, Troy, Buffalo, St. Louis and New York City, having ministered to them, and I affirm that seventy-five per cent. attend to their religious duties. Moreover it is utterly untrue that the Italians in this country, or any other place, are easily made Protestants. The great sums of money and personal efforts of the sects used for this purpose are very sterile of results.

But unfortunately it is true that a good many persons, who by their official position should help the Italian immigrant, show nothing but contempt and rebuffs for the Italians, proving openly that they are moved by a greater love for gold than for souls. These are the ones who give bitter and untrue information about the Italians.

New York. ITALO B.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Upon reading the observations of Father Sorrentino and others, in regard to the "Italian Question," one actually wonders why they defend a position which is so absolutely contrary to known facts. Letters have been written to Father Sorrentino by the most zealous Italian priests throughout the country, stating the true condition of the Italian in America; but none of these letters have appeared in your valuable paper. Most priests in the United States agree in regard to the Italian, viz.: that the majority of the immigrants to this country have had their religious instruction sadly neglected at home, and coming to this country, not knowing the language or habits of the people, have soon forgotten the very little they knew of God and of His Church.

The letter written by Mgr. Lyons of Wilmington, Del., gives us the key to the remedy for the betterment of the religious condition of the Italian in this country. As some one has remarked in this controversy the Italian came here, principally with commercial ends in view. . . . Mgr. Lyons indirectly suggests that the greatest hope for the Italian, is American priests who can speak the language of these poor religiously neglected people. This view is not a mere notion, but is the result of close observation in many places throughout the United States. The only successful Italian parishes are those where the pastor and assistants, whether they be Italian or American, spend all their time and exercise their duties for the Italian people alone, and who pay no attention whatever to those generous American "sore-heads" who criticise their own priests and church and go to the Italian priest for sympathy. Give us priests who will stick to the Italian and the Italian alone, until the time is ripe for amalgamation with the American people and in a generation or two we can point to the Italian in America as a model Catholic for any nation in the world.

Pittsburgh, Pa. F. P. SNYDER.

[This controversy is now closed.—Editor AMERICA.]

A Practical Suggestion

To the Editor of AMERICA:

What AMERICA and Extension have printed about the Mexican horrors we know to be true, but most non-Catholics are not in the least aware that there is anything like religious persecution in Mexico. Not so long ago our ears were bursting with the noise made by the American press, about a Russian Jew who was merely being tried according to the law of the land for an offence of which he may or may not have been guilty. That he had a fair trial seems sufficiently clear from the fact that he was acquitted. And yet when Catholics, priests, nuns, and the laity, are outraged and murdered at our very doors, simply because they are Catholics, the Catholic as well as the non-Catholic citizens of this land of the free and home of the brave, do nothing but watchfully wait—for more outrage and murder. Our council of the Knights of Columbus has adopted resolutions on the "unspeakable horrors in Mexico." But it seems to me that not much good is to be done by reading and adopting resolutions in the privacy of our council chambers. What we want is publicity, and it is quite plain by this time, that the press will not carry the Catholic side of the question as news. It is my intention to offer at the next meeting of the Knights, a resolution to publish in the Sunday ——— in large type, a full-page advertisement, setting forth the truth about Mexico. We have fallen upon evil times. Justice has left the editorial page and the news columns, when there is question of the Catholic Church. About all that is now left us is the paid-for publicity of the advertising section. S. L. B.

Kentucky.

Do We Lack Leadership?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of July 25th Mr. P. J. Judge of Omaha, Neb., under the caption "Do American Catholics Lack Leadership," discussed at some length the need of an authoritative ruling to guide our people on questions affecting the Church. Take the school question. Recently a very prominent Catholic, the graduate of a Jesuit college, was a candidate for governor. Probably he expected some Catholic support. And yet in a public speech answering questions propounded by the Guardians of Liberty, he declared in effect that if the legislature passed a bill giving State aid to "sectarian" schools. he would veto it. "Sectarian" schools of course referred practically to parochial schools. Was he right or wrong? Take the Menace question. The administration says there is no law to stop it. A few thousand people write letters but six hundred thousand paid subscriptions wield a larger political influence than a few thousand written protests. What is best to do about it? Take the Nathan affair. Beyond a few letters of protest, what was done? What should be done? Some say boycott the Exposition; some say that would be unpatriotic and lead to reprisals. What had best be done? Take the Mexican question. Surely that is a horrible situation. We can not understand it. What should we do as Catholics to remedy this awful condition? Here again, who will decide what is best to do?

What is the use in all these cases, of individual action here and there? Every one has his own opinion and no authoritative plan is presented for united action. If we had a leader in authority, we could sink our individual preferences or opinions and all work together in whatever way such an authorized and competent general would direct. There is one correct Catholic position on the school question, the Mexican outrages, the Menace vileness and other affairs that concern us most deeply as Catholics. Who will lay down the law on these points so that every Catholic could consider himself bound by that decision? There is one best way to accomplish an end. Who will definitely and authoritatively decide that best way? United action requires a uniform plan and leadership. We are accomplishing nothing under our present mode of procedure, and it might be the part of wisdom to think over some way to get results.

Brooklyn, N. Y. S. B. DUFFY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York. President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

A Christmas Greeting

IN the Mass which the Church with impatient joy begins at the stroke of midnight on each anniversary of Our Blessed Lord's birthday, she insists that Christmas is, in a special way, a festival of light. "O God," runs the Collect, "who didst make this most sacred night to shine forth with the glory of Him Who is the true light of the world; grant that He Who thus revealed to us, has made resplendent our path on earth, may be forever our joy and our light in heaven." The Gradual sings that Christ was begotten in the brightness of the saints before the day star was made; the Gospel tells how the brightness of God shone round the watching shepherds, and the Preface proclaims that by the mystery of the Word made Flesh, from the brightness of God a new light has risen to shine on the eyes of our souls. Centuries ago the Dayspring from on high came down to scatter the world's darkness and to be a guide for erring feet. Each year at this season God renews in men who are of good will the light that first shone forth from the Crib of Bethlehem. That this joyous and comforting light of Christmas may enter and fill the hearts of all the readers of AMERICA is our earnest wish and prayer.

The Italian Question

FOR some weeks the Italians have been under discussion by the readers of AMERICA, and much has been said in proof and in disproof of their practical religious observance. What started the subject was an article maintaining that the practice of religion throughout Italy is in a flourishing condition. This statement was challenged. Protests then followed to the effect that no matter what may be the conditions prevailing among the Italians at home, their practice of the Faith among us leaves much to be desired. The writer of the article in question tried to bring back the correspondents to the original topic, but the discussion would not be so controlled, and finally resolved itself into the question whether or not the Italians practise their religion when they come to our shores. One contributor called the whole discussion useless and harmful. We doubt the wisdom of his characterization. Seeing one's deficiencies brought to light is, of course, not pleasant, and yet concealment is at best but ill-considered kindness. When all has been said and due discount has been made for the insufficiency of the data offered as the basis of a judgment, the conviction, we think, will cling to most readers' minds that there is an Italian problem, and that it clamors for solution; and that although no good will come, either from exaggeration or underestimation, we should all be willing to see it in the broad light of day, and to do our best to cope with it.

As for the older Italians who come as immigrants and have no intention of remaining, who are said to have been practical Catholics at home and to be sure of becoming such again after returning, the general public is less concerned. As a class, the adult Italians will be found entirely out of the sphere of lay influence. This, however, is not the case with the bright-eyed, laughter-loving, industrious and intelligent Italian children who are going to be our fellow-citizens. These by patient and consistent effort can be made observant sons and daughters of the Church. They respond to kindness, they are quick to recognize their friends, and they are ready to give more than they ask both in devotion and affection. And yet they are growing up only too often in ignorance and neglect, to their own loss and to ours. For they are American children, and will live in our midst, and can be made Catholics in mind and in heart. From the blood that is in their veins have come martyrs. Such blood should not be allowed to belie itself. Nor will it belie itself, if only our Catholics will interest themselves in some of the many organized works of the lay apostolate, such as going in search of the children, gathering them together, instructing them, extending to them the ministrations of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and bringing them within the influence of the Ozanam clubs. A little zeal will suggest many expedients, adapted to local conditions, for deepening the Faith that is in them, for safeguarding them from proselytizers, and for making them realize that we are all members of the one fold, bound together by the common bond of Christian charity.

"The Least of These"

THE virtue of charity, if it is to be a virtue at all, must be heroic. The saying of our divine Master, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, thy brethren," may not be taken to apply only to the deserving poor, indigent gentlewomen, and respectable tradesmen in reduced circumstances. The curious and interesting fact about the virtue of charity is the paradox that the exercise of the virtue is more heroic in inverse proportion to the worthiness of the recipient; which is, perhaps, the difference between the Christian virtues and those that are merely ethical or civic. For instance, it is eminently laudable to bestow our charity on the worthy persons just mentioned, and, in a degree, the action is not unpleasing to the bestower. It is less pleasing, however, but decidedly more praiseworthy to bestow an alms on the undeserving poor, the untidy washerwoman, and the disreputable tradesman selling pencils on the sidewalk. It is heroic, and then, and only then, does charity reach perfection; for these are admittedly the "least" of the brethren.

One of the most striking features of Christianity is its sanity, and by its sanity is meant the faculty of knowing its own mind, and aiming at its ideals with a splendid unconcern for the aims and ideals of those who do not understand it; to which might be added a supreme contempt for that curse of all godless civilizations, "respectability." This was the case with such eminently sane and unrespectable Christians as St. Paul, St. Francis of Assisi, and St. Benedict Joseph Labre. Their greatness and their sanity were manifest in that they were well content to be counted fools; and very few respectable men are willing to be held as fools, even for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake.

Yet charity, if it is to become really great, demands even this; for the foolishness of the Gospel only begins where worldly prudence ends. It began when the respectable men who brought to Christ the woman taken in sin had fled, and left her, the woman of the street, face to face with the Sinless One. It began when St. Francis, casting prudence aside, devoted himself to the despised leper; and it can begin, here in these United States, when the object of our charity is not determined by his worthiness or unworthiness, but by his need, and by love of that Name for which the deed is done.

Moreover, the worthiness or unworthiness of our beneficiaries can not furnish any reliable data by which any practical Christian may limit his exercise of the virtue of Charity. Betty T., who died last October, and was laid to rest in a silk-lined casket covered with flowers, which was carried on its last journey by a special train, was said to be worth five thousand dollars. And Betty T. was a dog, a beast that perished, lacking a soul. If there be anything at all in relative values the little child insufficiently clad and crying with hunger, but having an immortal soul, might be rated at a higher value than five thousand dollars. But as things go a great many neglected little children die from starvation, and a great many pet dogs from overfeeding.

Tiger, a being of twelve years of age, has cause for being thankful. A devoted benefactress bequeathed to him one thousand dollars to provide him with kidneys and cream thrice every day, for the rest of his life. His benefactress died recently and Tiger has entered in his inheritance; and Tiger is a cat. Catholics may, therefore, leave prudence to the social "uplifter," and let their Christmas charity be actuated by the foolishness of the Gospel. For what part can worldly prudence play in a festival that commemorates the day on which God, the Maker of the Universe, chose to be born as a tiny child on a bundle of hay within a draughty stable, with the ox and the ass looking on?

A Plea for Reparation

In view of the awful outrages that have been so repeatedly committed against the Blessed Sacrament in Mexico, is it not timely to ask the Catholics of the United States to make in as public and devout a manner as possible extraordinary acts of homage and reparation? Is a national triduum of adoration and expiation out of the question?

Cincinnati, Ohio. JAMES A. MOORE.

WE can not endorse too emphatically the wish our correspondent has expressed in the part of his letter that we have quoted. A foul affront has been offered to Jesus Christ in His Eucharistic presence; and although the insults that cry out to heaven can never be undone, they can be repaired to some extent. Honor can be set against dishonor; loyalty can make amends for treason; public praise and worship can wipe out, at least partially, public shame. It would be a glorious profession of faith if we could, as a nation, unite in offering to the Sacred Heart of Christ an act of solemn reparation. Such a testimony of love and reverence would go far toward counterbalancing the deep disrespect which we all deplore. The outrages have stained the greater part of the past twelve months. What time, therefore, could be more fitting for a triduum of reparation than the last three days of the year?

Christmas Home-Coming

CHRISTMAS is almost upon us. Before long the railroad stations will be crowded with boys and girls. The air will be ringing with "Home for the holidays." And young hearts will be beating high with fond expectation. Parents, too, will be eager. What a meeting there will be! What close scanning of forms to note each little change, and silent questioning of eyes to see if affection has cooled. And, then, after wistful curiosity has been satisfied and anxious love reassured, there will be the all too short days of family reunion. During those days both father and mother will be sure to mark many subtle signs of development. They will not find their child altogether the same. If the boy has been to a Catholic high school they will notice in him a fuller grasp on the principles of his faith and a more manly pride in its practice; if the girl has been to a convent school they will remark an increase in that sweet simplicity and maidenly charm that comes almost by right to those who live under the same roof with the Son of the Lily of Israel. Such parents need have no misgivings as to the revelations of the holidays.

But what has the Christmas home-coming in store for those who have confided their children to the keeping of fashionable non-Catholic schools and academies? They, too, will find that a change has been at work in the soul of their boy and their girl. Are they sure it will be a change for the better? It will consist first of all in a touch of superficial refinement, in a new grace of manner and speech, and a certain pride in having added some wealthy Protestant name to their list of acquaintances, perhaps even of friends. If this were all, it would not be so bad. Unfortunately there are apt to be other changes as well. Many parents will notice a love for a more free and less modest manner of dress; a fondness for a kind of reading and dancing and plays, which if still innocent are not without danger; a sort of good-humored amusement at the strait-laced, old-fashioned notions of father and mother; a craving for excitement; and a very perceptible cooling in the fervor of religious life. Frequent confession and Communion, visits to the Blessed Sacrament, and the use of the rosary which they once regarded as holy commonplaces, now seem to them extraordinary and meant only for saints. They will give evidence of a growing realization of the social and other disabilities of their religion; and although still open in the profession of faith, will not be so enthusiastic about its beauties, and they will speak, though guardedly, of the lack of culture among Catholics and the impossibility of marrying suitably within the Church. These things are not, indeed, sinful, but they are signs that the spirit of worldliness which Jesus Christ holds in abomination, is casting its spell over their minds and setting up its throne in their hearts.

Parents of such children may close their eyes, if they will, but God will not do so. He will hold them strictly responsible for the souls he has put in their charge. It is their bounden duty to lead their children to God, and not to set stumbling, unseeing feet in the way of perdition. And yet this is what they run the risk of doing when they send them to fashionable non-Catholic schools. Some children, it is true, have come through them unscathed; but others have been robbed in them of faith, and have given up heaven for earth and sacrificed the love of God to gain the love of the world; and they have lived to curse their parents' folly. Fathers and mothers, therefore, during the holidays would do well to study their children, and ask themselves fairly before God what they are prepared to give them in exchange for their immortal souls. If they see the signs we have mentioned let them beware.

Peacemakers

ETYMOLOGY is a treacherous science. It has more than once led its devotees from the true analysis of a word to the false interpretation of the idea behind the word. Yet in the case of the "peacemaker" etymology is on the side not only of philological truth, but of ideal and real truth, too. For the word brings out the fact that peace is something which must be made, that the peacemaker is not merely a talker, an interloper, or a dreamer, but a maker, a producer, an actor, one whose business is with things more than with words, with realities even more than with ideals.

This truth needs emphasizing. Never more so than now. The popular idea of the peacemaker is little short of the ludicrous. It is embodied in the picture of the well-meant, ill-timed interference of a benevolent busybody, between two angry combatants; receiving dust and blows and bad language from both. His emblem is a helpless and sadly bedraggled bird cowering with fear amid menacing eagles. On the other hand, we have the word of Eternal Wisdom blessing the peacemakers, because "they shall be called the children of God."

Why this discrepancy? One explanation is simply this: we have substituted in our common concept the peacetalker for the peacemaker. The former is, indeed, untimely, intrusive, helpless and timorous, if not cowardly. The latter is a child of God because, like his Divine Father, he is conspicuously a producer, a creator, a maker of peace.

Peace is something that has to be made. We talk of "making war," and of "enjoying peace." It would be much truer to talk of making peace. For peace is the tranquillity of order, not the tranquillity of repose, and its creation and maintenance cost work and effort.

"In time of peace prepare for war," is the old adage. It might well run now: "In time of war prepare for peace." The approach of Christmas, the divine Peacemaker's birthday, reminds us that there is nothing less in keeping with the spirit of the season than the clash of arms and the roar of artillery, now resounding through Europe and through Mexico. This year, therefore, Christians should make their preparation for Our Lord's Nativity a strong unceasing prayer for peace. At this time, surely, He will graciously hear the united, fervent petitions of His children for that peace on earth He came to bring.

To Rage or Not to Rage

THE doctor, by means of a pocket-thermometer, can gauge your temperature. You await with ill-concealed anxiety the verdict of a little thread of mercury and a few scratches on a glass tube. That tiny fraction of an inch may mean another week in bed or the resumption of your normal life. There is a golden opportunity awaiting inventors to lighten the burden of prudence and give that overworked virtue a measure by which it can arrive at quick and easier decisions. Health has a normal temperature, and fluctuations above or below are warnings to take precautions. Virtue, too, has its normal, and prudence is the doctor, but, alas, prudence has no thermometer. Take any ordinary day of any ordinary individual, and you will find him subject to varying fluctuations in the heat of the soul. Is this the time and place, the soul asks, to flare into anger, or must one chill into meekness? Gwendoline is growing more fond of evading the domestic curfew-law. Shall mother put down her anger or put down her foot? Jack brings home bad reports from school. Shall father provide candy or a cane? The school-teacher has exhausted his supply of various looks, looks of surprise, of astonishment, of grief, of pain, of vexation; he has also run through the gamut of different expressions, request giving place to demand, demand to expostulation, expostulation to command, command to threat, and now the harassed pedagogue applies to prudence for a diagnosis. Shall the storm burst into lightning-flash and thunder-roar, or must it pass by with dark clouds only and with an undischarged volley? Restraint or the rod, which shall it be?

Perhaps some may never have explored this twilight-land between virtue and virtue where prudence holds its sway. In the world of flowers there are plants which mature slowly and bloom once a century, while other plants need but a few hours to burst into bloom. In the world of combustibles you have green wood and dry powder. In the world of temperaments you have century plants and johnny-jump-ups; you have some that ignite and others that explode. These latter find a fever-chart as useless as a rapid-firing gun would find it. Yet even artillery needs cooling, and your most fiery temperament can not go too far without serious consequences to itself, not to mention the immediate objectives of its wrath. The more rapid-firing the gun, the more carefully must it be tempered, and explosives are notably in need of careful handling.

If prudence has delicate work laid out for it in determining where weakness should flame into anger, it has no less trouble in settling the precise point where resentment should change to resignation. Elementary common-sense dictates that when a stone-wall is met with and when there is no better catapult at hand than a human head, the most impatient will see that they must wait for a while, at least, until siege guns can come up. No one, unless he has won the championship for sprinting, will flap a red flag in the eyes of an angry bull. In olden days it was advised to feign death when you met a bear. Whether modern bears are so dainty about having live food is not altogether certain, but the silence and chill of death is often the best attitude to assume toward human bears. The time will come in Gwendoline's life and in Jack's life when the anger of mother and father will be seen to be waste ammunition. If meek reproach and angry rebuke have failed, then the value of education and of protected innocence will have to be taught to these troublesome children by severer teachers than their parents. Let father and mother turn to prayer rather than wear themselves out by useless fretting, or by trying to burrow into a stone-wall. There was One who on a time took a lash and wielded it in angry mood, but later He had the sword put into its scabbard and was "Like a lamb without voice before his shearer."

LITERATURE

A Greek Schoolmaster Still Teaching

ISOCRATES was probably the greatest schoolmaster the world has ever seen. His school was thronged with pupils. His methods were eminently practical. He brought his pupils through the three stages of analysis, criticism and composition. Although Isocrates himself, because of personal deficiencies, early ceased to be a practising orator, he was no admirer of what might be called "closet" oratory. "The future orator must try the effect of each arrangement and combination of technique on the audience and so draw up his own system." "The chief boast of the school of Isocrates," says Freeman, in his "Schools of Hellas," "was that it produced gentlemen." The number of disciples Isocrates left after him has been computed to be more than forty. In the theory of rhetoric he was surpassed by Aristotle. "Yet the school of Aristotle produced not a single orator of note except Demetrias Phalereus; the school of Isocrates produced a host. Why was this?" asks Jebb. He answers that it was by his exercises for which his own writings furnished models that Isocrates formed his pupils.

